Two criteria were applied. We have concentrated today on council tax increases, but there was also a requirement to establish expenditure budgets that were not excessive. Some budgets were far above the level of inflation, whether measured according to the general retail prices index or equated with the inflation rate claimed by some in local government.

Mr. Philip Hammond rose—

Mr. Woolas: I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman allowed me to complete my general points, as I have limited time.

There has been a complaint that councils with a low council tax base are being punished. The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) said that authorities with a low council tax base should be exempt from any capping regime. There is a twofold argument against that. If we take the average as the benchmark and consider councils whose council tax has historically fallen below that level, we would quickly find that a Government of any colour would face an increase in the average. Rises would become a self-fulfilling prophecy. Experience of local government finance in the past 30 to 40 years shows that that is the case.

Another theme of our debate is the accusation that the Government have failed to listen. I am genuinely sorry if that impression has been given. We have made changes, in particular in response to the representations from South Cambridgeshire and elsewhere. If the House does not accept my assurances, I remind hon. Members that we have a legal obligation, which can be subject to challenges in the courts, to show that we have indeed taken those points into account. It is not the prime purpose of the legislation, but I am also under an obligation to take into account the 98 per cent. of authorities that have not made excessive increases in their expenditure budgets or council taxes. Many of those authorities face similar problems to councils mentioned in today's debate, including the negative housing subsidy to which the hon. Members for Brentwood and Ongar and for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) referred. It is reasonable that the Secretary of State should take such matters into account.

Arguably, the very fact that we are talking about small amounts and a small number of local authorities shows that although capping is regrettable—our policy of using capping only as a last resort has failed in this respect—it has nevertheless secured the lowest level of council tax increases across the country for a number of years. Given the 12.9 per cent. of previous years, we cannot dismiss the 4.1 per cent. achieved this year. As for the accusation that the order is politically motivated, when I was first briefed on the issue and saw the word "Sedgemoor" the colour drained from my cheeks, as I genuinely believed that it was the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I faced the daunting prospect of meeting not just a former leader of the Conservative party—everyone would regard the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) as a formidable advocate—and his local authority, but my right hon. Friend. That is not sustainable. As further evidence, I remind the House of what happened last year in a similar debate, when Nottingham city council—not exactly a bastion of the blue rinse Conservative party—was facing a similar problem. I give the assurances requested in that regard.

The hon. Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), speaking on behalf of the Liberal Democrats, said that she would not support any capping regime. Will she then desist from blaming the Government, as she does constantly, when council taxes rise above the level of inflation? When there was no council tax regime three or four years ago, the Liberal Democrats were the first and the strongest to condemn not the local councils that put up council tax above the rate of inflation—including my own, which was Liberal Democrat-run at the time—but the Government. She cannot have her cake and eat it. It is consistent for her to say that she opposes a capping regime of any kind, but it is not consistent for her opportunistically to use people who she says are suffering disproportionately from council tax increases and to hang that around the neck of the Government.

Sarah Teather: The Minister will recall that I also said that the way to solve the problem was to deal with the balance of funding crisis. I suggested that the first step might be to give control of business rates back to local councils. That way, they can raise a larger proportion of their income from a local base and have much more control.

Mr. Woolas: I understand the point that the hon. Lady makes. I guarantee the House that were the Government to pursue that policy and use the Lyons review to decentralise the national non-domestic rate, as she suggests, without applying a form of capping regime or an inflation limit to that non-domestic rate, we would be back here in two or three years and she would be blaming the Government for imposing excessive taxes on businesses and her constituents. If she will give me a guarantee that that will not happen, I will guarantee to consider her proposal more seriously.

Let me respond to some of the other points that were made. I shall try to answer the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge if I can. The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar, who spoke on behalf of the official Opposition, did not say that his party was opposed to any capping regime. He said that it was opposed to capping regimes that hit only the lower council tax base local authorities. As he claims that Conservative councils are the more efficient authorities with a lower council tax base, is he not saying that he would accept a capping regime as long as it did not apply to Conservative authorities? Is he not therefore hoist on his own petard and guilty of what he falsely accuses me of doing?

Mr. Pickles: The Minister has been most courteous in giving way and we all thank him. He has introduced a new idea that because low-spending authorities increase council tax by a particular percentage, that affects the aggregate amount raised by local authorities. However, the calculation is on the actual increase, not on the percentage, as the hon. Gentleman agrees. I have quickly calculated that the proposal would put up the average by 0.002 per cent. In order to make a 1 per cent.

increase on the average, councils would have to increase their council tax by 2,000 per cent. Does he expect to be taken seriously on the basis of that maths?

Mr. Woolas: Let the hon. Gentleman come with me to the Local Government Association—and in particular to the district councils that have kept their council taxes down and restricted their budget expenditure as a result of the policy promoted by the Government—and let him justify his argument there to the other councils that have not put up their council taxes excessively. The hon. Gentleman is trying to have his cake and eat it. He cannot criticise the Government consistently for council tax increases above inflation, and then shy away from the very regime that has helped to prevent that. I believe that that answers his point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) has the virtue of consistency and has opposed capping in any form. I respect him for that and also suggest that he is being consistent by not attacking the Government for above-inflation council tax increases. Indeed, as I recall, he was consistent in attacking the Liberal Democrat-run Sheffield council, as it was then.

The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks and the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) have been assiduous in putting forward their council's point of view, so I shall try to answer several of the questions that they asked. The right hon. Gentleman asked whether a council tax increase from £10 to £11 would be excessive. I reply to that by pointing out the second criterion that was used in our policy: the establishment of the budget, as well as the council tax. He is looking at only one side of the coin. Even if an increase is excessive, we will consider individual circumstances if councils challenge the cap. However, he will know, as will the hon. Member for Vale of York—I shall try to respond to the point made about the Bellwin scheme as well—that Hambleton council has taken the decision to use its reserves in a way that other councils have chosen not to, or have been unable to. When trying to apply a policy that is fair to that council and other councils, as the Secretary of State is obliged to do, we must consider the pattern of the use of reserves and increases to budgets, as well as increases to council tax.

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley)—

Miss McIntosh: Will the Minister respond to my point?

Mr. Woolas: Oh, I am sorry. The hon. Lady rightly reminds me that she made a point about the flooding that her area has suffered, about which she has also written to me. Emergency financial assistance is available under the Bellwin scheme and Hambleton district council has applied for it. An authority can receive assistance with non-insurable clear-up costs incurred by taking immediate action to safeguard life and property following a disaster or emergency in its area. If an application is approved, we usually reimburse the authority with 85 per cent. of eligible costs above a threshold relating to its annual budget. I hope that she accepts that the assistance and the capping are separate issues, although I undertake to write to her comprehensively about the matter.

Miss McIntosh rose—

Mr. Woolas: I acknowledge the hon. Lady's point, but may I move on?

The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire made several points and asked several questions about his council. He said that the council tax had increased from £70 to £140, but seemed to dismiss that as a trivial point. He then made what seemed to be a valid point, on the face of it, by saying that the consequence of the cap would be to reduce the council's expenditure from £13.7 million to £12 million. Although he would not expect me to dictate how that problem should be addressed, the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth), who led the neighbouring council, criticised South Cambridgeshire for the way in which it used its reserves. I understand that South Cambridgeshire has more than £6 million of reserves. I ask him to consider the fact that I must be able to treat his authority, and other authorities that are not in such a situation, consistently.

I hope that I can reassure the House that we are listening carefully and taking representations seriously by saying that South Cambridgeshire council applied for judicial review this week to challenge the decision. The judge had some empathy with the council. I cannot quote Mr. Justice Stanley Burnton directly, but the essence of what he said was that although he had the utmost sympathy with the authority because it did not propose to increase its expenditure excessively, the capping was predictable because it had levied an artificially low council tax in the past and reduced its reserves.

Mr. Philip Hammond: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Woolas: The hon. Gentleman asks what is wrong with that, but we are trying to ensure that council tax payers are protected from excessive increases. That policy is working.

The hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) said that he was not listened to when he met the Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar and Canning Town (Jim Fitzpatrick). I am sorry that that was his impression, but the idea was to allow local authorities and, where appropriate, hon. Members to make representations. I was not obliged to receive such representations, but I was obliged to ensure that all local authorities, whether they are capped or not, are treated consistently, which is what I have set out to achieve.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Woolas: I must make some progress. We have had a full debate in which the hon. Gentleman's points have been heard.

The hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) had some fun at my expense in saying that Mid Bedfordshire district council is not a titan and that I should not be afraid of it—I am not afraid of it, but I am afraid of excessive council tax increases.

[Mr. Woolas]

Conservative Members have derided the cap because of the relatively small amounts of money involved, but the very fact that we are discussing such small amounts means either that the problems are not as great as has been made out or that the Government's council-capping policy has been successful. Furthermore, capping is a last resort that affects only a small number of councils.

Mr. Hammond: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Woolas: No; I must make my points.

The leader of the independent group on Mid Bedfordshire district council, John Gurney, has written to me, as have constituents of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire. John Gurney stated:

"The 13.3 per cent. increase, and a budget plan that proposes a similar increase for next year, were both unnecessary and unacceptable to our residents. I trust there will be no suggestion of backing down from the action . . : proposed."

The 13.3 per cent. increase is nowhere near the amount indicated either specifically or generally by my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford). Although it is not for me to dictate how the cap should be met, the reserves available to Mid Bedfordshire district council are not available to other councils.

The legislation states that the cost of billing must be met from this year's budget. The capping regime must have teeth in order to fulfil its purpose, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich made it clear that the billing costs would have to be met in the current financial year if excessive budgets and excessive council taxes were set.

I have not had an opportunity to address all the points raised by hon. Members. I am not, as some Opposition Members have suggested, embarrassed by the Government's policy, which is to keep council tax down. Opposition Members must respond to this final point—if they oppose all capping regimes and want me to guarantee that such regimes will not be used in future, they must guarantee that they will not blame central Government for above-inflation council tax increases.

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Order [14 July].

Orders of the Day

Regulation of Financial Services (Land Transactions) Bill

Not amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

Order for Third Reading read.

5.1 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Third time.

The aim of the Bill, as I am sure hon. Members already know, is to extend the full protection of Financial Services Authority regulation to consumers purchasing home reversion plans and ijara sharia-compliant home finance products. That will help people to make informed choices about what may be the most significant financial decision that they make and ensure that there is a level regulatory playing field in the equity release market, much of which already falls within the FSA's remit.

I am grateful to Opposition Members for constructive debate in Committee and for their continuing support for this useful and important measure. Indeed, the Bill may have gone through its various stages at record speed, although I do not want to tempt fate.

As the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) pointed out in Committee, it is when there is unanimous support for a Bill's objectives that it is perhaps most important that proper scrutiny of its detail should take place. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer), who is not present this afternoon, on ensuring that scrutiny took place constructively and effectively. I should also like to place on record my thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Caton) for so ably steering our scrutiny of the measure in Committee. I think it was the first time he had performed that role and we were all grateful for the efficient and effective way in which he did so.

Our deliberations in Committee focused on two main points: first, whether a de minimis limit should be applied to regulation; and, secondly, the need for continuing parliamentary scrutiny of the costs of regulation.

I hope that I was able to assure the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster that the Government had considered the de minimis threshold carefully when drawing up the Bill. Indeed, we included a specific question on whether a de minimis limit was appropriate in our public consultation. As I made clear in Committee, the Government do not believe that it is appropriate to set a de minimis threshold for the regulation of home reversion plans and ijara home finance products because of the risk that less scrupulous providers might exploit it by offering multiple loans just under the de minimis threshold to the same borrower. The risks to the consumer of cumulative borrowing would be no different from those attached to a single plan for more than £50,000. We also believe that that could create a potential distortion in the market. The view received unanimous support in the consultation.

The respondents to the consultation included a wide spread of home reversion providers, industry representative bodies, not-for-profit organisations and consumer representatives.

The second issue is the proper and appropriate scrutiny of costs. The debate in Committee focused on this issue, particularly in relation to regulation in this area, in order to ensure that the costs remain proportionate. I made it clear to the Committee that ensuring proportionality of regulation is hard-wired to the DNA of the Financial Services Authority. The Financial Services and Markets Act 2000 obliges the FSA to ensure that regulation for which it is responsible is proportionate and takes into account the effects on competition, innovation and international competitiveness. Should the Bill pass successfully through Parliament, the FSA will consult publicly on the detailed rules that it intends to apply to home reversion plans and ijara home finance products. Included in the consultation will be a full cost-benefit analysis.

Furthermore, the FSA is already accountable to Parliament. Its annual report is subject to parliamentary scrutiny and must set out how the authority has met its statutory objectives and principles of good regulation throughout each year. Those principles include the requirement always to ensure that the costs of regulation are proportionate. I was therefore able to reassure the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster that the proposed amendment requiring additional impact assessments was unnecessary and would simply create an additional burden for industry, without providing any clear benefit.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): The Minister is prudent to have regard to the importance of proportionality. Given the commitment that he has just made to proportionality and to keeping regulation to a necessary minimum, what assessment has he made of the merits of incorporating some of the provisions of the Regulatory Flexibility Act 1980 and of the Small Businesses Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act 1996, both of which hail, as he knows, from the experience of the United States?

Mr. Lewis: As we develop our better regulation agenda, we consider the lessons to be learned from the global marketplace. Where there is a case of regulation being done better and more effectively, we should of course take account of it. However, it is important to place on record the fact that, in any international dialogue about best practice in regard to financial services, the FSA comes out very positively indeed in any analysis.

The point that I have been making since I got this job is that it is not inconsistent to say that, while the FSA is an excellent example of best practice in regulation, there is always room for improvement and always room to work with the industry to consider better regulation, both in terms of domestic regulatory measures and in terms of those that emanate from the European Union. In this country, the FSA, the Government and the industry have been quite successful in ensuring that the financial services regulations that emanate from the European Union are consistent with many of the principles that we want to see applied in terms of proportionality and best practice. That does not mean that we always win the argument, but I think most people would accept that, largely as a result of the respect that the FSA commands, we have been able significantly to influence the agenda relating to the regulations for the financial services sector that come from the European Union.

To respond further to the hon. Gentleman, we are keen to look at the regulatory bodies in the United States, as well as globally, in achieving a level playing field in the regulation of the financial services sector. That is not easy to achieve, and there is an argument that liberalisation and the opening up of the market should be the greatest priorities for financial services. However, we certainly want to see an increased emphasis not only on internal regulatory systems within the European Union but on looking outwards to our relationships with the United States and with the emerging economies of India, China and elsewhere.

The better regulation agenda needs to be considered domestically, as well as from a European Union point of view. It also needs to be considered in the context of the global market and the global economy. We are rightly proud of the leading role that Britain plays in that regard. There is always a difficult balance to be struck: we must protect the interests of consumers but not stifle the innovation of business, particularly in the financial services sector. We know the tremendous contribution that the sector makes to the success of the British economy, and long may it continue. I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman is reassured by my response to his extremely interesting question, about which I may speak to him on another occasion.

The issue of the costs of regulation, which has been raised by the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) previously, has been the subject of some discussion. It is important to know that the costings in the published regulatory impact assessment remain estimates, as I have said before. They are derived from figures published by the FSA in relation to the existing mortgage regime, and are based on future projections of market size, which have left considerable room for dynamic market growth. In addition, the precise nature of the regime that will apply to home reversion plans and ijara products will not be finalised until the FSA has consulted on its detailed rules. As it is statutorily obliged to do, the FSA will issue a detailed cost-benefit analysis alongside its consultation on the detailed rules. That CBA will enable us to further refine the costings in our RIA currently, and it is possible that in the wake of a more detailed market analysis and definition of a tailored FSA regime, the projected costs of regulation will fall.

While there is always cost to regulation—to be fair, hon. Members on both sides of the House have accepted that in this context—it is important to remember that in this case the industry is willing to bear that cost, because of the benefits that it believes it will bring to the home reversion market in terms of improved consumer confidence. In the industry's view, that will allow the reversion market to continue its dynamic growth. A deeper and more liquid market in these products should in turn create new opportunities for market entrants. I would therefore encourage Members not to see regulation in this case as purely a deadweight cost to industry, because it clearly has potential benefits and can reduce reputational risks for lenders. I therefore remain convinced that, on balance, the benefits of regulation, both in terms of consumer protection and in terms of securing the confidence necessary for future market growth, outweigh the projected costs.

Having briefly outlined our discussions in Committee, let me conclude by reaffirming that the Government believe that this Bill will benefit both consumers and providers of home reversion plans and ijara home finance products. Regulation, as facilitated by the Bill, will help people to make informed choices when purchasing such products and offer valuable consumer protection in the event of any mis-selling. It will also ensure a level regulatory playing field in the equity release market and should generate the increased consumer confidence that is essential if this market is to continue to grow.

On that basis, I would ask Members to support the Bill. I commend it to the House.

5.12 pm

Mr. Mark Field (Cities of London and Westminster) (Con): I realise that any self-respecting Opposition spokesman would by convention claim on reaching Third Reading that at least some of his party's concerns remained unresolved. I suppose that that is the case, although Her Majesty's Opposition cannot really claim that this Bill is an improvement on the one initially published in May. The fact is that our collective deliberations have made not one jot of difference to the wording of the Bill before us today. In fairness, that might owe more to the fact that this politically uncontentious piece of legislation contains the princely sum of two clauses. Perhaps it might be down to my effectiveness or that of my parliamentary colleagues—at least that is the story that I am sticking to.

In the four weeks since Second Reading, however, not only have we had a constructive Committee stage but we have lived through some tumultuous times nationally. The terrorist atrocities in London and the G8 conference in Scotland followed hot on the heels of the more uplifting, triumphant announcement that our capital city will host the 2012 Olympic games, and the UK's hosting of the series of Live 8 concerts. All of that has been packed into the past few weeks, during our consideration of this Bill.

We have also learned of eventful times for the Economic Secretary, who sped back to his native north-west from the Second Reading debate to attend his sister's wedding celebration. I know that it is common for young men to be fearful of their fathers-in-law, but I suspect that the newest arrival to the Lewis clan will have more cause for trepidation in his relationship with his new brother-in-law. The Economic Secretary also revealed in Committee his split allegiances: red in his political affiliation, and blue—well, sky blue at least—in footballing terms. I sincerely hope that, if only to ensure harmony around the dining table in the Lewis household, the Economic Secretary's new brother-in-law is not divergently schizophrenic in his own football and political allegiances. I am sure that if he were a Tory that would be bad enough, but for him to be a Manchester United supporter as well would be a step too far.

As I warned in Committee, the universal political support for the Bill makes its scrutiny, however brief, all the more important. I should reiterate my own view: I would welcome any move to increase public confidence in home reversion or equity release schemes, not least in the light of the adverse publicity in the financial press that such schemes have received in recent years. It is important to stress, however, that the Bill's proposals are likely to apply far more widely in the years ahead than may be envisaged now.

Equity release will not be the preserve of elderly folk wishing to remain in the family home while releasing capital to make up for inadequate pension provision during retirement. I believe that the single biggest demand for such schemes in the years ahead will be from middle-aged people in the workplace demanding the opportunity to release equity in their homes to give their children a lift on to the otherwise elusive property ladder. In many ways that should be regarded as a welcome trend, but it also reflects the tendency towards greater indebtedness among people in their 20s, especially those choosing to attend university and staying on for post-graduate study.

As the Minister said earlier, during the Bill's progress we have received reassurances from the Treasury about its willingness to review the operation of the legislation carefully in its early years to ensure that the regulatory burden is kept to a minimum. I accept that our probing amendment to introduce the de minimis provision might in itself have led to unintended consequences. Certainly it is not our desire to lay open the risk of home reversion plans and ijara home finance products being exploited by unscrupulous lenders offering multiple loans to the same borrower at a level just below the threshold that Parliament might set. Nevertheless, I hope that attention will be paid to our concerns. Our main worry is that the sheer cost of regulation and administration is such that some larger providers might be dissuaded from involving themselves in equity release schemes just below a certain level. The risk is that that might result not just in diminished choice, but in a deterioration in the quality of service for some of the more vulnerable people seeking to benefit from the Bill.

We have also tried to express some of our more general anxieties about the operation of the Financial Services Authority. I am sure that we shall return to that theme, both in general debate and in debating other legislation. Let me stress again that we consider it crucial, if London and indeed Edinburgh are to remain highly competitive global financial centres, for all regulation to be practical and pragmatic in its approach.

There is little doubt that many market professionals here in London regard the emergence in the United States of Sarbanes-Oxley rules as a substantial hindrance to US competitiveness in financial services. As ever, their true effects will take time to work through the system. We accept that the FSA needs to get the balance right between consumer protection and promoting competition and competitiveness in a global financial context. We should, however, see the situation in proportion. The expansion of the FSA's powers to take in equity release, home reversion and ijara home finance products cannot be seen as an enormous expansion in the regulator's power.

We entirely accept the need for more consumer confidence about these products, particularly given even stronger evidence that property is being used as a proxy for more pension planning by a generation of savers currently in their thirties. Market profitability and product innovation will be of key importance in a relatively immature market, and I have been reassured by the Minister's acceptance that his Department will keep the matter under regular review.

I thank my hon. Friends the Members for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) and for Forest of Dean (Mr. Harper), who provided such sterling support in Committee. It occurs to me that both were born in the 1970s. They are a constant reminder to those of us who are members of a slightly older generation that there may be some urgent self-interest in equity release schemes before the world is too much older. I also thank my hon. Friends the Members for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) and for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) for their contributions on Second Reading.

Notwithstanding the absence of contentious debate, this Bill's passage has provided a useful opportunity to place some of our concerns on the record. No one disputes the importance of placing equity release schemes and home reversion plans under the regulator's auspices, but we do hope that the FSA will keep its costs and those passed on to consumers to an absolute minimum.

As you may have gathered, Madam Deputy Speaker, amid the serious and worthwhile debate there have been some opportunities for levity. For example, the Economic Secretary is now well aware of my rather obsessive knowledge of the pop music charts. I have to confess that I needed to look in a reference book to discover what was number one in the UK charts on the very day that he was born, in the first week of March 1967. I have to report that in the context of this Bill, the song in question—"Release Me"—could scarcely have a more appropriate title. In truth, I suspect that Engelbert Humperdinck may have had other things on his mind than equity release and home reversion plans, but his words were strangely prophetic as he sang, "Please release me, let me go."

On that hopefully not too discordant note, I, too, am happy to commend this Bill to the House.

5.21 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) has said essentially what I wanted to say. This Bill has been well managed in an harmonious spirit and on the basis of great consensus, both on Second Reading and in Committee, where my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) represented my colleagues and me.

I thank the Economic Secretary for referring at some length to regulatory costs, which were my main concern. He made the entirely valid point that what is relevant here is not so much the Government's activities as those of the Financial Services Authority. I hope that the FSA has heard our concerns, and that it will take them properly into account in drafting the regulations that will flow from this legislation. The Economic Secretary also made the valid point that the danger with consensual legislation is that things can slip through the cracks. I want to mention a couple of cases where that might have happened, one of which could be quite serious and relates to the ijara proposals. It is clearly too late to introduce amendments, but it is worth flagging up these issues so that the Government can reflect on them before the Bill proceeds to the other place.

There were three basic motives behind the Government's decision to introduce legislation on home equity release schemes: consumer protection; raising confidence in products, so that the market can expand; and creating a level playing field to prevent what the experts call regulatory arbitrage—in other words, preventing capital from flowing from regulated products into unregulated ones, because the costs associated with the latter are lower. On Second Reading, I asked whether this legislation should cover areas that appear to have been excluded from such regulation and from mortgage regulation, such as buy-to-let properties. Having subsequently discussed this issue with bodies such as the Council of Mortgage Lenders, I have been persuaded that doing so would not be appropriate and that the Government were right to exclude them.

However, those bodies also referred to a gap in mortgage regulation that might well lead to regulatory arbitrage. This problem relates to property investment clubs, which are rather different from buy-to-let schemes, in that they do not involve conventional professional landlord management relationships. We are talking about people who are looking to make speculative gains out of housing equity, and in many cases they are driven by the same motives as those that underpin the transactions with which this legislation deals. There is undoubtedly a great deal of abuse of consumers. Some of us will be familiar with the glossy leaflets distributed in our constituencies, advising people to ring a strange telephone number—no address is given—and to turn up to a meeting, where they will then be briefed on how to make themselves very rich by entering into particular property transactions. A good deal of money is undoubtedly being teased out of people in the form of, for example, hidden charges.

I understand that the Department of Trade and Industry has used existing regulation to crack down on a couple of such schemes. I ask the Minister to consider whether it might be sensible to cover them with a relatively modest enlargement of the scope of the Bill when it goes to the other place.

My other point is more serious and relates to the provisions governing ijara finance. We all welcome the idea of creating a form of finance that our Muslim constituents can use comfortably because it meets their religious as well as market requirements. It is an eminently sensible idea and we all rush forward to endorse it. People in the property business and, more particularly, in the Law Society have pointed out, however, that we may be unwittingly creating problems for many of those families by encouraging them to take ijara mortgages without adequate legal protection.

The nature of ijara transactions generally means that the property remains in the ownership of the lender. A person who would normally be a mortgagee is, in fact, a tenant—an assured tenant, but the person who is acquiring the house through ijara finance is not the owner of the house. The equivalent of the mortgage lender is the owner, which presents two serious problems.

First, the occupant of the house is in a much weaker position in respect of disputes over arrears. Under the Housing Act 1988, the lender or owner of the property could evict after two months of arrears, whereas under conventional mortgage arrangements, the mortgagee has security of tenure. In those circumstances it is a matter for a court and a court order has to be obtained. The ijara borrower is therefore in a much weaker position than the conventional mortgage borrower.

Secondly, another difficulty applies either when someone wants to pay off their obligations or to foreclose. Under a conventional mortgage, the mortgagee is protected in that the mortgage lender is obliged by law to secure the best possible price and to make available, if he sells the property, a full account of the transactions. Under an ijara arrangement, however, the provider has no such obligation. According to lawyers, we could unwittingly place people who undertake ijara transactions for perfectly good reasons in a very weak legal position with respect to the providers of those products.

I ask the Minister to consider, as the Bill proceeds to the other place, whether a couple of legislative changes could be made. I am not in a position—this is not the proper context—to draft amendments, but I hope that the Minister will at least reflect on the idea of making a couple of changes to protect the many people who may want to take advantage of the provisions. One change could provide that any contract for funding under an ijara scheme should allow the party receiving those funds to repay them at any time during the term of the arrangement. The other could ensure that the party receiving the funds had the same protection as that afforded to a mortgagor on realisation of security by a mortgage. These are technical and legal points, which I ask the Minister to reflect on. They are mentioned in the spirit of attempting, at this late stage, further to improve a Bill that we strongly support in principle.

Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): May I begin on a personal note as a new Member of the House? This is the first Bill for which I have been present for all House of Commons stages. I have to say that, if this is what to expect, passing law is a somewhat more painless and quicker process than I was previously led to believe. I take note of the Minister's comments about the Bill's passage possibly being a record. I certainly do not intend to go on for long and threaten any speed records for legislation passing through the House. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I thought that that would be a popular remark. I have also noted the point that the greater the all-party support, the greater the scrutiny that legislation deserves. However, I think that the Bill has received adequate, if brief, scrutiny.

The Bill has been welcomed by all parties. As I said on Second Reading, I represent a constituency with a lot of property-rich but cash-poor people. They are faced with many increased costs such as higher council tax, and welcome the opportunity for equity release. As my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) said, parents with children in higher education also find that some sort of equity release can be beneficial.

The key, however, is how the FSA will enforce the Bill. Its role has been discussed as the Bill has made its way through the House, as has the tension that appears to exist between Treasury Ministers and the Prime Minister. Treasury Ministers often say that the FSA is one of the best regulators in the world. I do not necessarily disagree, but on 26 May the Prime Minister said in a speech that there is "something seriously awry when the FSA, established to provide clear guidelines and rules for the financial services sector and to protect the consumer against the fraudulent, is seen as hugely inhibiting of efficient business by perfectly respectable companies that have never defrauded anyone."

In Committee, the Economic Secretary took a skilful line in trying to reconcile that with the position of the Chancellor and other Treasury Ministers, who have said that the FSA is wonderful, world class and the envy of the world. He remarked that some people saw the FSA as the Prime Minister had described and that it was inevitable that the regulated would so perceive the regulator.

The perception that the FSA inhibits business is, however, a serious matter, because such a perception can drive away business and reduce innovation, and the Prime Minister was right to identify that concern. We should all recognise that, whatever the reality, the perception of the FSA is significant.

The FSA adopts a risk-based approach. That is to be welcomed, but it means that FSA employees tend to err on the side of caution and follow the box-ticking route. As the Prime Minister also said:

"The regulator who fails to regulate risk that materialises will be castigated. How many are rewarded when they refuse to regulate and take the risk?"

That is one of the difficulties with the FSA. Whatever is said at the top of the organisation, FSA staff will always err on the side of caution. My concern is that the financial services sector as a whole might become too heavily regulated, with rules that are too strict and enforced too rigidly. That concern is widespread in the City and in the financial services sector, despite what the Economic Secretary has said while the Bill has passed through Parliament.

Finally, we must be aware of how the FSA treats the financial services sector, and of the dangers of overregulation that we face in this country.

5.34 pm

Mr. Ivan Lewis: With the leave of the House, I should like to reply to the debate.

First, may I say that the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) has applied himself to this debate with common sense, as he does to every debate? That is probably why he is not a candidate for the leadership of his party. However, I want to let him into a secret: the first chairman of the FSA was a Manchester City supporter, and the current chairman is one too. Given that the club has just decided to swap Shaun Wright-Phillips for Andy Cole, it is possible that we could do with that expertise to advise us in the boardroom.

I should also like to tell the hon. Gentleman that, when he identified the song that was No. 1 in the charts on the day of my birth, the Paymaster General asked that he do a similar job for her during the recess and report back when the House resumes. I am sure that he will agree to undertake that job.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. We have gone from football to the pop charts, so let us now get back to the motion before the House.

Mr. Lewis: I accept your wise counsel, as ever, Madam Deputy Speaker; but, seriously, I thank the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster for his constructive approach to what is a consensual Bill.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) raised a reasonable issue about property investment clubs. When he spoke about the glossy leaflets offering obscure information, strange telephone numbers and dodgy advice that were being delivered, it brought to mind the "Focus" leaflets that are distributed in many of our constituencies—but I will not go there, Madam Deputy Speaker, in view of the advice that you have given to me.

On a serious point, the FSA is considering the concerns about those property investment clubs and will, of course, take appropriate action, if necessary, and advise Ministers accordingly.

I want to respond to the hon. Gentleman's comments on ijara products generally and the danger of unintended consequences. Obviously, I do not ignore his concerns, but it is important to say that those schemes are legal and already in use. In those circumstances, the FSA regulations will ensure that consumers benefit from full and clear advice. Despite the danger of unintended consequences, that is undoubtedly a significant step forward, although we will keep an eye on the concerns that he has expressed.

The hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) tends to move about during debates—he was nearly called twice on one occasion recently, as a consequence of such a manoeuvre. He referred to the FSA. It is important that we are clear about the fact that this is not a complex issue: the FSA is regarded globally as a world leader, but does that mean that it is perfect or that it need not engage in the Government's better regulation agenda, as other regulators must do? Of course it does not mean that.

Do we accept that there is always a concern in any organisation that the principles and objectives articulated at the most senior level do not always play further down the organisation in terms of day-to-day interactions? That is a genuine, authentic concern. The management of any significant organisation of any nature, whether in the public sector or the private sector, must have regard for that concern. It is important that the objectives and principles that apply in respect of that organisation's leadership are also reflected in the day-to-day dealings between the regulator and those who are regulated.

The hon. Gentleman's overall point was about those in the financial services choosing to invest in this country. The FSA has arguably contributed to the fact that the financial services sector continues to regard this country as almost the best place in which to do business. Far from detracting from that, the fact that we have leading regulatory practice in the financial services sector makes this country a very attractive place to do business. Yes, we need to continue to ensure that the better regulation agenda applies. We do not want to be smug or complacent because the FSA has rightly earned global respect. Equally, we do not want to face false and bogus choices. We should not suggest that, on one hand, the FSA is somehow not doing its job in the most effective manner possible, while on the other, not recognising the fact that we must achieve the right balance between consumer protection and not stifling innovation and enterprise in the financial services sector. Thus far, the FSA has maintained that balance reasonably well, and we should support the work that it does.

The FSA does a lot of important work on behalf of this country in responding to regulations emanating from the European Union. Our partnership with the FSA is important in that respect because much of the regulation in the financial services sector flows from the EU rather than from domestic legislation. It is extremely important that the Government and the FSA have a constructive relationship in ensuring that this country's vision of an appropriate landscape for financial services regulation is the one that prevails in any argument that arises, not only at EU level, but in the international or global economy.

Now that I have responded to the points made during the debate, let me say a little about why the Bill is important and why putting it on the statute book is justified. We believe that its provisions will help people to make informed choices, offer valuable consumer protection and ensure that there is a level playing field in the equity release market, most of which already falls within the scope of FSA mortgage regulation.

FSA regulation will extend valuable consumer protections to elderly consumers when they are making one of the most important financial decisions that they are likely to take—a point that has not been mentioned in the debate. It will ensure that Muslim consumers are able to access all elements of the growing market in sharia-compliant home finance products while benefiting from the protections afforded by FSA regulation. It will also help people to make informed choices about the home finance products they purchase, create a level regulatory playing field in the equity release market and, by helping to improve consumer confidence in such products, facilitate future market growth. On that basis, I am pleased to commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

Appropriation (No. 3) Act 2005.

Finance (No. 2) Act 2005.

Summer Adjournment

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

5.42 pm

Mr. Fraser Kemp (Houghton and Washington, East) (Lab): I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for giving me this opportunity to speak in our summer Adjournment debate, not least because for the past four years I have been subject to an enforced, but enjoyable, silence in the Government Whips Office.

Today, I shall highlight some issues affecting my constituency and the wider city to which it belongs. That city is also ably represented by my hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland, North (Bill Etherington), for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) and for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Mrs. Hodgson). I shall also take the opportunity to promote the city of Sunderland and Wearside in general and to tell the House about a dynamic city that has transformed itself in recent years.

Last month, Sunderland launched a major marketing campaign asking people to see the city in a new light. Much of the credit for the city's transformation in the past 20 years goes to the leader of the city council, Bob Symonds. Twenty years ago, we were facing the closure of our mining industry and the decline of shipbuilding, but we have moved from a position of decline and managing decline to one of managing progress. That is a big difference. A few decades ago, it would have stretched credulity to say that Sunderland could be one of the UK's great places for inward investment—people would not have believed it. Now, however, we have achieved astonishing change, both economically and culturally.

Sunderland, I remind hon. Members, is the biggest city between Leeds and Edinburgh—a fact that is often forgotten. There was bad news at Longbridge earlier in the year, but the city plays host to the most successful car plant in Europe. This week, the workers at Nissan learned not only that they are the most productive workers in Europe but that their plant is more productive than any plant in the United States. Time and again in recent years Nissan has demonstrated its ability to win contracts to build new models, so I pay tribute to the managing director, Colin Dodge, and the work force. On behalf of the work force and the company I thank the Government for their support for research and development, which has ensured that those models are built in the UK. If anyone wants to drive a truly British car they can, in a Nissan.

Young people in my constituency have achieved much. Again, there has been a big transformation. I am proud to report that with the creation of children's centres, the opening of seven new primary schools in the past eight years, and the building of three new secondary schools in the next few years, we can offer full wraparound education. A great deal of investment has gone into education, which is making a difference in any area that has suffered from underachievement by many young people. Wearside was chosen last year as one of the top five places for business investment by leading accountants KPMG. To reinforce that choice, the area accounts for 12.5 per cent. of the population of the northern region yet produces 25 per cent. of its gross domestic product.

We are drawing up plans to ensure that we are the leading intelligence city within the UK. In my constituency, there are thousands of new jobs coming on stream at Rainton Bridge. We have invested in infrastructure, and are starting to see the benefits. Sunderland was recently included in the world's top seven IT-intelligent communities by world opinion leaders. The key to that success is not just the people in the area but the partnership between the public and private sectors. We have taken steps to make that happen—we are not just planning for today but making sure that we put plans in place for the next five, 10 and 15 years. It has always been necessary to plan for the future, and that has never been more so than in today's global economic environment. The old ways, the old rules and the old expectations about the economy do not apply any more.

Those are the wider Wearside issues that I wanted to bring to the attention of the House, but I also think that a couple of local groups in the constituency are worthy of mention. The Square Root group, whose members are predominantly women, has raised hundreds of thousands of pounds in the past couple of years to transform a derelict eyesore at the heart of that former mining community of Herrington Burn into landscaped gardens and play facilities for children. It is a great example of people power, and an inspiration to many in my constituency, including me, showing what people can do to transform a derelict area.

Wearside Women in Need, a dedicated organisation led by Clare Philpson, gives support to victims of domestic violence. It also undertakes imaginative work with domestic violence offenders. It has transformed and, in some cases, saved the lives of many families and individuals in desperate circumstances. A great deal more needs to be done, however, and I urge the Deputy Leader of the House of Commons to tell the Home Secretary that any additional resources that can be provided to tackle the scourge of domestic violence would make a good and positive contribution.

It is easy for politicians to condemn young people and categorise them as yobs and so on but, equally, there are many shining examples, including young Grant Hollis, a pupil at Houghton Kepier school, who represents my constituency in the Youth Parliament. He does excellent work representing to me and the city council the views and aspirations of young people in the city.

On local democracy, I urge the Minister, in consultation with others, to ensure that in next year's local council elections we have the opportunity to do what we have done for many years—that is, to vote by post. To the best of my knowledge there have been no problems with that in the city of Sunderland, and in many areas it has doubled the turnout. Anyone who believes in democracy and is a confirmed democrat must be encouraged so that we can double turnout.

Those are some of the issues that I wanted to mention, and I am grateful for the opportunity to do so. There has been a big transformation in the area, and I hope that the Minister will take on board the points that I have made.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind all hon. Members that Mr. Speaker has imposed an eight-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

5.50 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I always welcome the pre-Adjournment debate as a valuable opportunity for Back Benchers to raise issues. I am sorry that it is so abbreviated today and that we do not have enough time for all those who wish to be called. It is therefore not appropriate to take a panoramic view of the world and its problems in the short time available. It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington, East (Mr. Kemp), who extolled the virtues of the city of Sunderland. I am pleased that he now has the chance to do so vocally, rather than being constrained by the office of Whip.

I propose to use the opportunity unashamedly to raise matters in my constituency, and it would be inappropriate if I were to abuse my position on the Front Bench and take longer than the time allocated to Back Benchers, so I propose to stay within the limit. There are three issues of great importance to my constituency that I wish to raise. One is the still-awaited new Victoria hospital in Frome. I am getting increasingly worried that the hospital, which was promised back in 1998 and should have been completed years ago, is still so far from completion—indeed, it is still a greenfield site. I am having a meeting on the subject with the local primary care trust next week, but I remind Ministers that if we do not get a satisfactory solution, I shall raise the matter after we return from the summer recess.

Another problem is the A303—a recurrent problem for local residents, both in safety terms and in traffic noise terms, particularly at this time of year, when the A303 carries an enormous amount of traffic bound for the south-west of England. However, I shall spend the bulk of my time on a very local issue, the water supply to the village of Witham Friary in my constituency. I do so for two reasons; first, because I have had a prolonged dialogue on the subject with the clerk to Witham Friary parish council, Deborah Ligatt, and with members of the parish council and other residents, and secondly, and to me equally importantly, because I live in Witham Friary, as do my family, and we are directly affected. I therefore have a direct interest, which I declare.

We are unusual in that our water supply is provided by the Duke of Somerset's estate. It is a private water supply. It is not connected to the large water companies. Although in many ways that is a satisfactory arrangement, in other ways it is becoming less satisfactory, and increasingly so over recent years. We have had problems with the quality of supply because of contamination. We have a particular difficulty because there is a thin layer of greensand that provides the filter, with the result that there is often bacterial and other contamination of the supply. The other consequence is that the water is highly acidic, which means that it contains a lot of dissolved metals—iron and copper, and we hope not lead, but we have to be careful about old piping.

The imminent difficulty is that the Environment Agency has applied a daily extraction limit of 193 cu m on the water supply, which theoretically is enough for our needs, but in practice, because of very substantial leakage from the old main, is far from adequate. As a result, there have been interruptions in supply for all the residents in the village. The interruptions have caused difficulty and inconvenience to those who need their domestic supply and could lead to public health problems. However, the situation is catastrophic for those who rely on the water supply for their agricultural undertakings. Dairy farmers around the village are finding it difficult to water their livestock due to the interruptions of supply.

The estate is trying to rectify the problem. It has addressed the water quality by undertaking to replace the limestone bed of the reservoir and starting to fit alarm telemetry and automated systems. However, we have a real problem with supply. We need to replace the cast-iron main and the spurs from it. The alternative is to add water from the water companies to the supply, but Bristol Water has indicated that it would cost £400,000 for it to provide water to our supply. Such a proposition is completely beyond what would be reasonable for the Duke of Somerset's estate. Wessex Water simply says that it would be unable to provide additional water.

The problem that we face is that no one seems to have any responsibility for maintaining water supply in the event of the failure of a private supply. I am not criticising the Duke of Somerset's estate because it has assiduously tried to find a solution. It has been helpful and has discussed the matter frequently with local residents. However, we are not only exasperated by the lack of progress, but worried about what could happen in the future. We have found no reference to an obligation to maintain supply through our research. The regulatory authorities enforce the requirement to maintain water quality for reasons of environmental health, but if a water supply fails, it appears that no one can take appropriate action. There is a big question about what will happen if the estate is unable to fund the new main that is needed, or if it is unwilling to do so. It is to the credit of the estate that it has given no indication that it will walk away from the water supply to the village, but who would stop it doing so? If it walked away, what would be the consequences for the village?

A possible solution to the problem would be to drill an additional borehole. The parish council and my researchers have gone to various authorities to find out who could assist us, but we have been passed from Department to Department. We approached Ofwat, but it told us that we were classed as "resale customers" and that it had no responsibility for such customers. It suggested that we should examine our written agreements for water supply, but we have no such written agreements. The supply has been there since the year dot. We just get the water supplied from the reservoir up the hill, so there is no written agreement about the quantity or quality of the supply. Although the Environment Agency has regulatory functions to avoid contamination and prevent unnecessary extraction, it appears that it has no responsibility to maintain supply. Government Departments have no interest in the matter, so we are in a quandary about exactly what we can do to ensure that the village—albeit a fairly small one—does not eventually have no water. Most people would accept that that would be entirely unsatisfactory.

A meeting is being held on 3 August to consider possible funding for a new borehole. Will the Minister take what I have said back to Ministers in the Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and ask them what assistance they can give to us? I have already written to them, but this is a desperate matter for the people whom I represent and my neighbours, so I want to be able to help them.

5.59 pm

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East) (Lab): Before the House adjourns for the recess, I ask hon. Members to consider the need for action to prevent nuclear proliferation, following the disastrous failure of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty review conference in New York two months ago.

The NPT came into force 35 years ago and is built on three pillars: first, it prevents proliferation by stopping states that do not have nuclear weapons acquiring them, and by preventing states that already have nuclear weapons from acquiring more; secondly, it obliges states that have nuclear weapons to disarm; and, thirdly, it enables nuclear technology to be used peacefully.

The NPT is subject to a review conference every five years. The review conference in 2000 was widely viewed as a success—it adopted a 13-step programme for the total elimination of the nuclear arsenals of the nuclear weapons states.

If it was important to make progress in 2000, a quick glance at events since then tells us that it was crucial to make progress in 2005: in December 2003, Libya revealed that it had been working for years on a secret nuclear weapons programme; in January 2003, North Korea announced its withdrawal from the NPT; and in February 2005, North Korea announced that it had manufactured nuclear weapons. Furthermore, the International Atomic Energy Agency has found and declared uranium-enrichment activity in Iran and the AQ Khan trafficking network has been exposed. Despite some progress on disarmament, the UN has stated that the world contains approximately 27,000 nuclear weapons. World awareness of the importance of keeping nuclear materials out of the hands of terrorists has risen exponentially since the review conference in 2000.

The non-proliferation treaty regimes have not kept pace with the world situation, and the conference on disarmament and the UN disarmament commission have both been fruitless for years. Against that background, one would have expected a degree of urgency as delegates met for the 2005 NPT review conference. It was an opportunity to put things back on track, to ensure that the tools that we have to prevent proliferation work, to impose disarmament and to enable peaceful nuclear technology that is fit for purpose, but that is not what happened. Nearly two thirds of the 26 days of the conference were taken up with deliberations over logistics—it took 10 days to agree an agenda. Rather than agreeing vital measures to strengthen the non-proliferation regime, the conference concluded with no substantive agreement whatsoever.

The NPT was an agreement between the five states that already had nuclear weapons and the states that did not. The non-nuclear states pledged not to acquire nuclear weapons, in return for which the nuclear weapons states committed to disarming their nuclear weapons capabilities. The fact that that deal at the heart of the NPT remains unmet is an important part of the background to the difficulties encountered at the review conference in May. The nuclear weapons states are seen to be half-hearted about their side of the NPT bargain and to have resisted attempts to focus attention on their disarmament obligations.

The current security climate has understandably led to calls for a tougher non-proliferation regime for non-nuclear weapons states. While we nuclear weapons states are perceived as disengaged from our side of the NPT deal, however, there is the danger that our insistence on non-proliferation will not carry adequate credibility with the non-nuclear states.

The stalemate in New York was depressing and alarming in equal measure, but it did not detract from the importance of the NPT and the need to strengthen the NPT's mechanisms and operations. We must make progress in many areas—several credible proposals have been suggested, and I shall briefly outline five of them.

First, we must achieve the universal adoption of the IAEA's additional protocol, which is designed to ensure that states cannot divert fissile material to secret weapons programmes. In the parlance used in the field, the additional protocol must become the new standard for verifying compliance with non-proliferation commitments.

Secondly, we should adopt the IAEA proposals for incentives for countries to forgo the development of fuel-cycle facilities. The supply of the necessary fuel for peaceful energy uses would be guaranteed, possibly with the IAEA as guarantor, in return for which states would pledge not to develop domestic uranium-enrichment or plutonium-separation capabilities.

Thirdly, we must secure a fissile material cut-off treaty to halt the further production of plutonium and weapons-grade uranium, and I welcome the UK Government's pledge to work for progress in that field.

Fourthly, we must see the early introduction of the comprehensive test ban treaty, pending which all countries must affirm their commitment to a moratorium on testing. To the Government's credit, the UK signed that treaty in 1998, but it can come into force only when all five nuclear weapons states, and all states with civil nuclear reactors, have signed. Eleven such states, including China and the United States, have still not made that commitment.

Fifthly, disarmament is one of the three pillars of the non-proliferation treaty, and it is essential that progress be made on the elimination of all nuclear weapons, as agreed by the NPT states, including the UK, at the review conference in 2000.

Before the House is due to return from the summer recess, there will be a meeting of Heads of State and Government and a high plenary level event at the UN General Assembly in New York in September. United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan has published a report for decision by the world's leaders at that summit, which makes key recommendations concerning all three pillars of the NPT. In this month's communiqué on non-proliferation, the G8 welcomed the attention given to that subject in the Secretary-General's report and declared themselves ready to engage actively at the September summit.

I am glad that my hon. Friend and constituency neighbour, the Deputy Leader of the House, is replying to the debate, and I hope that he will convey this request to his colleagues in the Government: I urge the British Government to do all they can to secure a positive outcome for the people of this country and the world.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): I am grateful to have the opportunity to raise three local issues that affect the quality of life in my constituency. They are not unique to my constituency; they probably affect all of us. Indeed, some of them have been raised before.

The first is the planning system, and how it applies to Travellers, in particular, who want to develop encampments, especially in the green belt. My constituency—and, I am sure, the constituencies of many other hon. Members—is almost under siege from multiple applications by Travellers. The villages of Crockenhill, Swanley, Hextable, West Kingsdown, Knockholt and Halstead have been inundated with applications.

The applications are not, in the most part, made by those who like to claim that they enjoy the itinerant lifestyle, in which they may be impoverished but are free to pursue their own way of life, moving on from site to site. In the main, when investigated, the applicants turn out to have formidable assets and bank accounts, and in many cases to own property in the constituency already. They are simply people who are trying to build on the green belt where farmland happens to be cheap—precisely because it is in the green belt, so people should not be able to build on it—in an area with easy access to the motorway system.

Our district councils seem almost defenceless now. When they rule against Travellers their decisions are often overturned by the Secretary of State on appeal. The cases are prolonged by legal posturing. Many of the applications are retrospective, and those applicants will do everything possible to prolong the determination process. Now we are told that they are covered by a definition of Travellers as some sort of special reserved minority group.

I have raised that issue before, and I raised it specifically during business questions three or four weeks ago. I am sure that it is only an oversight that the natural courtesy of the Leader of the House and his deputy has not led to my receiving a reply. The Government have undertaken to review the planning system in relation to Travellers, and I asked when we would see the results of that review, and when we could expect the Government to come to the aid of district councils to protect our residents against those who simply want to abuse the normal planning procedures and the green belt.

The second matter to which I want to draw the attention of the House is one that I find hard to describe. It is a related issue, concerning the subdivision and marketing of plots of farmland to the naive, who purchase them at very low cost under the mistaken impression that they may one day be able to obtain planning permission on them.

There are two examples in my constituency—a field opposite London road in the village of Dunton Green, and a field opposite Hale Oak road in the village of Sevenoaks Weald. Clearly, unscrupulous operators are marketing those plots to the naive, and I do not think that we can simply leave everything to the principle of caveat emptor. So far as I understand it, the only Government response has been to empower councils to serve article 4 notices direct on the land, so that anyone who visits the plot that they are about to purchase or considering purchasing will be aware that the district council is unlikely ever to grant planning permission on it. That is not enough. What happens now is that the plots, once bought, are staked out and sub-divided. Different entrances are created from the road into the field concerned, and before we know where we are local residents, instead of looking at a piece of farmland, look at what appears to be the start of a building site. It seems that the law needs updating, and, if the Minister cannot answer the point tonight, I should be grateful if he wrote to me.

I have nine railway stations in my constituency, some of them major, such as Sevenoaks and Swanley, others smaller and well used to commute to London, and others smaller still and unmanned. A useful report published today by the National Audit Office looks at the condition of our railway stations, and I am speaking not of our major terminuses but of the ordinary, humdrum stations that each of us has in our constituencies. There are two issues.

Unmanned stations seem rapidly to be disappearing into a state of disrepair and vandalism. The issue is: who is responsible for them? The length of the leases given to train operating companies is clearly not sufficient for them to invest substantial sums in the upkeep and improvement of the security of stations. I am at a loss to understand who is responsible for that. Is it Network Rail, or the Strategic Rail Authority, or the Department of Transport? I should be grateful if the Deputy Leader commented on that.

Related to that, and far more alarming, is the proposal by South Eastern Trains to de-man—if that is the right word—some of the stations that are manned at the moment. The proposal is to remove ticket office staff altogether and convert stations that were manned into unmanned stations. I must ask whether the House considers this the right time to be removing staff from stations. To whom are people supposed to report suspicious packages if there are no staff on the station? From whom can they seek assistance, particularly if they are women travelling alone at night who may need it? Again, an excellent report from the NAO, which I commend to the House, raises that issue of who is responsible for the upkeep and security of our railway station network, and I should be grateful if the Deputy Leader answered that point.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West) (Lab): It is a pleasure, as always, to follow the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon). One of the issues that I want to raise relates entirely to the South Eastern Trains plan to reduce booking office hours and clerks across south-east London and Kent.

Consultation recently concluded on that ludicrous proposal. As I understand it, it now resides with the Strategic Rail Authority to determine whether it should go ahead. Intriguingly, when South Eastern Trains notified the London transport users committee and the rail passengers committee for southern England of the proposals, it said:

> "Should this go unchallenged, it will take effect."

I do not know anybody who has written in support of those ludicrous proposals, whether from my constituency or the broader area. The company was, I think, being somewhat optimistic in imagining it would get away with its subterfuge.

The reasons for the proposal elude everybody—my constituents and others. The chair of London transport users committee, Mr. Brian Cooke, said that it was > "one of the daftest proposals we have seen from a Train Operator."

Mr. Mark Woodbridge, regional director of the regional passenger committee for southern England, said:

> "The upside for passengers as a direct consequence of these proposals has not been demonstrated by SET. Passengers do not like stations unmanned, preferring the human touch, seeking help and advice when needed and having a perception that someone is in control"— the very point that the hon. Member for Sevenoaks made—

> "and looking after their welfare. Replacing people with machines is not the way forward as they do not offer the full range of tickets and cannot provide the human interface or advice that passengers demand."

Machines cannot deal with such matters in these days of ever more complex fare structures—special offers, awaydays, Apex fares and so on.

The hon. Member for Sevenoaks mentioned the absence of staff at railway stations—I think he said that it affects nine stations in his constituency. In my area, it affects Catford Bridge, Catford, Beckenham Hill, Bellingham and Lower Sydenham, which are in my constituency, and Penge East and Sydenham Hill, which, although just over my boundary, are used by many of my constituents. Even stations that are that close to central London will be abandoned for all but three hours a day. There will be no human presence there—nobody to give advice or guidance, and no reassuring presence. They will become another part of the public realm that we leave at risk from those indulging in antisocial behaviour and that normal, decent, law-abiding citizens will feel unsafe in using.

I hope that Members will consider early-day motion 447, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Gwyn Prosser), which details all these issues. Its 25 signatories cover every part of the London, south-east and Kent franchises. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will persuade the Strategic Rail Authority to throw these stupid proposals into the bin where they belong.

The other issue that I wish to raise, as a London Member, is that of the Olympics coming to London in 2012. Hon. Members will be aware that we had been due to debate the London Olympics Bill today until the sad news on Sunday of the death of Sir Edward Heath. I never had a great deal to do with Sir Edward, but he was always immensely kind and considerate to me, as I am sure he was to everyone else who came across him. [Interruption.] Perhaps some Conservative Members do not share that view, but I will not pursue that.

I pay tribute to all involved in the Olympic bid. It was a tragedy—not as tragic as the events of 7 July—that their great achievement in Singapore should so quickly have been diluted by the events of the following morning. They were disappointed not to get the homecoming that they deserved, but there are seven years between now and the games, and I am certain that we will see how they build on the progress that has been made so far.

At the time of the announcement, I was regarded as something of a sceptic, as is proved by my response in Hansard to the statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport some 18 months ago. Since then, however, I, like millions of fellow citizens, have been won over by the enthusiasm, imagination, innovation and sheer temerity, in some ways, of the bid put together by all those involved. Now, we need to work not only on providing the games but on ensuring the greatest possible benefit across the country—an enduring legacy, not only for London, after the games have gone in 2012. As a contribution to that, I suggest to the Department for Transport and/or Transport for London that when the Channel tunnel high-speed rail link comes through to St. Pancras, we should rename either St. Pancras or Stratford station, "London Olympic". That would be rather like London Waterloo, in that it would endure for many years, long after the games are gone and forgotten.

In conclusion, and on a more serious note, I seek the indulgence of the House in mentioning one of my constituents and an extremely good friend—Iain Hepplewhite. He is well known to many Labour Members, and others, and to many members of the Press Gallery. He was the parliamentary Labour party's press officer for many years and worked for the Deputy Prime Minister—as he then was not—before going on to be head of press at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and head of communications at the Department of Trade and Industry. He then became head of communications at the Film Council. Less than six months ago, he was diagnosed with an especially aggressive and rapacious intestinal and stomach cancer. The treatment that he received was excellent but unavailing. Yesterday, he returned to his native north-east to be with his parents. He will be 39 next Sunday.

In my experience, the House is a much more generous and sensitive place than some would have us believe. I hope that all hon. Members will join me in sending our very best wishes and thoughts to Iain and his family for whatever may lie ahead.

Mr. Shailesh Vara (North-West Cambridgeshire) (Con): Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to make my maiden speech.

My constituency, North-West Cambridgeshire, is relatively new, having been created in 1997, and I am only its second Member of Parliament. However, the area that the constituency covers has a long and distinguished history and many eminent people have left their footprints in its soil. My immediate predecessor was Sir Brian Mawhinney, recently ennobled and now Lord Mawhinney. He is a formidable politician. He was diligent, conscientious, hard working and always put the interests of his constituents first. He was fortunate and privileged to serve in high office, including as Secretary of State for Transport and chairman of the Conservative party. Despite all the pressures that high office brings, he always found time for his constituents.

I am sure that Lord Mawhinney will continue to be involved in local affairs, especially as his title is Lord Mawhinney of Peterborough. When he was a Member of Parliament, one of his passions was supporting the local football team, which is affectionately known as "The Posh". As he is now chairman of the Football League, I suspect that, on at least some Saturdays, he will be found on the terraces of other football clubs.

Before 1997, some 60 per cent. of my constituency was part of the former Huntingdon constituency, where the Member of Parliament was the former Prime Minister, Sir John Major. Sir John and Dame Norma continue to live locally and remain involved in several local concerns, especially charitable interests. Given Sir John's love of cricket, hon. Members will not be surprised to hear that on the odd Saturday he can be found at a local cricket match, and Dame Norma holds an annual charity cricket match in support of Mencap.

A third former Member of Parliament, Lord Renton, lives in my constituency. Hon. Members know that I do not exaggerate when I say that he is one of the most charming men in the Palace of Westminster. Soon to be 97, and still active in another place, he is the president of the Association of Conservative Peers. I am grateful for all the kindness and support that all three previous Members have shown me. It is usual for a new Member to have one former Member of Parliament looking over his shoulder to ascertain what he is—and perhaps sometimes is not—doing. Occasionally, there are two former Members. However, it is rare to have three former Members of Parliament looking over one's shoulder—and such an eminent trio at that.

My constituency covers the southern part of Peterborough, south of the River Nene, and some villages and towns that go down to, but not including, Huntingdon. Peterborough is characterised by rapid expansion. Several people there commute regularly to nearby places. The expansion is best typified by an area known as the Hamptons, where it is proposed to build thousands of houses. The major challenge will be to ensure that the house building is matched by the appropriate infrastructure.

Moving south in the constituency, there are picturesque villages such as Hamerton, which has some 30 houses, and Sawtry, Yaxley, Warboys and Ramsey, which have a few thousand residents. The abiding theme in the southern part of the constituency is that it is of a rural nature. One particular concern for my local farmers is the proposed reduction in European quotas for sugar beet, and I, for one, will be vigorously taking up their interests wherever that is necessary.

I was recently fortunate to be one of the 20 Members chosen in the ballot for private Members' Bills, and I propose to attempt to introduce a Bill on breast cancer screening for women. At present, women between the ages of 50 and 70 receive a notice from their local hospital inviting them for a screening. I propose to try to change that so that women between the ages of 45 and 75 are covered. The logic is that women are now living longer and healthier lives, and it seems sensible to acknowledge that by covering a higher age group. And of course, we all know that women below 50 suffer from breast cancer, as well as those over that age. I would have thought that prevention was better than cure. Let us not forget that we are not simply talking about the one in nine women who suffer from breast cancer; we are also talking about their families and friends, and that involves a huge number of people. I very much hope that the Government will give my private Member's Bill due consideration.

Many years ago, I remember watching Prime Minister's questions on television with my parents. I said to them, "I hope that one day I will be on those green Benches." For this Ugandan-born Indian, and Britain's first Gujarati Member of Parliament, a dream has certainly come true. I am particularly pleased that my parents are watching this today, not from the other side of a television screen but from the Public Gallery. Madam Deputy Speaker, you can tell from the look on their faces that my parents, Lakhman and Savita Vara, are delighted to be here rather than on the other side of a screen.

There can be no better privilege for anyone than to represent their fellow citizens in this, the mother of Parliaments, and I am deeply grateful to the people of North-West Cambridgeshire for affording me the opportunity to represent them here. They are wonderful people and it is a lovely constituency. Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to speak today. I also thank the other right hon. and hon. Members here for extending the usual courtesies to one who is making a maiden speech.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara) on making such a moving maiden speech. He talked about all the former Members of Parliament who reside in his constituency—he will not be short of advice, that is for sure. May I say, as someone who is also of Indian descent—I was born in India of Punjabi descent and I share the same cultural spirit as the hon. Gentleman—that it is a great pleasure for me to follow him? I wish him many happy years in the House and I wish his constituents well. I am sure that he will serve them with great spirit.

I want to use today's debate to highlight an aspect of competition law with which the Deputy Leader of the House might be familiar, given that he was previously a Minister in the Department of Trade and Industry. It concerns the Office of Fair Trading's recent consultation on newspaper and magazine distribution. This is a matter of concern to me and, I am sure, to other hon. Members.

If I wanted a newspaper or a magazine, I would go to my local newsagent or a corner shop to purchase one. Alternatively, I could order one, be it the Financial Times, the Daily Sport, or whatever interested me. The reason that we are able to get such newspapers locally is that the present distribution system enables us to purchase them everywhere, from supermarkets to local newsagents. The local papers that serve my area, such as the Evening Gazette and The Northern Echo, have also benefited from the unique distribution arrangement.

The Evening Gazette, printed in Middlesbrough, goes to some 550 individual outlets across Teesside and parts of north Yorkshire. The vast majority of those are purely local and far removed from the high street. Its editor tells me that only 11.1 per cent. of its sales come from copies purchased in the big supermarkets. The overwhelming majority of its sales come from local newsagents, convenience stores, service stations and corner shops.

That arrangement is possible only because of a long-standing agreement between the publishers of the country's newspapers and magazines and a small number of distributors. The system works. Unlike most specialist retailers, newsagents have been a great success story. In 1995, there were 45,000 newsagents in the UK. There are now 54,000. Inevitably, however, the supermarket chains seem to want to crush this system, accusing it of being anti-competitive. They want to set up their own exclusive delivery system for magazines. They want a distribution system that would corner the lucrative mass market in the magazines that they sell.

The OFT is examining this issue, although there is no trace whatever of any popular desire among the people of this country for change to the current system. At the moment, the demand from supermarkets is for liberalisation only in the sale of magazines. The existing big distributors, however, carry magazines and newspapers together. They are not separate entities living in separate markets—they are both printed words on paper. They are distributed through a system that ensures equality of access. Breaking up that arrangement and allowing the supermarkets to stitch up exclusive deals with distribution firms of their own choosing will have devastating effects. It will mean that the costs for all remaining distributors will rise if they are left to supply only newspapers and a few magazines to local newsagents and corner shops. It will mean that the distribution of newsprint to small villages, small towns and small shops could no longer be subsidised by sales to high street giants and out-of-town superstores.

I see that as a direct attack on the availability of news information and comment to the community. It will certainly affect my constituency, which consists of small towns, villages and outlying estates. All of those are served by thriving newsagents and good entrepreneurs in small shopkeepers. I wonder whether a newsprint distribution system will be willing to incur the costs of delivery to some of the small settlements in my constituency. How will they be able to take a small number of papers to tiny pockets of villages such as Skinningrove, Charltons or Carlin How if they cannot be supported by bulk sales to a supermarket? At that point, distributors might start to demand delivery charges, which most small shopkeepers will be unable to bear. If those shops are driven out of the newspaper market, local papers such as those serving my constituency will also feel the dual impact of lost sales and a declining readership. That will affect everyone in this country.

Local newspapers are a bastion of democracy in this country. As Members of the House, we might not always like what they say and might mutter about some of the letters that they carry, but they genuinely represent democracy and the free exchange of news and information in a local area. The possible options proposed by the OFT could act as a way of killing those organs of democracy. We should prevent that. News and information are not mere commodities that should be traded like jam and potatoes. Local papers and the ability to buy them are key requisites of a good, ordered and civilised society. The OFT cannot be allowed to kill off such an important function.

The Deputy Leader of the House should talk to his colleagues in the Department for Trade and Industry and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. I have written to them and they have—obliquely—taken in my concerns. I realise that they are in a difficult position because consultation is still under way, but I am still concerned, as are my local newspaper editors and newspaper managers. They are all equally horrified. They are all worried about the future of their local papers and their ability to reach out to a wide membership.

I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will take what I have said seriously. He has always done so in the past.

6.35 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara) on his magnificent maiden speech. He spoke without notes, with great hand movements, with tremendous conviction, and with a wide knowledge of his constituency at a very early stage. I know I speak for everyone in the House when I wish him well for the future. He has a very bright future.

I have a shopping list for the Deputy Leader of the House. On a number of occasions, he will have heard me raise the plight of my constituent Maajid Nawaz, who, along with two other Brits, has been detained in a Cairo prison for three and a half years. Very recently, Maajid Nawaz and the other two British detainees witnessed the beating of another prisoner. They went to his assistance, and were then attacked themselves. Those three British detainees are now in the second week of a hunger strike. Mrs. Abi Nawaz, who came to my surgery recently, is extremely worried, and I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will do what he can to persuade the Foreign Office to deal with what is currently a dire situation.

I agonised about going public on the next issue that I intend to raise, but the family involved have now insisted that I do so. Last December Phil Collings, who was 20 years old, died outside Talk nightclub. The incident took place outside the club. One assailant held Phil around the neck, and the other held him from the front. The two men were arrested. One was the son of a police officer. I am advised by the family that the police never informed the pathologist who carried out the post mortem that Phil had suffered a blow. The result of the post mortem was therefore that he had died of natural causes. The family are not at all happy with the Crown Prosecution Service, which says it has decided to take no action. I have tried quietly to deal with Departments.

The family have now insisted that I raise the matter because two weeks ago a local taxi driver picked up a local police officer who started talking about the CCTV footage of the incident, which clearly showed that Phil had been involved in an altercation with others before his death and had received a blow. At this moment, the official position is that no CCTV footage exists. When I spoke to the taxi driver on the telephone last week, he was happy for me to go public. He will not rest until Phil's mother gets justice for her son. He was a twin. The family have been destroyed by what has happened, and I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will convey my disquiet to the other Departments with which I have tried to deal in a normal fashion without going public.

Let me raise a similar subject, and ask the Deputy Leader of the House to draw the attention of Home Office Ministers to the BBC 1 programme "Drunk and Dangerous". Everyone saw it: it was peak viewing at 9 pm two months ago. Disgraceful scenes were shown. Will the Deputy Leader of the House kindly ask Home Office Ministers why the nightclubs featured in the programme receive no objections from the police when their licences come up for renewal? I find that quite extraordinary.

The Deputy Leader of the House will also know that Southend council, my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) and I have a dispute with the Office for National Statistics, which claims that there are 20,000 fewer people living in Southend than actually live there. On 20 June, I held a public meeting about local bus services, which have had to be cut as a result of the funding situation. So many people turned up to that meeting that they could not all fit into the building. We are talking about people aged from their 60s to their 90s, and it was heartbreaking to hear the devastating effect that those cuts have had on their quality of life. The Minister for Local Government is doing a splendid job in trying to support the local council—we had a very constructive meeting with him—and I raise this issue again simply to ask the Deputy Leader of the House to pass on my concerns.

I am the chairman of the all-party group on solvent abuse, and today the Department of Health published its framework for volatile substance abuse, which is very good news. Until now, the Society for the Prevention of Solvent and Volatile Substance Abuse—Re-Solv—has had to depend on charitable giving from the national lottery. The national lottery and LloydsTSB, which used to fund Re-Solv, have withdrawn their funding saying that funding for substance abuse victims should come from the Government. I ask the Deputy Leader of the House to relay my concerns to the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), and to request that she arrange a meeting—I suspect that she will agree—so that we can address the funding problem.

During the last such Adjournment debate, I told the House that Southend United were involved in the play-offs at Cardiff for promotion to league one. I am delighted to report to the House that they won. I also told the House then that St. Bernard's high school for girls, in Westcliff-on-Sea, reached the final of the under-13s national football championship, held at Aston Villa's ground. I am delighted to report that they won. I further told the House that I hoped that the UK would win the right to stage the Olympic games in 2012. I join Mr. Putin, Mr. Chirac and Mr. Schröder in being absolutely delighted that we will indeed be staging the Olympics. In a debate in Westminster Hall in March 2004, I asked our excellent Minister for Sport and Tourism whether, if we were successful in that bid, Essex, and particularly Southend, could be involved. I ask the Deputy Leader of the House to find out from the Minister for Sport and Tourism how Essex and Southend will be involved in the staging of the Olympics.

In conclusion, I wish everyone a very happy summer recess.

6.43 pm

Siobhain McDonagh (Mitcham and Morden) (Lab): I begin by extending my congratulations to the hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara) on an excellent maiden speech. We understand the pride that his parents must be feeling.

I am very grateful for the opportunity to speak today and I should like to bring to the House's attention a very serious issue affecting my constituents. My local hospital trust, the St. Helier and Epsom University Hospitals NHS trust, covers Merton, Sutton, Epsom and beyond, and was created when Epsom hospital got into financial difficulties and merged with St. Helier, which is the nearest hospital for most of my constituents.

In January, local NHS managers voted to overturn the views of residents in Surrey, Merton and Sutton, and to build a new critical care hospital in the Belmont suburb of Sutton, rather than on the site of the existing general hospital at St. Helier. This decision means that St. Helier will lose its accident and emergency, maternity and other critical care services, despite the fact that Belmont is one of the wealthiest areas in the country, and that people living close to it have very high life expectancy, very good access to health care and very high levels of private health care.

That has happened despite the fact that the area around St. Helier has the greatest health needs in the whole catchment area and that people living there have up to 10 years' less life expectancy. The people living there are the most likely to need to go to hospital and the least likely to have access to a car. It has happened despite the fact that the whole catchment area can reach St. Helier within the critical golden hour that our health experts agree is crucial; and despite the fact that more people can go to St. Helier within 20 minutes than they can to Sutton; and despite the fact that St. Helier is far more accessible by public transport than Sutton. It has happened despite the fact that independent analysts called the Sutton choice "deeply flawed" and despite the fact that St. Helier was easily the first choice of people living in the catchment area. It is also favoured by all the MPs in Sutton and Merton and by both Sutton and Merton councils.

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con) rose—

Siobhain McDonagh: Consequently, four months ago, Merton council called these plans in to be considered by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. It believed that the plans were wrong and would increase health inequalities. Earlier this week, I was informed that my right hon. Friend is still considering whether to refer the case to the independent reconfiguration panel. Yet four months on, the NHS authorities are continuing to plough ahead with their plans, using public money, even though my right hon. Friend has not made up her mind. If a local authority were planning to reorganise its schools, it would not be allowed to continue spending taxpayers' money until the decision had been ratified. Why should it be different in the health service?

Let me be clear: the decision to choose Sutton over St. Helier was wrong. The team behind the plans calls itself Better Healthcare Closer to Home. It is a good job that the Trade Descriptions Act does not apply to the NHS. Crucially, the organisation has neglected the needs of those who need the NHS the most. Those people will not be getting better health care.

The issue of health inequalities has been all but forgotten by Better Healthcare Closer to Home. Why else would it be running down St. Helier when the area around St Helier has the lowest life expectancy, the most emergency admissions, the highest rate of accidents among children, the lowest levels of general good health, the most people with long-term illness, the most babies born with low birth weight, the most people without access to primary care, the lowest incomes, the largest black and ethnic minority population and the least likelihood of owning a car?

Overall, it would be cheapest to patients if the hospital were based at St. Helier, but that has not been addressed by the Better Healthcare Closer to Home team, even though Government rules say that the cost to patients, not just the cost to hospital trusts, must be included in the plans. Even the Better Healthcare team itself admits that, if the Sutton site were chosen, people living in seven of the 10 most deprived postcodes in the region would have to travel further than they do at the moment.

Any decision on hospital reorganisation has to undergo public consultation, but I believe that the consultation was biased against St. Helier. Thousands of letters and petitions were ignored, including thousands of views from my own constituents. Despite all that, St. Helier came out on top. Official documents rated St. Helier as the best option—better than Sutton by a factor of more than 7 per cent. If anything, the public were even more enthusiastic about St. Helier than the professionals. More people chose St. Helier than any other site, and even in the Sutton area fewer than 10 per cent. of residents supported the Sutton site.

The results of the consultation appear to me to be comprehensive, yet they have been reversed because Better Healthcare says that the consultation was inconclusive and that it now has new information in any case. Absurdly, it says that because people wanted their hospital to be accessible, their decision in favour of St. Helier was somehow incongruous. Better Healthcare Closer to Home simply cannot accept that the St. Helier choice is accessible because it is in the north of the catchment area, while Sutton is geographically more central. But more people live around St Helier. Two thirds of the people in the catchment area can get there within 20 minutes and everyone can get there within the golden hour. It has the best public transport, and total journey times for patients would be shorter to St. Helier than to any other site. Better Healthcare also claims that the overall impact on the NHS would be better if Sutton were chosen.

I have a great deal to say but I appreciate that I must not go over my allotted time. However, one frustration felt by my constituents is that, although they are the least likely in the entire catchment area to be healthy, they are not represented on any of the boards that make decisions about our health service. I hope that my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House will take my concerns and views to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, so that the matter can be called in for review by the reconfiguration panel. In that way, my local health service can be prevented from squandering money on a plan that people do not want.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I received a letter today stating that the London gateway port development had been approved. That development will have serious consequences for my constituency and I oppose it, on behalf of my constituents, for reasons both national and local. However, in view of the lack of time for debate, I shall speak only about the local reasons tonight.

The development will cause serious disadvantages locally, because it will involve a massive amount of house building, which will cause a loss of green belt in my area that we can ill afford. That house building programme, and the many heavy goods vehicles that will be used, will also have a massive traffic impact in the area—a very serious issue for my constituents and for the people of south Essex.

To facilitate the construction of the port, a very deep and wide channel will have to be dug along the Thames estuary and through my constituency. A total of 32 million cu m of spoil will be removed, and the channel will run right across Canvey Island's sea defences. We must ensure that those defences are not in any way put at risk.

The spoil will be dumped on ground to the west of Canvey Island, and it is inevitable that that massive amount of earth will change ground-water levels locally. Part of my constituency has 40,000 residents but is some 8 ft below sea level, so ground-water levels are a matter of serious concern. Moreover, I have no doubt that that spoil dumping will also cause environmental problems.

I hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will ensure that the Department of Transport makes its policy clear. That policy should include promoting a new Parkway rail station for Canvey Island, and improving the road infrastructure in south Essex generally. Both those initiatives should be undertaken before the development goes forward.

On another topic, "Panorama" this evening will broadcast a report, by a nurse and a journalist, that shows that there is a systemic problem in many hospitals in this country. It reveals that the care of elderly patients is sometimes unacceptable. Vulnerable and frail old people, some of whom are dying, suffer a lack of the tender loving care that they are entitled to expect at that difficult time of their lives. They are denied dignity, and there is little or no concern for their welfare. They are left in great pain and distress, and sometimes they are left hungry. They have nothing to drink, not even something to wet their mouths with, and consequently their mouths are dry and start to develop sores.

The programme also reports that elderly patients have been bullied and abused, which is entirely unacceptable in our health service. I am sure that that problem is not widespread but I guess that the same things happen in other hospitals around the country, in part because elderly people are very vulnerable and not able to speak up for themselves.

We know that hospitals have become less clean over recent years, and that thousands of people die or have limbs amputated as a result. We also know that there is institutionalised abuse of the elderly in some hospitals and residential care homes. The vast majority of nurses who care for those people are dedicated and wonderful, and they deserve our thanks for the work that they do in difficult circumstances. But we must ask why there is a problem with the care of the elderly. Is it a systemic problem that involves training and the supervision and management of nursing care? Does it involve the use of temporary and agency nurses? Is that part of the problem?

Like many MPs, I visit hospitals in my constituency. I did so a week or so ago, and I approached a member of staff sitting at the front desk who simply shrugged at me, indicating that she could not speak English. That did not appear at all satisfactory. I say again that I welcome the care and dedication of the majority of nurses and hospital staff, but we can no longer hide behind political correctness and ignore what is happening to a few vulnerable, elderly patients in hospitals and care homes in the UK. I honestly believe that such behaviour would not have been possible when matrons were running hospitals. Hospitals would not be quite so unclean under matrons as they are now. I ask the Government to instigate a national inquiry into the problems revealed by "Panorama" and consider whether matron would help.

Finally, to turn to foreign affairs, the Turkish invasion and occupation of Cyprus is one of the greatest crimes committed in Europe since world war two. It amounted to ethnic cleansing and some 200,000 people were uprooted, made refugees and displaced from their homes, and they still remain displaced. It is time that the international community stopped its appeasement of Turkey and made it plain to Turkey that it cannot move forward in Europe or the international community until it resolves that difficulty and ends peacefully its improper and illegal occupation of the beautiful island of Cyprus.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I shall try to be as brief as possible. I want to raise yet again in the House the threat of the expansion of Heathrow airport to my constituency because things have moved on apace since the last summer Adjournment. I congratulate my colleagues the hon. Members for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) and for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) on the excellent work that they have done in recent months ingeniously to raise this issue on the Floor of the House as often as they possibly can. The whole community in our area is now raised against the proposals that BAA has published in recent months.

As hon. Members may well know, during the past 15 years at Heathrow airport, we have had a terminal 4 inquiry, at which we were told that that was the full extent of the airport's expansion. We then had a terminal 5 inquiry, at which BAA wrote to other hon. Members, me and my constituents to say that, if it received permission for terminal 5, there would be no third runway. In fact, terminal 5 doubled the airport's capacity. Within months, BAA reneged on its commitment and proposed a third runway.

The third runway is now outlined in the master plan that BAA published only months ago. It includes not just a third runway, but a sixth terminal. We will therefore lose villages wholesale. At Sipson village, 700 homes will be completely demolished. Life in the villages of Harmondsworth, Longford, Harlington and Cranford Cross will become unliveable because the air pollution that results from a third runway will go beyond the limits of the European directive on air poisoning.

Let us return to the Government's figures on such developments. The last detailed study was carried out in the early 1990s and put the impact at about 4,000 homes. So 10,000 people in my constituency will be forcibly removed from their community. That is the largest clearance of a population since the Scottish clearances themselves. We face the closure of three primary schools. Whole communities will cease to exist. Community centres, greens, churches, pubs, doctors' surgeries, shops and businesses—a whole community—will be demolished as a result of a search for profits for BAA and the aviation industry.

The Government have set in train a decision-making process, called Project Heathrow, during which a number of research papers will be developed by experts with representatives from the local authorities, BAA and the industry. The project will report in late 2006, when the Government can make their decision. In the meantime, my whole area is blighted, with families who are unable to move because they cannot sell their property, and families who are unable to make decisions on their long-term future. Why? Because BAA wants to maximise its profits.

Last week, BAA announced profits for this year of £500 million—half a billion pounds. I attended BAA's annual general meeting—Friends of the Earth bought me a single share; it has generated 12p this year, which I shall have to declare and return to Friends of the Earth, although I am sure that the organisation will not use it. At the AGM, I asked BAA's directors whether before making any decision they would bring these matters back to shareholders for a decision. The chairman of BAA made a strong recommendation against that resolution, which fell thanks to the proxy votes that he held in his pocket. He went on to award himself a 15 per cent. increase in his salary and an increase in his shareholding. The lessons are, first, that shareholder democracy does not work in this country and, secondly, that BAA is willing to put profits for itself and its directors ahead of the interests of not only my constituents, but the constituents of every MP representing the London borough of Hillingdon and west London.

The Minister should take back to the Secretary of State for Transport, the Prime Minister and the rest of the Cabinet the message that if the Government decide next year that the third runway will go ahead, they will face the biggest environmental battle that this country has ever seen. Not only will there be parliamentary action on the Floor of the House and legislative combat, but I believe that there will be direct action on a scale not seen before in this country or in Europe as a whole, because there is so much anger about the forced migration of so many people.

What has been brought to my attention in recent days about the operation of the airport is deeply worrying. After the London bombings, we have had a number of anxious moments at the Heathrow terminals—there have been several security scares. It is now being reported that there has been a failure to train key staff to deal adequately with security matters. I have written today to the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Transport saying that in the light of the London bombings we must review once again the security arrangements at Heathrow, especially the training of staff, so that we can deal properly with the safety and security of not only the travelling public, but my many constituents who work at Heathrow airport.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara) on his eloquent maiden speech. I know that he will make a first-class contribution to the House; he is already becoming a first-class Member of Parliament.

I wish to raise the serious issue of consumer credit and a voluntary code of practice. I draw the attention of the House to the tragic case of my constituent Mark McDonald, who was driven to suicide by debts totalling £65,000 that had been amassed on his credit cards. His wife and friends had no idea of the situation. That is just one tragic example of the many people in Britain today who are getting into serious financial difficulties.

Debt itself is not bad, but unaffordable debt certainly is. Debt that is affordable one year might not be the next if people's employment circumstances change or interest rates change significantly. Eleven per cent. of credit card holders in Britain make only a minimum payment each month and 4 per cent. of British households are regarded as having too much debt. The Consumer Credit Counselling Service revealed last month that 25,000 people rang its helpline for advice in May this year—almost double the number who called in May last year. Steve Wiseman, chief executive of Norwich citizens advice bureau has said:

"The average debt of our clients is £27,000, not including mortgages, but it is certainly not unusual to see debts of £60,000 or more."

I pay tribute to the work of citizens advice bureaux and other debt advice organisations that help many people in my constituency and elsewhere to deal with their financial difficulties.

I welcome the reintroduction of the Consumer Credit Bill, although it is a pity that the Government could not find more time for it in the last Parliament. The last consumer credit legislation was passed 31 years ago. In the intervening period, the credit landscape has changed beyond all recognition, in part as a result of changing lifestyles and attitudes to debate, and in part because of the liberalisation of financial markets, which has allowed a highly dynamic and sophisticated industry to develop.

Only one type of credit card was available in 1971, but today there are more than 1,300. Thirty years ago, £32 million was owed on credit cards, but today the figure is almost £50 billion. I welcome the Government's announcement that they are setting aside £45 million to provide free advice to people struggling with unmanageable debts. That money will allow debt advice charities to train many advisers to help people in the situation in which my late constituent found himself. Could the Government explain to the House, however, how the money will be allocated and when we can expect it to make a difference? Although it will help to alleviate the problem, we must look at other options to prevent people from ending up in unaffordable debt.

It is important to recognise, as the Select Committee on Treasury has done, that responsible lending is about more than meeting the minimum legal requirements. It is about driving forward best practice and treating customers fairly. A credit card lender should provide short-term debt as part of a convenient service, rather than pushing a form of debt that sucks borrowers into a long-term cycle of indebtedness. There are many ways of reducing the problem of massive debt, not least financial education. In 2002, Melanie Johnson, the then Member for Welwyn Hatfield, who was also a junior Minister at the Department of Trade and Industry, spoke about the importance of financial education:

> "We want to build a generation of empowered consumers who can manage their credit effectively; who understand why it is important for them to master their finances, and how they might achieve that; who can make appropriate decisions about their finances; who understand the choices open to them and their implications."

Three years later, we obviously have not reached that point, so what measures are the Government taking to achieve their aspiration?

Financial education is not helped by the way in which some institutions make credit readily available to young people, particularly those who are starting university, as they are already burdened with the Government's £3,000 tuition fees. Nearly every bank offers a special student account with incentives like free CDs or travel passes for people who open current accounts. Many also offer credit cards, often with high limits. Do the Government agree that offering a credit card to a student, who probably has a limited income, is not the most responsible approach for a lender to take? It is important that lenders assess the ability of the consumer or customer to repay and that that assessment should be based on as complete a picture as possible of their current income and credit commitments as well as their payment history. What evaluation have the Government made of the potential for a certain amount of data sharing between institutions? Mr. McDonald's widow believes that if companies shared information, such tragic cases might be averted.

Unsolicited increases in credit and spending limits should also be questioned. Have the Government assessed the need to make it a requirement that people request an increase in their limit, rather than simply letting that happen as a matter of course. In conclusion, this is clearly an emotive subject. It is easy to blame large corporations for the situation in which borrowers find themselves when they cannot afford the debt that they incur, but personal responsibility must not be forgotten. There is no doubt in my mind that credit can be secured far too easily, sometimes with tragic results. It is incumbent on companies that are in business to make money to ensure that they have ethically and socially responsible policies in place when offering credit. I do not want to prevent people from obtaining credit, but when it is granted I should like to be sure that all the relevant factors have been taken into account, including a realistic appraisal of an individual's circumstances and their ability to pay.

Self-regulation through industry codes may well play an important role in supplementing statutory requirements. What measures will the Government take to encourage the development of codes of practice and adherence to them? The best way in which to tackle these issues is through a code of practice. The banking code, established under the last Conservative Administration, has been particularly successful. Will the Minister assure me that the Government will work with the industry to encourage companies outside the code to join it? I welcome the revised code, which has been in operation since the end of March, and I look forward to discussions about how it can be improved in future.

7.9 pm

Mr. George Mudie (Leeds, East) (Lab): I shall be brief, as I know that other Members want to get in.

I want to place on record a matter that is of growing concern in my constituency—the implementation of the asylum seekers dispersal policy. The dispersal policy made perfect sense when asylum seekers landed in Dover and elsewhere in great numbers. They competed for scarce local resources in a way that helped neither the residents of those areas nor the asylum seekers themselves, so to disperse them around the country made sense. However, the way in which that is being done in Leeds and in my constituency is unfair and insensitive.

Asylum seekers come through one of two courses. They may come through the National Asylum Support Service, in which case they are placed nationally and contracts are bought from the private sector, or they may come through the local council. There are eight constituencies in Leeds. Three of the constituencies seem to be home for the majority of the asylum seekers. My constituency is probably the recipient of the second largest total. NASS has placed contracts with landlords who have bought up the cheapest houses in the city. With the amount they get from NASS, it is sensible for them to find the cheapest housing. They are making a great deal of money, but they have caused havoc in the cheaper end of the housing market and they have caused havoc in the area because of the sheer numbers.

Parallel to that, the city council is taking up council houses in the same area for asylum seekers. In one ward of my city, Harehills and Gipton, an inner-city ward where there is great poverty and deprivation, we have a huge number of asylum seekers. That is causing all sorts of problems. In the past two weeks the Home Office has suspended the arrival of any more, on the advice of the police and the local community, but that will be reviewed in six weeks and I fear the influx will restart.

If we have such large numbers coming from different areas and speaking different languages, consider the problems that that causes for an inner-city primary school and the problems already faced by staff teaching inner-city children, for whom that is their one life chance. There may be nine different languages being spoken, and the teachers, with very few additional resources from the Department for Education and Skills, struggle to handle the new situation in an inner-city school where they would struggle anyway.

Let us consider medical services. It is a struggle to get doctors to come into the inner city and to get on their list in the inner city. It is difficult to find a doctor who will put new patients on their panel. If the asylum seekers' situation is mishandled, it can cause all sorts of problems.

The Home Office must review the policy. The number of asylum seekers is falling and there is time to review the situation, to think about it and to be more sensitive in placing them. I am in favour of a cap, so that if I take my fair share, which I will cheerfully do, I do not have to take the share of other areas or constituencies which, for one reason or another, do not have premises available for asylum seekers.

Asylum seekers come to the United Kingdom with shattered lives. They are escaping death and civil war, and they want a friendly reception. Yorkshire people will give them a friendly reception. My city will give them a friendly reception, but the dispersal policy must be kept in perspective and needs to be more sensitive. I hope that the Minister will convey that to the Home Office.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I want to raise the case of one of my constituents, Mr. Vinchenzo Favata. Last September, he was diagnosed with cancer and his consultant at the Royal Marsden prescribed a drug called Glivec, which has been appraised by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence. The treatment did not begin until November because approval for the funding of the drug from Sutton and Merton primary care trust was delayed.

Three weeks ago, my constituent was scanned and it was found that the tumour had started growing again. The clinician recommended an increase in the dosage of the life-saving drug, which required the primary care trust's panel to make a further decision. The panel met yesterday and did not agree to the extra funding, which has plunged the family into despair and limbo.

Decisions in the NHS are meant to be taken on the grounds of clinical evidence, clinical need and clinical judgment. Despite a clear clinical recommendation, why has my local primary care trust seen fit to deny Mr. Favata an increased dosage of the life-saving drug to fight his cancer? I have been in touch with the primary care trust and the family is appealing the decision, but I raise the matter today in the hope that the Deputy Leader of the House will draw it to the attention of Health Ministers so that they can take action to stop a practice that seems to be the rationing of drugs on the basis of cost alone.

I also want to talk about planning in my constituency. I suspect that the problem of predatory developers affects many hon. Members who represent suburban and urban constituencies. Such developers are out and about in my constituency looking for every last little piece of back-garden land on which they can erect flats. A company called Blazemaster has submitted a planning application to demolish 26 houses in Cheam Common road and Lavender avenue and build 133 flats in their place, thus depositing numerous extra cars on to a road infrastructure that is barely able to cope with the traffic already on it and imposing additional stresses and strains on local services.

Such behaviour cannot be a tolerable way in which to manage the need for additional housing. It is a direct consequence of PPG3, which includes back-garden land in the definition of brownfield land. The daft designation fails to recognise the biodiversity offered by back-garden land and the other contributions that it makes, so I was delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) advanced the case for re-designating back-garden land when she introduced her ten-minute Bill yesterday. I hope that time will be found to consider the Bill and that it will find favour because it would do a good deal to reassure my constituents and rebuild confidence in the system.

I agreed with much of what the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh) said in her speech. I hope that we will be able to take forward better health care closer to home and make sure that we do not have the new hospital in Sutton, but at St. Helier.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to talk about important changes that have taken place to the borough council that serves most of my constituency. Over the past eight years, Swindon borough council has failed to deliver the services that the people of Swindon deserve. The council failed between 1997 and 2001, when the Labour party ran it, and it has failed since 2001, which was when the Conservatives took it over. Between 2001 and 2004, the council's overall performance varied between poor and weak. The social services got a zero star rating in 2002, 2003 and 2004.

I think that things went wrong because when Swindon became a unitary authority in 1997, it was left inadequately prepared by the previous Government and never recovered from that bad start. Every day for the past eight years, the consequences of the failures have hurt people who depend on public services. Far from helping people, the council all too often made difficult and stressful situations worse. Today, however, there is clear evidence that the council is beginning to turn itself around. There are new management systems in place. It has capable new directors and a new, highly effective and capable chief executive.

What has happened? National Government have intervened on the local authority. The Department for Education and Skills drove through changes to such an extent that, within two years, Ofsted found that the number of functions performed by the local education authority that were rated as satisfactory or better had increased from 30 per cent. to 85 per cent.

Ministers and officials from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister have been working closely with the council to transform the delivery of services to residents and supporting it to do so. It has lent Swindon borough council one of its most capable officials, who has years of experience of local government and helping failing local authorities to turn themselves around. She has been working with the council over the past few months to introduce rigorous accounting systems and to ensure that, at last, it focuses on the recipients of services. The people of Swindon owe a debt of gratitude to Anne-Marie Carre and all the officials in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister who have done much to help them. Swindon has received extra financial resources from the Government. Not only has grant increased by 30 per cent. since 2001, but one-off additional funding has been provided such as £1 million to build extra capacity in the council, and there is also the possibility of a further £1 million.

None of that would have been possible without the dedication and expertise of the previous Minister with responsibility for local government, my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford), whom we thank. It is reassuring that he has been succeeded by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, East and Saddleworth (Mr. Woolas), who has already demonstrated his concern that Swindon stays on the right track.

The recovery process has involved a partnership, and I pay tribute to both the ruling group and the Labour group on Swindon borough council for their willingness to embrace the improvement agenda constructively and to work co-operatively with the ODPM. A great deal remains to be done and the situation is by no means perfect, but the council is on the mend.

The partnership that turned around the council has much to contribute to the debate about the division of powers in our democracy, about which we have already heard quite a lot today. When we hear fashionable talk about "localism", the debate is always focused on the benefits of devolving power to the smallest possible political unit, and there are, of course, benefits to that approach. However, "local" can also mean limited and restricted, and localism can work against the equitable distribution of resources throughout the country, a subject about which we have heard a lot this afternoon. In the past, localism has also worked against a cohesive sense of national identity. Such fashionable talk does not contemplate the consequences when localism is not enough and local authorities fail, and it forgets that the least advantaged and the most vulnerable get hurt first and worst when local authorities fail in the same way as Swindon failed.

In my view, the ODPM has helped to turn around the situation in Swindon. Perhaps the defenders of localism would argue that in time the people of Swindon would elect councillors who would turn around the council themselves without such intervention. However, real life does not work like that, and it did not work like that in Swindon. The people of Swindon elected new councillors who had the power and the money to make significant improvements, but, for whatever reason, they did not make them. The people of Swindon elected new representatives over and over again, but none of those representatives was any more able than their predecessors to make the necessary improvements.

Central Government can be sclerotic, slow and clog up the delivery of public services, but central Government can also be good government—a national Government working nationally and locally for the good. The fashionably derided system of targets and inspections quantified Swindon borough council's failures and provided an objective basis for the intervention that is turning round its performance. National Government provide the breadth and depth of expertise that is not always found in one local authority. Swindon's experience demonstrates the benefits of national Government.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the House will take my points to the ODPM, because we are very grateful for everything that it has done in Swindon. In partnership with the Labour group and the ruling group on Swindon borough council, the ODPM is about to make a difference for the people of Swindon.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): I am grateful to hon. Members for cutting their speeches, and I will do likewise to ensure that my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) is able to participate.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara) on his tremendous maiden speech. My maiden speech was rubbish. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear!"] Yes; I know that that is hard to believe. At least this speech will be short, which will improve its quality, but I still wake up in a sweat thinking about my maiden speech.

We are about to go into one of the longest summer recesses ever—I know why—and it would be useful if hon. Members were able to table written questions during that period. I would not expect the answers as quickly as when the House is sitting, but it would be useful.

I want to discuss the reclassification of cannabis. My private Member's Bill, which sadly ran out of time in the previous Parliament, would have set up a commission to examine the reclassification of cannabis. I was told that that could not happen, but the Government have now set up their own inquiry because of the evidence on the long-term psychotic influence of cannabis. Dr. John Henry of St. Mary's hospital has said that just as cigarette smoking has ill effects on the body, so cannabis has similar effects on the mind.

A huge amount of evidence has appeared from a number of quarters since the reclassification of cannabis, so it is right for the Government to re-examine the issue. I have been told that the commission may not report until December, although we had thought that it would do so in the summer. If the Minister can encourage the inquiry to make its recommendations soon, perhaps we can get cannabis put back into class B.

When cannabis was reclassified, the message sent, particularly to young people, was wrong. Believe it or not, 42 per cent. of youngsters at school were offered controlled substances in 2003, 1 per cent. of under-11s have tried cannabis, and one third of people under 15 admit to having tried it, too. Clearly they were sent the wrong message. When the commission reports—and I hope that it will do so as I feel it ought—we should be able to move swiftly to reclassifying cannabis and putting it back into class B.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): I want to talk about an issue that will have a catastrophic effect on my constituents and large parts of London, particularly west London—the westward extension of the congestion charge scheme. As hon. Members may know, the consultation ended on Friday 15 July, and we will probably hear the results during the summer recess. They may also know that in the first consultation—as with most new Labour schemes, if the right answer does not emerge the first time, the same question is simply put again—63 per cent. of residents and 72 per cent. of business opposed the westward extension.

I believe that the extension of the zone will have an especially bad effect on Hammersmith and Fulham, for the following reasons. First, it will affect our local traffic; this may well happen elsewhere in London too. The north-south routes through our borough are few and poorly served, yet any examination of a map of London shows that almost all the displaced traffic will be sent north-south through Hammersmith and Fulham.

The map shows that there will be a funnel effect if people are charged £8 a day to go through Kensington and Chelsea. Statistically, 100,000 to 120,000 cars a day go from Hammersmith and Fulham into Kensington and Chelsea. Our most congested roads—the north-south routes, including the A219 Fulham Palace road and the Hammersmith gyratory—now take about one third of that traffic. Think about the impact of the displaced traffic on those already congested routes round key junctions such as the Hammersmith gyratory, and key hospitals such as Charing Cross hospital.

It stands to reason that if people have to pay £8 to go over Battersea bridge, the Albert bridge, Chelsea bridge or Vauxhall bridge, they will probably try to avoid that and pop further up the river to cross Wandsworth or Putney bridge.

For most of my constituents, it seems that it is no longer possible to be born in the constituency. Fulham's district general hospital is the Chelsea and Westminster, so for the first time a birth tax has been created—by Ken Livingstone and the Greater London authority. People will have to pay £8 to go there to give birth. Indeed, it is most unlikely that the fee will be £8; it is more likely to be an £80 penalty charge the next day, when people discover that they have forgotten to pay. There will also be a terrible effect on some of our local schools, and on businesses just outside the zone, such as Earls Court Olympia, Chelsea football club and the BBC in Shepherds Bush.

It is hardly as if our public transport could take much more of those displaced journeys. The Wimbledon branch of the District line is already operating at 92 per cent. capacity—one of the highest rates for any tube line in London. Tomorrow, the 14 and 22 bus routes will be downgraded from Routemasters to regular Volvo buses.

The consultation has been a complete fiasco. Of the 14 questions put to residents, only one—question No. 2—asks their opinion on the congestion charge extension. The scheme deserves to be defeated, and I hope that the London Mayor will finally start listening to the Government, who should be putting pressure on him to listen to local residents and other stakeholders and reject the scheme.

7.29 pm

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): I shall be brief, to allow the Minister the chance to respond to as many comments as possible.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara), who made an eloquent speech. We envy him his constituency, which he described with great eloquence and which is clearly a wonderful place to represent. We admire his constituents, but perhaps we do not have the same sense of envy about the fact that he has three former Members of Parliament to deal with. I also admire him for his achievement in being the first Gujarati Member of this House. I hope very much that he will not be the last. My party is committed to increasing ethnic minority representation here, and we fielded more candidates than any other party at the general election from the ethnic minorities. Sadly, not enough of them were elected, but we will deal with that in future.

The debate has been wide ranging but has shown how much commonality there is in the issues that we face in different constituencies. We heard about water supply issues in Somerton and Frome and the water supply issues created in Castle Point by development problems. We heard about unmanned railway stations in south-west London, specifically Lewisham, and in Sevenoaks. That is certainly something with which I can identify as I see the spread of antisocial behaviour in my own area. Members talked with pride of their constituencies: the hon. Member for Houghton and Washington, East (Mr. Kemp) spoke of the growth of Sunderland and the role that Nissan has played; Nissan is to be admired for what it has achieved in this country, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will remember that it was the last Conservative Government who brought Nissan here.

We have heard about individual cases from my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), whom I congratulate on the footballing successes that he described. We heard about individual issues from my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser), who talked about the great difficulty of the impact of debt on individuals, and from the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow), who talked about the shortcomings that we all know exist in the front line of the national health service.

We heard about issues that affect probably every constituency, such as the pressures of development, not simply as described by my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink), but in the problems in west London to do with the future of Heathrow airport. We heard from the hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) about the reverse of that problem—areas that have housing stock available being perhaps excessively used for the dispersal of asylum seekers. We heard also about the problems being caused in back-land development from the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam, with which I can identify just down the road in my constituency. I share, too, the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith and Fulham (Mr. Hands) about the congestion charge. The Mayor of London should proceed with that change with great caution.

We heard, too, about important national and international issues, including nuclear proliferation, on which it is essential for the whole world that matters are got right for the future. The points of my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) about cannabis were very well made.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh) will not be surprised that I have saved her comments for last. I represent the other half of what I must emphasise is the Epsom and St. Helier—not the St. Helier and Epsom—NHS trust. I do not envy any NHS employee faced with the task of hospital reconfiguration. They can never win, and they can never please everyone. The House will not be surprised to learn that I could set out in detail equal to the hon. Lady's the reasons why she is wrong, why Epsom has better transport links and how, if there is no accident and emergency department in Epsom, there will be 150,000 people in Surrey without an A and E department within five miles of their homes, while in the north of the area there are three other major acute hospitals close by.

May I say to the Minister and the hon. Lady that the siting of the hospital in this project is, in many ways, not the key point? The key is whether the project is viable in the first place. I have two huge concerns that should be common to the hon. Lady, the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam, myself and other affected Members. First, the national health service is putting forward a scheme that, by its own admission, replaces one unaffordable model of care with another. We have not yet been given evidence by the national health service that it is delivering a package—an expensive private finance initiative scheme—that will not ultimately lead to cuts in community-based services as the NHS seeks to pay the mortgage.

The other point is that we have yet to get a clear explanation of how the NHS can afford to reduce the number of acute beds in our area by one third. Until I hear answers to those two questions, I remain unpersuaded that this scheme is viable. I hope that in passing on comments from the hon. Lady and the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam, the Minister will bear my thoughts in mind as well.

This has been a good and wide-ranging debate, and we look forward to hearing from the Minister. I wish all Members of the House and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a very pleasant recess.

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): This has been a very well informed debate. I am pleased that hon. Members curtailed their comments to allow 18 Members to contribute. Of course, the debate was necessarily cut short by the sad death of Sir Edward Heath, but none the less many issues were raised, and I will try to deal with as many of them as I can.

My hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington, East (Mr. Kemp) will welcome, as I do, the publication on Monday of the youth Green Paper. It is important that we applaud what young people do, as too often we are quick to criticise the tiny minority who need more care and attention. I will ensure that the Home Secretary is aware of his comments about Wearside Women in Need.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) talked about a hospital in his area. If I was in his position, I would share his worry that, despite the vast increase in the capital budget and the dozens of new hospitals built and substantial hospital repairs that have taken place, his area has been left behind. I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is aware of that. Equally, I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is aware of his points about water and the A303.

My long-term friend and distinguished colleague, my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), raised an issue that he has championed throughout his political life. I will ensure that my colleagues at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office take heed of his concerns and respond accordingly.

The hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) raised several matters. I would say to him, in a spirit of good will, that I have the Hansard of the exchange with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, and I think that the hon. Gentleman may have done him a disservice, as I am not sure that he gave such a commitment. I know that the hon. Gentleman will look at that. I suggest that he write to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister about when the planning legislation review as regards Travellers is likely to be published, because that is a matter of concern for many Members on both sides of the House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Jim Dowd) talked about an issue that was raised by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks—the lack of staffing in railway stations and the problems that that poses.

The hon. Member for North-West Cambridgeshire (Mr. Vara) gave an excellent maiden speech, as others have said. His family must be very proud of him. I am sure that breast cancer and, in future, other causes have found an eloquent advocate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) talked about newspaper distribution in supermarkets. I know that he has taken that up assiduously with my right hon. Friends at their respective Departments.

The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) gets the prize for raising the most issues—six or seven. I know that he will forgive me if I do not cover them all, but I am happy to ensure that he is written to. On the case of the Briton detained abroad, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, Foreign Office officials and the ambassador raise that at every conceivable opportunity, and they will note his comments.

The hon. Gentleman raised other important matters such as the programme, "Drunk and Dangerous", and questioned why local licensing committees are granting licenses in such circumstances. I share his concerns, as will the whole House. We give powers to local licensing committees and we expect them to take the advice of local police and other authorities. We want firm action to be taken because drunkenness is one of the most serious problems in society. There is no quick fix but it puts tremendous pressure on our health and other services.

[Nigel Griffiths]

My hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh) raised an issue about which there are clearly diverging views. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will want to study those views and representations carefully. However, it is for the primary care trust to make a decision and weigh up the evidence. I know from my hon. Friend's reputation that she will have piled up the evidence and made a good case. I am sure that the shadow Leader of the House will also make a forceful case.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) raised an issue that several hon. Members mentioned: the threat to the green belt. He also referred to the plight of elderly patients in the health service and joined other hon. Members in praising almost all health service workers. Of course, the Government take seriously any concerns such as those that he highlighted. His comments on Cyprus represent his point of view. There are strong views on both sides of the argument.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) mentioned Heathrow. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Mudie) referred to asylum. Clearly, those issues are important.

If hon. Members will forgive me as we approach the last minute, I shall write to other hon. Members and ensure that their concerns are raised.

I join my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West in praising the work of Iain Hepplewhite as a Department of Trade and Industry press officer, with whom I worked. He served both Governments well. Our thoughts are with him and his parents.

It being two hours after the commencement of proceedings, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, pursuant to Order [19 July].

COMMITTEES

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With the leave of the House, I shall put motions 13, 14, 15 and 16 together.

Ordered,

FINANCE AND SERVICES

That Mr John Randall be discharged from the Finance and Services Committee and Mr Eric Forth and Robert Key be added.

WELSH AFFAIRS

That Hywel Williams be added to the Welsh Affairs Committee.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

That John Healey be added to the Committee of Public Accounts.

ENVIRONMENTAL AUDIT

That Mr Elliot Morley be added to the Environmental Audit Committee.—[Mr. Bob Ainsworth, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITIONS

Oxford-Bicester Rail Services

7.42 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): I wish to present a petition on the Oxford-Bicester rail services, which is signed by some 500 of my constituents.

The petition states:

The petition of the people of Bicester and the surrounding areas

Declares their opposition to the Strategic Rail Authority's announcement that the Oxford-Bicester rail service will have trains that will run only twice daily from 2006;

That the Bicester area will double in size under Government housing plans but Bicester Town station will not have a train after 16.00;

That that undermines the Government's proposal to develop sustainable communities, outlined by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister as,

"transport facilities, including public transport, that help people travel within and between communities and reduce dependence on cars", and community rail development, outlined by the Department for Transport as,

"putting local and rural railways on a sustainable basis for the long term, so that they can continue to offer a vital service for passengers and freight and contribute more to the local economy as well as meeting Government targets on accessibility, the environment and social inclusion";

That before the general election, the Government were discussing an east-west rail link to connect Oxford to Milton Keynes by increasing services at Bicester and surrounding villages, only for the new franchise to move Bicester back rather than forward in terms of service levels.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Department for Transport to honour its clear commitment to sustainable communities and community rail development by reviewing the franchise and implementing a full timetable and range of facilities at Bicester Town station.

And the Petitioners remain etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Telecommunications Mast

7.44 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of a great number of local residents in Chalkwell ward who are very concerned about the health effects of telecommunications masts, particularly their link to causing brain tumours.

The Petition of residents of Chalkwell Avenue, Westcliffe-on-Sea and others:

Declare that the Petitioners oppose Application SOS/04/01758/TEL for the erection of a T-Mobile telecommunications mast at the junction of The Ridgeway and 93, Chalkwell Avenue. The Petitioners further declare that they are united in protest against the Application and that they will exercise all of their rights to that end.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Deputy Prime Minister to reject Application SOS/04/01758/TEL for the erection of a T-Mobile telecommunications mast at the junction of The Ridgeway and 93, Chalkwell Avenue.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Langley Estate

7.45 pm

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): This petition is from the tenants and residents of the Langley estate in Middleton in my constituency, an estate that you will know well, Mr. Deputy Speaker, being a predecessor of mine. It used to be run as an overspill estate by Manchester city council, and it is now managed by the Bowlee Park housing association. The petition has been signed by more than 1,000 tenants and residents from the Langley estate.

The estate is the subject of a £30 million investment by the Bowlee Park housing association and is a housing market renewal investment project. Environmental improvements including fencing and boundary walls have been started. However, there seems to be a shortfall in funding to enable completion to take place. This is a once-only opportunity to create a sustainable quality of life for the local residents and the petition seeks the support of the Government to enable this to happen.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons legislate to ensure that local and central Government ensure that funds are in place to complete the project for all the properties in the area.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Dunstable College

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bob Ainsworth.]

7.46 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): It might be helpful to the House if I briefly outline some of the facts about Dunstable college. It started off training workers in the printing industry. It should now more properly be called South Bedfordshire college, because although it is based in Dunstable it serves all the residents of south Bedfordshire, and notably of Leighton Buzzard, the largest town in my constituency, where the college has a learning shop. A large number of courses are also run on the Kingsland campus in Houghton Regis and the college also functions on its main site in Dunstable. It is particularly important to note that many of the college's students travel considerable distances to get to it from places throughout south Bedfordshire and a long way into mid-Bedfordshire. All this means that the college's continued well-being is vital to the future of our area.

I should like to run through a few statistics. The college reduced its adult provision in 2002–03, in agreement with Bedfordshire and Luton learning and skills council. Since then, it has met its targets every year and received support for its plans at every stage from the local LSC. College provision has been completely reviewed and the college has not asked to grow adult provision. It has replaced non-priority adult provision systematically to target priority areas.

The college is also a sub-regional trade union studies centre. It has only 18 per cent. of its provision categorised as "other", and it has grown its 16-to-19 numbers year on year from 2001–02. It has rebalanced its provision in the way in which the Government wanted it to do. The college has played the game and done exactly what the local LSC asked it to do, in accordance with the Government's agenda, over the past few years.

The Minister's surname is Hope, and that is what the students of Dunstable college are looking for tonight, because I have to tell him that all is not well with the college. This year, out of the blue, its budget has been cut by £833,000. That figure is made up as follows: for 19-plus students, there will be a cut of £533,000; for additional learning support, a cut of £73,000; the ethnic minority student achievement grant will be cut by £33,000; the learner support fund will be cut by £22,000; work-based learning will have £150,000 taken off its budget; and the local intervention and development fund will have a £22,000 reduction. That adds up to a total cut of £833,000, which is a 10 per cent. cut in funding out of a total budget of some £8 million or so. That came as a complete surprise—as I have said, the local learning and skills council had fully backed the direction of the college at every stage since 2003.

What do those cuts mean? The college will educate 1,000 fewer learners locally, 25 college staff are losing their jobs—most of which are full-time—and a further 15 staff have received "at risk of redundancy" notices. All of that is in an area in which the Government plan to add an extra 43,000 homes, as part of the Milton Keynes and south midlands sustainable communities plan, with which the Minister will be familiar from his previous incarnation as a Minister in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Although Dunstable is particularly badly hit, it is not alone. As the Minister will know, there will be a cut of 200,000 adult education places across the country, including courses in basic skills to improve poor adult literacy and numeracy, which cost us some £10 billion a year nationally. The sector also faces some 4,000 to 5,000 redundancies. Dr. John Brennan, the Association of College' chief executive, a man not usually prone to strong language, has said that the Government are presiding over a "funding shambles" with 2006–07 to be worse still—a further disaster waiting to happen.

How could this be avoided? The Government have set up the biggest quango in Europe in the form of the Learning and Skills Council, which has a budget of £330 million to administer adult education. The Further Education Funding Council used to do that job for a £15 million budget. With a growing budget, it should be possible to expand 16 to 19 provision, which the Government properly want to do, and which the Opposition recognise as a valid and important objective. That should be possible, however, without cutting adult provision. It should not be a case of either/or where the overall budget is growing.

Nor is the Government's national approach sensitive to the differing needs of local communities, such as in my constituency of South-West Bedfordshire. Many older workers, from the BTR and Trico factories that have closed down recently in Dunstable, from the Lancer Boss and Courtaulds factories in Leighton Buzzard, or from the WOM International factory that closed down in Leighton Buzzard in the past couple of weeks, need to re-skill to get back into the workplace. The cuts in adult provision will make that very much more difficult.

The Government say that colleges can make up those cuts to their budgets by collecting fees. That simply will not wash. Chris Vesey, the outstandingly good principal of Dunstable college, whom south Bedfordshire is very lucky to have, said in an e-mail to me on this point:

"Dunstable college has progressively increased fees to adult part time students over the last 2 years. We noticed a reduction in enrolments as a result and have closed what we would have called 'leisure courses' as non viable. These included watercolour painting, photography and flower arranging. These courses were replaced by plumbing, electrical installation and ESOL"—

English as a second language. She continued:

"In an agreement with other Bedfordshire colleges we have introduced a fee of £120 per year for our 19 plus students on full time courses", with effect from September 2005,

"in addition to the materials fee that they already pay which varies from £25 to £120 depending on the course . . . The total that I could collect will not make much of an impression on the funding cut as it is a small amount compared to the actual costs of delivery."

I therefore hope that the Minister will not say that the answer to the college's funding crisis is for it to raise more fees.

The Government have increased funding for the sector, but have not always done so in a way that achieves the greatest value for money. I am sure that the Minister will come to realise, as just about everyone in the sector has, that unintended consequences are involved in the policy priorities on which he and his colleagues have embarked. I ask him to be as reasonable as he can, and consider whether those really were the intended consequences of the national policy that he set out. I sent questions to the Minister's private office in advance, and I should be grateful if he answered them.

What work did the Department undertake, or what work is it undertaking, to keep FE staff who have been made redundant? We know that there is a shortage of FE staff nationally in key courses. Those people are a vital national asset. Is the Department really content for the national total of between 4,000 and 5,000, 25 of whom are at Dunstable college, to leave the education sector altogether? What work is being done to get them into the 16 to 18 sector on which the Government want to concentrate?

Will the Minister tell me, please, what risk assessment was carried out to ensure that the FE sector was not seriously damaged by short notice major cuts in college priorities? It is worth pointing out that the LSC's letter sent to colleges in November 2004, followed up by a circular in January 2005, made it clear that the cuts would not happen. They are very recent news for colleges, and it is the shortness of the period within which they must adjust to the cuts that has caused such huge difficulties.

Has the Department undertaken any research into the ability and willingness of employers and individuals to pay higher fees for their courses? I understand from correspondence with the Minister and his colleagues that the Department is arguing on those lines, but—as I made clear in quoting the college principal's words—that is not an option for us in south Bedfordshire. Can the Department guarantee that all extra demand for 16 to 18-year-olds in colleges will be fully funded? Can it confirm that there will be a reduction in funding for apprenticeships for those who will be over 19 in 2005–06? That issue is particularly close to my heart.

How was the process used to assure equity of access to 19-plus courses for those living in various parts of the country? I fear that there will be a lottery of provision across the country because of the uneven way in which the cuts are falling. Not all colleges are in the position of Dunstable college; some are fortunate enough to have received a budget increase this year. Finally, what process was used to consider whether 19-plus provision was in the priority areas—specialist, or of value to the local economic environment?

I shall end my speech before my allocated time runs out, in the hope that the Minister may be generous enough to let me intervene on those specific points. There are many very worried staff at Dunstable college. Our area has taken some big knocks industrially over the years. We are the focus of Government attention in terms of massive housing growth and, as I said earlier, I believe that these are unintended consequences of the Minister's policy. I hope that this debate will provide an opportunity for the position to be reconsidered, so that we can give some hope back to the college.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Phil Hope): I congratulate the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) on securing such an important debate. I should like to do what he did. He put his concerns about Dunstable college in the wider context of Government policy, and I shall try to deal with the questions that he raised.

I think we can all agree that in the 21st century it matters more than ever for education to be able to transform the lives of children and adults, whatever their background and wherever they live, and for the state to have a responsibility for providing and paying for high-quality initial education and training for young people. Most people would agree on that, and we are committed to providing it. That means providing a place in school or in college, or an apprenticeship, for every young person. For adults, the performance and success of the learning and skills sector is critical, because of its strong links with the economy and because of the Government's wider agenda. We need a strong economy if we are to make progress on the Government's health, welfare and social reform priorities.

We want to ensure that suitable learning and training opportunities continue to be available to, and accessible to, individuals. As we set out in our skills White Paper, we want all adults to have the opportunity to develop a foundation of basic and work skills, so that they can become more employable and adaptable to the rapidly changing needs of the workplace. The Government recognise the huge importance of the post-16 education and skills sector in realising that ambition.

Andrew Selous rose—

Phil Hope: I will address the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, but if he will forgive me I shall spend a few moments trying first to establish the context and background. I will give way shortly if I am not covering the issues quickly enough.

So we are investing more money in the sector than ever before, and in 2005–06 it will receive no less than £10 billion. Investment in FE colleges has increased significantly. In the three years to 2005–06, total funding for the FE sector alone has risen by £1 billion—a 25 per cent. cash increase. This year, seven out of 10 colleges will receive an above-inflation budget increase; indeed, almost half will receive an increase of more than 5 per cent. I shall deal with Dunstable college's situation in a moment.

The 2005 Budget also included an additional £350 million-worth of capital investment for the period 2008–09 to 2009–10, in order to support the longer-term transformation of the FE estate. Over the next five years, Government capital investment in FE will total £1 5 billion—up from nothing in 1997. I am pleased to say that our investment so far has paid off. Some 862,000 adults have achieved literacy, numeracy and language qualifications since 2001, surpassing the 2004 public service agreement target. Overall success rates have increased from 65 per cent. in 2001–02 to 71 per cent. in 2003–04. Some 670,000 more adults a year participate in FE than participated in 1997. So far, 21,000 employers—and 164,000 employees—have benefited from the employer training pilots, gaining the skills and qualifications that they need to improve their overall productivity and competitiveness.

Andrew Selous rose—

Phil Hope: Despite that, there is an issue that we have to address, but, first, I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Andrew Selous: For the 25 staff of Dunstable college sitting at home tonight, the global increases in the FE sector are very welcome, but the Minister will doubtless realise that what they want to know is why £833,000 has been taken from the college's budget.

Phil Hope: As I said, I want to give the general context before getting down to the specifics of Dunstable college.

Despite these significant sums, the public purse cannot meet the demand for all learning. I am always pleased when Conservative Members of Parliament come to the House to ask for more money for their area. I find it slightly difficult to reconcile that with the platform on which they stood at the election—one that involved cutting public spending by £30 billion and abolishing the union learning representatives scheme, which provides many opportunities for people in the workplace to gain adult basic skills. I understand that the hon. Gentleman is standing up for his constituency and he is right to do so, but as I said, I have to reconcile that with the platform on which his party stood at the election.

Andrew Selous: I am slightly disappointed with the Minister's tone. I have not come here for party political knockabout. If he thinks back seriously to the election, he will remember that my party pledged to match every single penny that his party pledged to the education sector.

Phil Hope: Adjournment debates are not the time for party political knockabout, which is why I want to deal with the issues specific to Dunstable college. But it is worth reminding the House of the background to the situation with which we are now dealing.

The Government cannot and should not fund all the skills investment needed to sustain a competitive economy. Public money is always finite and it must benefit those who need it most, even if that means that some will have to pay more toward the cost of their learning. However, we do not want to lose courses that people value and enjoy, so finding a new balance of responsibilities between the Government—the taxpayer—employers and individual learners is crucial. That will require cultural changes and, I have to say, a fundamental shift in expectations and practice about who pays for what.

Only one in 10 colleges will have received an overall reduction to the budget, although for other colleges, the increases and allocations may not have been quite as high as expected or wanted. The Government and the Learning and Skills Council acknowledge that difficult decisions have to be made. There are many reasons why an individual college should find itself among the one in 10 with reduced budgets for 2005–06. Primarily, it is a combination of whether the focus lay outside Government priority areas in the past and historical underperformance.

[Phil Hope]

The hon. Gentleman asked about the timing and how much notice was given of the change that the sector is undergoing. Our skills strategy, published in 2003, set out our priorities. They were clearly repeated and published again by the LSC in December 2004 and repeated in January 2005. As a result, 16-to-18 learner numbers are expected to increase by 3 per cent.—an additional 18,000 young people in further education next year. That is good news, because participation at the age of 17 at the moment puts us fifth from bottom of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development league table. We have a target to get that up to 90 per cent. over the next decade—a big ambition that we will achieve only if we invest in 16-to-18 education. That also means that colleges with a significant focus on adult education are more likely to have received reduced allocations than those with higher numbers of 16 to 18-year-olds—all the more so where existing adult provision is not already aligned with Government priorities.

In the case of Dunstable college, that combination of circumstances is exactly what has happened. In comparison with other colleges in the area, the college had a particularly low number of 16 to 18-year-old learners, while having a particularly large number of adult learners. That, together with factors linked to course mix for both age groups, resulted in the college's budget for 2005–06 being reduced by £150,000 in comparison with 2004–05—a 2 per cent. reduction.

I am aware that the local learning and skills council considered the impact that the funding allocations might have on certain institutions. Local offices reviewed those initial allocations and reallocated funds, where they believed either that priority provision could be better served or where a college would be unduly disadvantaged. As a result, Dunstable college received an additional £233,000 through that process. I might add that the college has historically experienced financial difficulties, which the learning and skills council has been working with the college to address. Financial support in the past has been considerable. In May 2003, the college received £1.8 million of "exceptional support" from the local LSC.

I also understand that the current budget proposals that the hon. Gentleman has spoken about tonight are part of a wider review, which many colleges such as Dunstable are undertaking to look further into areas of financial viability and see how they can be made more efficient. I know, too, that there has been discussion between the college, the hon. Gentleman and the LSC about the perceived unfair treatment of both the college and the region in terms of adult budgets, but I am confident that the LSC has consistently applied the same funding criteria to all colleges in Bedfordshire and Luton—and, indeed, to those in the east of England. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that Bedfordshire has not been required to show a greater reduction in adult activity than other areas in the region. Any apparent variation between local offices is due to the differing ratios of 16 to18 adult activity and the extent of 16-to-18 growth.

Andrew Selous: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way generously again. The college has no quibble over the application of the formula by the Learning and Skills Council other than the fact that the Department directed it to do so. I have no doubt that the Government's own criteria were applied fairly, as instructed. The fact remains that that is pretty cold comfort to a college that has had an £833,000 cut in its budget, even though it did exactly what the LSC asked it to do all the way through from 2003, including significant growth in its 16-to-18 provision. I do not feel that the Minister has yet dealt with those issues.

Phil Hope: I do not want to remind the hon. Gentleman, but in 2003 the college received £1.8 million in exceptional funding to deal with the financial difficulties that it had experienced historically. When the formula operated and the priorities were applied, it was recognised that there would be an impact on the college. As a result, this year it received £233,000 more than the formula would have allocated to it. The overall reduction in the college's budget is £150,000, or 2 per cent. I accept that that is a reduction, but it shows that efforts have been made at a local level to understand the situation.

Andrew Selous: I appreciate that the Minister is a very busy man, responsible for every college in the country. I do not expect him to know the figures in detail, but I wonder whether the officials who have briefed him for this debate realise that the college faces a total net cut of £833,000. I do not see a recognition of that in the numbers that the Minister has quoted.

Phil Hope: This is a matter for discussion and negotiation at a local level with the LSC—which the hon. Gentleman's party would have abolished, of course. The figures that I have given were provided by the LSC, and they show the college's real position. The college and the LSC have made real and positive efforts to ameliorate the college's difficulties in this matter.

I have emphasised that the Government do not want courses that people value to close, whether they are used by individuals or employers. It is right that the Government should focus resources, and that is why our funding contribution to the basic cost of courses outside the priority areas has been reduced. The amount that the taxpayer provides for those courses has been cut from 75 per cent. of the costs to 72.5 per cent. The changes in funding are not merely technical matters; they are the first step in a necessary change of culture and expectations, in which the value of learning, and the benefits that it brings to learners and employers, is properly recognised as a worthwhile and necessary investment.

Colleges around the country have chosen to waive more than £100 million, at their own discretion, so that they can offer free or reduced-cost provision. I understand that Dunstable college's uncollected fees amounted to around £500,000 in 2003–04. Some colleges face a transitional period in this respect, but others are managing well. For example, I understand that nearby Barnfield college generates nearly £1.5 million a year from frees.

I recognise that waiving fees may help raise participation, but in time a decision not to collect potential income must impact on both quality and financial stability. There is therefore a strong case that those fees must be collected. We recognise that colleges need support in that, and we are committed to working with the sector to that end. For example, we have a good practice guide on fee income to assist colleges to collect fees.

Earlier, the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire quoted the AOC. I should like to refer to a briefing from the National Institute for Adult and Continuing Education. The briefing stated:

"NIACE is not against higher fees for those who can afford them. We believe that a high-fee, high-volume adult learning market, with generous concessions for the poor as of right, will result in more and different opportunities for adult learners than lower volumes in a low-fee economy. We believe that colleges which, in the past, have waived fees because there was little incentive to change, should begin a migration towards the sort of levels found in many local authority adult education services."

That shows that there is support for the transition outside the Government.

Andrew Selous: Again, I am most grateful to the Minister for giving way. I want to press him again specifically on fees. Is he seriously saying that he believes that Dunstable college can raise an extra £500,000 in fees from its current student population? I am assured by the principal that that is not possible.

Phil Hope: I was pointing out that this is a matter for the college, the principal, the governing body, the LSC and the hon. Gentleman, as the local the Member of Parliament, to discuss and debate. If a college chooses not to collect fees, that choice has consequences. I understand that colleges make those choices, but they must live with those consequences. Other colleges charge and collect fees, rather than choosing to waive them, and therefore have that income at their disposal.

I want to try to deal with one or two of the hon. Gentleman's other questions before we close, as time is now very short. I think that one of his questions was about demand for 16 to 19-year-olds being fully funded. The Learning and Skills Act 2000 provides the guarantee that all 16 to 18-year-olds have an entitlement to education or training. So we have ensured that places are available in school sixth forms, at further education or sixth form colleges, or on apprenticeships as a top priority, and that the funding to do so has been made available to the LSC.

The LSC has been equally clear in its guidance to local LSCs that funding for young people is a priority and that budgets should reflect that. The reality is that most colleges receive significant increases in their 16-to-18 budgets. An extra 10.3 per cent. or £240 million has been provided nationally for that group of learners. I realise that time has caught up with us and that I will not able to answer all the questions that the hon. Gentleman asked—

The motion having been made after Seven o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes past Eight o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

STANDING ORDERS

Ordered,

That the Amendments to Standing Orders set out in the Schedule be made:—

SCHEDULE

Standing Order 188B is hereby repealed.

New Standing Order 188B

Revival of bills

188B.—(1) Paragraphs (2) and (3) apply where—

(a) this House resolves that the promoters of a bill which—

(i) originated in this House in an earlier session of this Parliament or in the last Parliament; and

(ii) had not received the Royal Assent,

should have leave to proceed with the bill in the current session; and

(b) the House of Lords concur with the resolution, or have previously passed a resolution to the like effect as the resolution of this House.

(2) The petition for the bill shall be deemed to have been deposited and all Standing Orders applicable to it shall be deemed to have been complied with.

(3) The bill shall be deposited in the Private Bill Office not later than the fifth day on which the House sits after the passing of the resolution of this House, or (as applicable) the concurrence of the House of Lords, and a declaration, signed by the agent, shall be annexed to the bill stating that it is the same in every respect as the bill at the last stage of the proceedings on it in this House in the last session or the last Parliament or, as the case may be, the bill passed by this House.

(4) Paragraph (5) applies where—

(a) this House resolves that the promoters of a bill which—

(i) originated in the House of Lords in an earlier session of this Parliament or in the last Parliament; and

(ii) had not received the Royal Assent, should have leave to proceed with the bill in the current session; and

(b) the House of Lords subsequently pass a resolution to the like effect as the resolution of this House.

(5) If the bill is brought from the House of Lords in the current session, the agent for the bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration, signed by the agent, stating that the bill is the same in every respect as the bill which was brought from the Lords in the last session or the last Parliament.

(6) The following provisions of this Order apply in either case.

(7) The bill shall be deemed to have passed through every stage through which it has passed in the last session or last Parliament, and shall be recorded in the Journal of the House as having passed those stages, and no new fees shall be charged to those stages.

(8) If there is any petition outstanding—

(a) any such petition which has been presented (if not withdrawn) shall stand referred to any committee on the bill in the current session;

(b) any minutes of evidence taken before a committee on the bill in the last session or last Parliament shall stand referred to any committee on the bill in the current session;

(c) no petitioners shall be heard before any committee on the bill in the current session unless their petition has been presented within the time stipulated for the deposit of petitions in the last session or last Parliament or deposited pursuant to Standing Order 126(b);

(d) Standing Order 127 shall have effect as if the words "under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of petitions against bill)" were omitted.

(9) In this Order "current session" means the session of Parliament in which the resolution of this House is passed and "this Parliament" means the Parliament in which the resolution of this House is passed; "the last Parliament" and "the last session" shall be construed accordingly.'.—[The Chairman of Ways and Means.]

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Electricity Supplies

1. James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): What advice he has had from Ofgem on the security of electricity supplies. [13802]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): The Department is in regular contact with Ofgem. My hon. Friend the Minister for Energy has met John Mogg, chairman of Ofgem, on several occasions to discuss various issues, including security of electricity supply. The Government's and Ofgem's shared understanding of the outlook for electricity and gas supply is set out in a report, which has today been laid before the House. It is available in the Library. I propose, subject to the usual channels, to offer the House the chance to debate the report in the autumn.

James Duddridge: Given that severe weather this winter would require gas supplies to be cut off to industry to maintain electricity generation, and the fact that the Secretary of State has not explained what will replace some 30 per cent. of power station capacity, which is due to close in 2015, why has he placed a report before the House only today, when it was required under section 172 of the Energy Act 2004? Why does it take a parliamentary question from a mere first-time Back Bencher to elicit the information?

Alan Johnson: Not a mere Back Bencher, but someone who has forced the Government to produce a report today. We are not required by law to report at a specific time. Ofgem and the Government believed that the primary objective was to give as full and as clear a report as we could, including the issues that may come up this winter. That is why we have published the report now. The hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members would be glad to have a debate on an important and serious matter but it should not revolve around peripheral issues such as the timing of the report.

Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State tell the House what assessments he and his colleagues have made in the context of energy security of the work of places such as Woking, which now generates 135 per cent. of its electricity needs, and the Mayor of London's announcement that he wants London to be energy self sufficient in a decade? Is the Department working on the security implications of local generating systems?

Alan Johnson: Yes. We must ask whether we have what is called the headline plant margin—the headroom—when considering security of supply. We currently have 22 per cent. headroom whereas this time last year, we had only 16 per cent. That is important for security of supply.

We are also committed to renewable energy. We have the 10 per cent. renewables obligation. The announcement and the initiative that my hon. Friend mentioned make an important contribution to security of supply and the related issue of ensuring that we tackle climate change.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): There are an astonishing 65 written ministerial statements to be made on the last day of term but there is no written ministerial statement about security of supply on the Order Paper. The response that the Secretary of State should have given to the perspicacious question of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge) was, "By the skin of my teeth." He got the report out by the skin of his teeth.

The Secretary of State faces considerable problems. Did he see the following e-mail from his lead official? It states:

"The big issues you face are:

How to achieve the goals on climate change while also maintaining security of supply and international competitiveness.

How to handle the very tight supply/demand balance next Winter.

How far you can rely on the present market framework to deliver . . .

What role nuclear build and new technologies might play . . .

The implications of energy prices staying high or moving higher."

What has he got to say about that?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State needs to answer only one of those supplementaries.

Alan Johnson: I certainly did read that report—as did the rest of the British public, because it was leaked to three Sunday newspapers the weekend I was appointed. It set out the issues that we face on energy and replicated the points made in the 2003 energy White Paper. Of course security of supply is a central issue for the Government and for the House to tackle, as are climate change and the objective in the energy White Paper to ensure that we reduce the number of people in fuel poverty. Those are all important issues.

The hon. Gentleman said that we got the report out by the skin of our teeth. We have Trade and Industry questions today, and we have had a question from the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge)—on which I congratulate him; it is a very pertinent question—which has given me the opportunity to respond, and we have lodged a report, not a statement, in the Library of the House in anticipation of a debate in the autumn. Even the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin), on this last day of term, should accept that that is not a bad thing for the Government to do if we want a serious debate on security of energy supply.

Mr. Jenkin: I very much welcome the fact that the Secretary of State wants a serious debate on the security of energy supply. At the previous DTI questions, however, does he recall saying that he had only been in the job for five weeks? We can understand why he is feeling a little overwhelmed by what his predecessors have left in his in-tray—[Interruption.] Eight years, this Government have been in office. I should like the Secretary of State to confirm that this memorandum states:

"The electricity generating margin . . . could narrow sharply over periods this Winter . . . in the event of bad weather. The margin is also expected to tighten after 2008".

Are not those problems urgent? I am grateful for the debate that the right hon. Gentleman is to give us on the subject, because it is serious.

Alan Johnson: In the interest of having a proper debate on a serious issue, of course we have to look at this. The issue of security of supply is particularly important over the winter period, and that memorandum was pointing that out to an incoming Minister. We have dealt with this in terms of the market having the capacity to ensure security of supply, which is the right way to approach the matter. The Government have to ensure that we are convinced that the market is providing that capacity, well ahead of the winter period. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to say that officials should point out to me the challenges that we face, and it is absolutely right that we should debate those challenges in the House. I do not understand his argument that my predecessor has somehow left me in a bad situation. My predecessor did not pass a law to say that we were no longer to have bad winters, so we shall always have to prepare for them and ensure security of supply.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that nuclear power must play a major part in ensuring security of supply? What does he see as the short-term, medium-term and long-term prospects for supply from the nuclear industry?

Alan Johnson: When considering climate change and security of supply, we need to look right across the range, including at nuclear energy. My hon. Friend will know that our energy White Paper said that we had left the door open to nuclear energy. We also said that if we were going to go down the route to new build, we should need to produce a new White Paper and fresh consultation. That is still the Government's position. In the long term, after 2035 when the last existing nuclear power station closes, the issue will need to be addressed within this Parliament, as the Prime Minister has said.

Loan Sharks

2. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): If he will take steps to assist those who have been the victims of loan sharks and whose cases have passed through the courts. [13803]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): The Government recognise the need to protect consumers against unfair lending practices. The Consumer Credit Bill will modernise the consumer credit market and drive out rogues from the market. The Bill will make it much easier for consumers to challenge unfair loan agreements. There will be a new right to challenge unfair relationships arising out of the terms of loan agreements or the way in which the lender acts, and borrowers will also have the right to take disputes with their lenders to an ombudsman service, so that they do not have the added burden of going through a lengthy and expensive court battle.

Mr. Allen: May I pay a personal tribute to the Minister for moving forward the Consumer Credit Bill—it may well be the first Bill of this Parliament that passes all stages; I certainly hope so—and to Opposition Members for their constructive contribution to it in Committee? The Minister will remember that I brought a case to his attention recently. Mr. Frederick Jones took out a loan of £7,700 and ended up having to pay back £110,000. Will the Minister ensure that even people like Mr. Jones, whose cases have been through the courts, will now be caught by the retrospectivity clauses in the Bill? We are all very grateful that those clauses have been included, particularly people such as Mr. Jones and, I am sure, the constituents of many other hon. Members.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks and the work that he has carried out on behalf of Mr. Jones. He knows that I cannot go into the detail of the case, but Mr. Jones's case was an inspiration to all of us in bringing forward legislation. I would like to add my thanks to the Opposition for the constructive way in which the Bill has gone through the House so rapidly. I assure my hon. Friend, however, that the unfairness test and the licensing regime will prevent the type of case with which Mr. Jones had to deal from happening again.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): As the Minister will be aware, we had good debates in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading. I echo his comments in terms of the constructive approach taken by all parties to getting a way forward for protecting debtors and lenders. Will he give a firm commitment to review the effect of the legislation once it is in place, because considerable concerns were expressed as to the effect of the new law, and particularly whether it would have the unintended consequence of driving commercial lenders out of the market for those on low and uncertain incomes, thereby giving succour to the loan sharks whom we do not want preying on the most vulnerable members of our community?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The point is well made. The Consumer Credit Bill is not to be seen in isolation—we have introduced loan shark pilots in Birmingham and Glasgow, we are working with credit unions, and we are working on financial inclusion We are considering all the issues in relation to education, money advice and debt counselling. The Bill is central to that, but we will review the situation in two years, as is normal practice for Governments. I remind the House, however, that the last time that consumer credit was considered in terms of legislation was 1974, so the Bill is certainly needed.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): The best way to ensure that those who are victims of loan sharks no longer become victims is through financial inclusion. In that respect, the Government's response to the Treasury Committee's report on cash machines is breathtakingly complacent and blind to the trends in that industry. Can the Minister assure me that he will work with his colleagues in the Treasury and the Department for Work and Pensions, along with the Treasury Committee, to ensure that we get reasonable financial inclusion and achieve the goal of bringing the financially excluded into the mainstream financial community?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend, who is the Chairman of the Treasury Committee, and to the work that that Committee has done on this and related issues. I assure him that the financial inclusion fund will provide £45 million to be spent on education and support for bodies that help individuals. We are determined to make sure that people get as much advice as possible, that they are financially included, and that they benefit from the country's good economic position.

Manufacturing Jobs

3. Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): What steps he is taking to protect jobs in manufacturing industry. [13804]

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Alun Michael): Our policy is to provide the right macro-economic conditions and support to enable British companies to compete successfully in world markets. Manufacturing employment is falling in all advanced economies as global competition increases, so the Government manufacturing strategy seeks to help manufacturing companies move to high-value manufacturing with high-skill jobs.

Mrs. Moon: As Parliament faces the recess, workers in two factories in my constituency face a summer shutdown tomorrow. This morning, I was yet again contacted by the BBC informing me that 250 workers at the Pendragon furniture factory will face that shutdown with redundancy payments. What reassurance can I take to the workers of Christy Tyler, Sony and Wrigley Kraft that they will not face a summer of uncertainty about whether there will be jobs waiting for them at the end, that the Department will work with its equivalent in the Welsh Assembly Government to bring new high-value, high-quality jobs to Wales that will suit their capacity and skills, and that they will not face a future on the scrap heap as they would have done under the Conservative party?

Alun Michael: I can certainly empathise with that final point. We must set this in context, because the Bridgend labour market is relatively buoyant, although the town has taken a battering lately, and I pay tribute to my hon. Friend and her colleagues in neighbouring constituencies for their work to try to address the immediate problems of the area. Some of the changes are inevitable. The Sony factory, for instance, which produces screens, is a pretty inevitable casualty of the move to flat screens, which are much more mobile around the world. That does not make it any less devastating, however, for the individuals and families involved. I know that colleagues in the Welsh Assembly Government are working with Team Wales partners—the Welsh Development Agency, ELWa, Jobcentre Plus, Careers Wales and others—and are ready to provide co-ordinated assistance and support to help people move on to fresh employment opportunities in what remains, on the whole, a relatively healthy labour market.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): The Minister will be aware that the French Trade Minister and Prime Minister are vigorously promoting the idea that the best way to protect manufacturing jobs is to create a wall of tariffs and quotas around industries faced with international competition. What success have his Government had in persuading the European Trade Commissioner and other Ministers that that would be totally counterproductive and disastrous in the long term?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman is right to signal this point, which I made at the outset. The way to safeguard jobs for the future is to go for high-value, high-quality jobs and an innovative economy. We cannot be protective about these matters; we must compete in what is a challenging world market. In the short time in which I have been in this job, I have been very impressed by the engagement of people in the manufacturing industry. Yesterday, I attended a meeting of the Manufacturing Forum, which I chair jointly with Kevin Smith of GKN. The energy and will to take forward manufacturing in this country is palpable, and that is the direction in which we should take our economy.

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): May I commend the Government on the protection that they have provided for manufacturing jobs and on the various policies that they have implemented? The steel industry is very important to manufacturing jobs in my area, and a research centre called the Teesside technology centre has done well in helping the industry, which faced closure in the past few years, but—thank goodness—is to remain open. Will the Minister meet the Corus research and development team to see whether there is a way to support and protect the long-term future of the Teesside division of the steel industry?

Alun Michael: I am pleased to tell my hon. Friend that I am meeting Corus top management this afternoon, and I am certainly happy to look at any aspects of development that can assist. The steel industry is experiencing a challenging time after a relatively successful few years, and it is important that we work with it, and with Corus in particular.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): The Minister is right to say that there is a general decline in manufacturing jobs—not just in the United Kingdom but in other western countries—as we face competition from global giants such as China and other countries with low-wage economies, and he is also right to say that the Government must have total regard to macro-economic policy. However, given that we have lost 1 million jobs, and that the percentage of jobs in manufacturing has fallen from 18 to 13 per cent. in the past seven or eight years, what fresh initiatives can he announce today to stop this inexorable decline?

Alun Michael: I do not think it appropriate to try to pull rabbits out of the hat; rather, we must work continually with the industry to improve the situation. We live in a challenging environment and we do not like the fact that we lost some 81,000 manufacturing jobs last year, but that pales in comparison with the recessions of the 1980s and 1990s. Some 673,000 manufacturing jobs were lost in 1981, and 422,000 were lost in 1991. [Interruption.] Yes, those people—the sort of people whom we on the Labour Benches represent—lost their jobs as a result of the Conservatives' neglect of manufacturing. I should point out that some 51,400—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): Despite the support given to the LG Philips manufacturing plant in my constituency, tragically, it is closing tomorrow. Will my right hon. Friend join me in wishing the taskforce, which is funded by his Department, well as it seeks to get the excellent and highly skilled staff into new employment?

Alun Michael: Yes, indeed. We have an economy in which employment is at record levels. There is therefore strength in the economy and an opportunity for taskforces of that sort to look for high-quality jobs and to expand local economies in response to events. It is always sad when a long-standing employer, and very often a high-quality one, is affected by the competitive market in which we operate, but looking to the future is what is important. I recommend all hon. Members to support the enterprise week coming up in November and to encourage others. If we had the number of women setting up business that there are in America, for example, we would have another three quarters of a million companies. We need to encourage enterprise by our young people, and by everybody, to respond to the challenges we face, and I wish the taskforce well in tackling the local issues referred to by my hon. Friend.

Mines Rescue Service

4. Colin Burgon (Elmet) (Lab): What plans there are for funding for the Mines Rescue Service. [13805]

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): The Coal Authority, a DTI-sponsored non-departmental public body, has provided £5 million of support to the Mines Rescue Service over the last two years, using unexpected gains from the sale of property assets inherited from British Coal. It appears unlikely at this stage, however, that further gains will emerge to enable such funding this year or in future.

Colin Burgon: That is precisely why I am asking the Government to step in. We are talking about peanuts—£2.5 million. We have fewer than 10 deep mines in this country, and that is a real problem. I know that the Minister is extremely perceptive and intelligent—[HON. MEMS: "Hear, hear!"] I am not after a job. The Minister knows that we must keep a range of choices open to us in the energy market, and we should be supporting the deep-mine coal industry. That £2.5 million, when set alongside what I have read this week we are giving to privatised British Energy—£184 million this year and every year until 2086; I never did the numeracy—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure that the Minister has got the message.

Malcolm Wicks: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind comments; in turn, I have always regarded him as a man of great judgment.

The mines rescue scheme provided by MRS Ltd. is a statutory requirement. In the absence of Government funding, the levy on deep-mine operators applies, in accordance with the scheme. Mine safety and security are paramount. Rest assured, we will keep a careful eye on its funding.

Royal Mail

5. Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the future of the Royal Mail. [13806]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Alan Johnson): We will not privatise Royal Mail. We will pursue our ambition of a seeing a publicly owned Royal Mail fully restored to good health, providing customers with an excellent service and its staff with rewarding employment. I am pleased to announce that I am today appointing Professor Sir George Bain to support me in working on Royal Mail issues.

Mr. Grogan: Can my right hon. Friend assure the 100-plus Labour Back Benchers who have signed early-day motion 548, which supports our manifesto commitment on a successful, publicly owned Royal Mail, that 100 per cent. of the shares will continue to be owned by the Government?

Alan Johnson: I will certainly reiterate our manifesto commitment on privatisation. My hon. Friend makes a point that I think is directed at whether there should be an employee share trust. I am not ruling that out, and as a former employee of Royal Mail for many years, I do not think that the House should rule it out. It is worthy of examination, and it is certainly something that we should look at on the basis of seeking to restore Royal Mail to full health and to take it further along the road that it commenced upon in 2002.

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): Is the Minister aware that closures of several sub-post offices in my constituency have caused inconvenience and concern to many, including pensioners? Does he agree that Royal Mail should consider its Post Office subsidiary and try to get it to diversify, so that more post offices can remain open as community facilities?

Alan Johnson: That is an important point, which was highlighted in the performance and innovation unit report in 1999 on the post office network, which gained broad support across the House. Part of the report was about the transformation of the Post Office as it loses its traditional customer base. Some 40 per cent. of its work was paying out pensions and benefits, but more and more people have those paid into their bank accounts. There is an enormous opportunity for the network to move to new forms of work, including community-based work. There is an awful lot going on, with the support of the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters, in order to make that work, but the simple message is that people have to use the initiatives and use the post offices. Post offices have to get the footfall because if they do not, they will be commercially unviable for the independent small business men who run them.

Geraldine Smith (Morecambe and Lunesdale) (Lab): I believe that the partial sale of the Post Office through an employee buy-out would be privatisation by the back door and I am alarmed to hear my right hon. Friend say that he has not ruled it out. When will he end the speculation? We find out information because Allan Leighton makes statements in the national media; indeed, there was a statement only last week. We need the matter cleared up. If my right hon. Friend is not ruling it out, is he ruling it in? When will he make a proper statement on this issue?

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is another former employee of Royal Mail; there seem to be a lot of us around today. I disagree with her on the issue of employee ownership. In all my time as leader of the Communication Workers Union, I looked for ways in which employees could have a bigger stake and involvement in the company that, day in and day out, they helped to make successful. I am surprised that from Labour Benches people are asking me to rule out employee involvement. Our manifesto commitment was to look carefully at the impact of full market liberalisation on the Royal Mail, the universal service obligation and the uniform tariff. That is a job of work that cannot be done with one statement to the House. It requires a thorough job of work. It will involve Royal Mail, the unions, the regulator and now Sir George Bain to help me to bring those different factors together.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk) (LD): We are told that Royal Mail requires £2 billion to £3 billion to invest in automation to catch up with its continental rivals. We are also told that there is a deficit of about £2.5 billion in the pension fund. We have full liberalisation on 1 January. What plans does the Secretary of State have for Royal Mail to obtain the money that it needs to invest in automation and to remove the pension deficit?

Alan Johnson: Those are the very issues that we need to look at. Royal Mail has gone from a position in 2002 when it had losses of about £360 million to a position this year in which it has profits of £500 million. So the organisation is moving forward. I reject completely the argument that the only way to create a successful, profitable Royal Mail is to privatise it. A public sector success story with full commercial freedom is within the grasp of Royal Mail. We intend to tackle the very real problems that the hon. Gentleman mentions and ensure that we make Royal Mail an exemplar across the world of a successful publicly owned company.

Post Office

6. Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): When he last met representatives of the Union of Communication Workers to discuss the future of the Post Office. [13807]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State meets all the stakeholders in the postal services market on a regular basis to discuss a range of issues including the future of the company. My right hon. Friend last met representatives from the Communication Workers Union on 24 May 2005 and will be meeting members of the parliamentary trade union and CWU group later today. I will be meeting CWU representatives on Monday next week.

Kate Hoey: Will my hon. Friend congratulate the CWU members, particularly in the south-west branch, on the news that the Royal Mail has won the contract to continue working in the Palace of Westminster? I am sure that all hon. Members welcome that. Why is it necessary for this country to liberalise its postal services long before the rest of Europe is doing so? Surely that will put our postal service at a disadvantage?

Barry Gardiner: Of course I join my hon. Friend, and indeed the whole House joins her, in congratulating the members who have won the service for the House of Commons work. We are pleased to see that situation continue.

Full liberalisation of the market is something that Royal Mail itself has embraced. The regulator believes that it is the right thing to do. The reason why liberalisation of the market has taken place a year earlier than in the rest of the Europe is that Royal Mail believes that it is the best way of preparing the company ahead of time to take advantage when the rest of Europe liberalises. That is its stated position, and it is one that I urge my hon. Friend to discuss with it most carefully.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): According to the newspapers today, Allan Leighton has said that if price controls were put on stamps, it could lead to the loss of 40,000 jobs, or a quarter of the work force. That would devastate the rural network and have a huge impact on the urban network. Can the Minister give an assurance that such job losses will not occur?

Barry Gardiner: The hon. Gentleman knows full well that the proposals have been set out by the regulator, but no final decision has been taken. We are in a period of consultation on the price control mechanism, which will not be concluded until later this year. Therefore, it is redundant to speculate on the price of stamps to 2010 at this stage. The hon. Gentleman makes a point about the rural network and, indeed, the rest of the network, but this Government have invested £2 billion in updating post offices and the Royal Mail. Yes, there have been closures in the rural network and through the urban reinvention programme—

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): The urban closure programme.

Barry Gardiner: The hon. Gentleman is obviously unaware of the programme and the £210 million. This Government have invested £2 billion to ensure a successful future for the Royal Mail, whereas the hon. Gentleman's party closed 3,500 post offices without putting in any such investment.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): When my hon. Friend talks to the union, will he make it clear that many Labour Members agree with many of its members that there is not one model of public enterprise? As a lifelong co-operator, I believe that the enterprise that works best is the one in which every member of the work force has a share. That is a good rule and I hope that it will not be cast aside.

Barry Gardiner: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. Indeed, the first time that I ever stood for public office was as a Labour and Co-operative candidate. Those principles have always been very dear to me and I hope that we can expand them in government.

India (Bilateral Trade)

7. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): If he will make a statement on bilateral trade with India. [13808]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): Our bilateral trade relationship with India has never been better. Data for the first quarter of 2005 indicate a 23.9 per cent. increase in trade over the same quarter in 2004. That is good news, but there is still plenty of room for improvement. I am pleased to report that the Joint Economic and Trade Committee, announced by both Prime Ministers in September last year, is already making good progress in areas such as air services, legal services and the creative and media sector.

Peter Luff: I think that the Minister has confirmed with that answer that the story of trade with India is of the cup being half empty and half full. There is much of which to be proud, but much more that could be done. Will he put pressure on the Indian Government to continue liberalisation in key sectors, such as insurance? With respect to the Joint Economic and Trade Committee, will he consider the possibility of establishing industry-led groups in key areas, such as infrastructure and life sciences, to draw the full attention of British businesses to the huge opportunities that exist in India?

Ian Pearson: The hon. Gentleman is right about the importance of India as a market today and for the future. He will be aware of the work of the Joint Economic and Trade Committee in areas such as those he mentioned, including infrastructure, on which we need to do more. He is right about insurance, because we want to see greater opening of the market in India. He also mentioned life and biosciences and that is another area in which we want to see co-operation in the future. Total trade at present, including services, is some £6 billion per annum, which is good business for the UK and for India.

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): India has the largest number of graduates and postgraduates in computer science and the UK has more than 100,000 vacancies. We are fast-forwarding entry visas for people from India to take jobs in this country. Is there any way that we can copy and borrow India's system for training its computer scientists so that we can employ our own people?

Ian Pearson: The important thing is to recognise the strengths in IT training in both the UK and India. Recently, there has been inward investment from Indian companies such as Infosys, Wypro and Tata Consultancy Services, which are all in the ICT sector. We want that to continue to grow and we want skilled, high-quality jobs in the UK. My hon. Friend has a point about the number of high-quality, skilled Indians being trained in that country.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the gross disparity between the import tariffs applied to leather used in our indigenous gloving industry derived from India and that from the Republic of China? Will he look into the matter and write to me?

Ian Pearson: I would be happy to look into the detailed point that the hon. Gentleman made, but I would like to say something on the more general point—the World Trade Organisation negotiations in Hong Kong. India has a crucial role to play in those negotiations. We want real progress to be made in Hong Kong in December and a pro-poor outcome to the Doha development round, which will benefit the least developing countries as well as countries such as India and the UK. There are gains to be made in trade for all of us.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Obviously, my hon. Friend is aware of the importance of trade with all the countries of the Association of South East Asian Nations. India is an important area for UK exports, so what is the ministerial team doing? How often do Ministers visit India and which big contracts are they promoting? There is much aerospace work to be taken up, so can my hon. Friend tell the House what we are doing about that?

Ian Pearson: My hon. Friend is right about the opportunities in aerospace, but there are also opportunities in a wide range of other sectors. One of the things that the Joint Economic and Trade Committee decided to do was to hold an annual summit, and my hon. Friend is probably aware that the Prime Minister will be visiting India with a business delegation in September. Regular ministerial visits are planned to India in the future because we recognise the importance of that country as a market.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): Given the historical and beneficial connections between Britain and India, what is the case for leaving the European Union in complete control of our trading relations with India?

Ian Pearson: I find that quite staggering. The hon. Lady will be aware that when we joined the Common Market in 1973 we signed up for the common commercial policy, which means that the EU has competence in negotiating trade agreements. We obviously have a role in the EU as a member state, but when there is a single market we cannot have one rule on trade policy for the UK and another rule for France, another for Germany and another for Spain. It is wrong and ignorant to suggest that we could.

Deep Coal Industry

8. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): When he last met representatives from the deep coal industry to discuss investment aid. [13809]

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): Both I and my predecessors have held meetings on a regular basis with representatives of the deep coal industry. Investment aid is usually among the issues discussed.

Paddy Tipping: Will the Minister agree to meet representatives of the work force of the three remaining collieries in Nottinghamshire—Harworth, Thoresby and Welbeck—to discuss real and immediate issues? First, there are bids in the Department for about £100 million for investment aid, but no resources to meet them. Secondly, there are immediate problems at Harworth colliery. The pit is to be mothballed next spring, but let us be clear: in this case, mothballing is another name for closure.

Malcolm Wicks: I would welcome an opportunity to meet representatives of the work force, and my hon. Friend, to discuss these matters, particularly Harworth colliery. We are very sorry to hear that technical problems have meant that Harworth has had to close down, we hope temporarily. There has been considerable Government investment into Harworth. Yes, we will meet and I look forward to that meeting.

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Will the Minister comment on whether technological innovation in terms of clean coal and carbon capture will have an impact on investment aid to the coal industry and the future of the industry itself?

Malcolm Wicks: In terms of the international climate change challenge this is crucial because much coal will be burned in the decades to come, not least in emerging economies such as China, so clean coal technology and, in other areas, carbon abatement and carbon capture are the technologies that will count in the decades to come. Of course we will look at the role of those technologies in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): It would make a lot more sense if Tories getting up to talk about clean coal would remember that we had a clean coal plan at Grimethorpe in South Yorkshire and the Tories closed that pit. The Government have given money to UK Coal for almost every pit that has subsequently closed; we have done that every time. The same will apply to Harworth. I just want to warn my hon. Friend that giving money to put in the pockets of UK Coal does not in the long term save the jobs of the miners. What it does is enable UK Coal, which is in reality a property company, to have more money to buy more land, in order to develop it when it has shut the pit. There is only one answer: we have got to take those six remaining pits back into public ownership.

Malcolm Wicks: I was uncertain, up until the last sentence, of what my hon. Friend's position was on that.

Mr. Skinner: What is wrong with it?

Malcolm Wicks: This is a very serious issue. There are immediate issues facing certain coal mines, which we are addressing; none of these things is easy. There is a more strategic issue about the future of British coal, which I think we need to look at in the wider context of energy supply in the 21st century.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): Looking forward, not back, does the Minister accept that long-term price stability is the key issue for the deep coal industry, without which investment is not possible? When the Government review the security of energy supplies, will they consider what can be done to guarantee a long-term price structure for the industry?

Malcolm Wicks: That is not easy when prices of different sources of energy are rising worldwide, but we will certainly bear that point in mind. We always look forward, not back, and I am glad that the Conservative party is beginning to brush up on its communication skills.

International Trade Agreements

9. Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): What proportion of the UK's international trade agreements were negotiated by (a) the Government and (b) the EU in each of the last three years. [13800]

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): The European Commission has negotiated all the EU's trade agreements on behalf of member states in the past three years.

Daniel Kawczynski: I thank the Minister for that reply. However, when negotiating with important international partners like China and India, it is important to be able to speak on one's own behalf. When the negotiators go in and negotiate on behalf of 25 countries, it is far more difficult for them to strike a good deal. This is of great concern to me and I would rather that Great Britain negotiated its own international contracts.

Ian Pearson: The common commercial policy is one of the foundation stones of the European Union. If the Conservative party is saying that it wants to withdraw from that, it is really saying that it wants to withdraw from Europe. It needs to make its position clear on that.

The 25 member states will agree a negotiating mandate and the Commissioner will then negotiate agreements. He will keep in close touch with the member states during those negotiations and it will be up to the member states to ratify the outcome of any negotiations. There is clear member state involvement in the process. However, we are part of the European Union. It is an important home market for us of more than 450 million people, and we do have to sign up to the terms of its agreement.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that it is not just a question of negotiating those agreements? It is also important to make sure that our EU partners stick to them. Fifty years ago, one in every 10 white shirts in the world was manufactured in Leicester, but the textile industry has been devastated because of the dumping of textiles by non-EU countries in EU countries, and no action is taken against them. What steps is my hon. Friend taking to ensure that our partners stick to the agreements that have been negotiated?

Ian Pearson: My hon. Friend is right to say that it is important that all partners stick to agreements. He will be aware of the EU's anti-dumping legislation, which has recently been applied to textiles. The Trade Commissioner, Peter Mandelson, recently negotiated on behalf of the EU an agreement on the limitation of exports from China to the EU market. As my hon. Friend knows, there has been a massive restructuring in the UK textile industry as a result of the end of the multi-fibre arrangement. We have planned ahead, but other countries have not. We must take account of the fact that we will not be able to compete in future on the basis of low value added goods.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

The Minister was asked—

Positive Discrimination

20. Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): If she will make a statement on Government policy on positive discrimination in the workplace. [13822]

The Minister for Women (Tessa Jowell): Positive discrimination is illegal. We are committed to promoting equality of opportunity in the workplace and selection on the basis of merit. The duties on public authorities to promote gender and race equality and equality for disabled people are part of that commitment.

Philip Davies: Does the Minister agree that jobs should always be given on the basis of ability, not gender, and that so-called positive discrimination is no different from any other form of discrimination? Will she use her offices to stamp out such patronising political correctness?

Tessa Jowell: Yes, I agree that jobs should be awarded on the basis of ability. That is why, whereas the Government maintain the illegality of positive discrimination, we support positive action so that the talents of women, disabled people and other discriminated-against groups can be fully utilised.

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that women want no part of discrimination? They want to be able to take their rightful place in the workplace, and they want family friendly policies and decent, affordable, good-quality child care. They want to do their job alongside everyone else and to play their proper part in our economic well-being.

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend is right. As she knows, having been a strong supporter at every stage of these policies, the Government have over the past years introduced policies to extend child care, to increase the rights of women at work, and particularly to extend the right of women to request to return to work part-time and to work flexibly—a benefit that about a fifth of all women have so far sought to use.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): May I ask the right hon. Lady to check whether it is right to say that among first-line supervisors in the civil service 60 per cent. are female, but two promotions higher, 60 per cent. are male? Does that reflect the suitability of people for the job or some kind of indirect discrimination? I am not accusing her of supporting it, but action is needed to get rid of it.

Tessa Jowell: The hon. Gentleman makes an extremely important point. Progress has been slow and the pace of women's advancement has been less than would be expected on the basis of their talent. That is why positive action and the approaches to flexible working that have often removed the obstacles to women's progress are so important—not just for women, but for our economy and the efficiency and good performance of our organisations, such as the civil service.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): I was interested to hear my right hon. Friend's comments on positive action rather than discrimination. What steps can be taken to assist industries, such as the construction industry, which have a traditional image of being heavy and dirty—in fact no longer an accurate picture—actively to encourage more women into their work force? Will she please acknowledge that historically there have been real barriers to the employment of women in some areas?

Tessa Jowell: I entirely—[Interruption.] This is precisely the problem. When one tries to have a serious debate about labour market segregation and the fact that women's employment is clustered in a small number of sectors of our labour market, Opposition Front-Bench Members treat it as a joke. This is precisely the kind of area where positive action and the engagement of young women in school is so important.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): I agree with almost everything that the Secretary of State has just said, and of course the Opposition entirely support fair treatment of all women. It is why we support the Equality Bill, which is now in the other place. However, does she agree that positive discrimination is wrong in all cases in all workplaces, and that includes this workplace and the selection process for parliamentary candidates? Does she further agree that positive discrimination in the long term does harm to women because it is like saying that men can always swim on their own, but women always need to wear water wings? It is not right; it is not true. Women can do it all on their own.

Tessa Jowell: In time, the hon. Lady will come to regret those remarks. One of the many reasons why the Opposition are seen as so out of touch and outdated is that they have not sought to ensure that parliamentary representation represents the country as a whole. She is a lone voice, but has a very long way to go.

Gender and Poverty

21. Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): What discussions she has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer about gender and poverty in the United Kingdom. [13823]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): I welcome the range of measures discussed between my predecessors and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer concerning the impact on gender and poverty such as the national minimum wage, child and family tax credits, legislation on flexible working and measures to close the gender pay gap.

Vera Baird: I am grateful for that reply. My primary concern is with women in retirement who are poor. The pension credit has helped 1.3 million women out of poverty, but my hon. Friend will agree that they are poorer in the first place primarily because, relative to men, they have low pay throughout their lives and cannot save. Also, when they are caring for children or elders the credit system does not properly credit them in, so that they cannot even acquire a full basic state pension. Does she agree that this is a major outstanding issue of gender equality? Granted that the state pension is the state's responsibility, does she expect that when the duty on public authorities to promote gender equality comes into force things will have to change quickly? Will she use her considerable influence to accelerate that process?

Meg Munn: My hon. and learned Friend makes some extremely good points. The issues about pay are enormously important. She will be aware that we have established the women and work commission, which will report in due course, to look at the pay gap and the fundamental problems around that. I can assure her that I have taken very seriously the issue about pensions. I have already met the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and he recognises that women and their pension needs will be a major issue in the national pension debate, which will need to consider a range of matters, including caring.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I appreciate the Minister's response on pensions, but is she aware of the Fawcett Society's audit of women's economic welfare in Britain? It says:

"There is a risk . . . that the Government's anti-poverty strategy serves to reinforce women's economic inequality."

An example of that is pensions, where money is available if women go cap in hand, but little is done to address the underlying problem. Does she agree that citizens' pensions are a way forward?

Meg Munn: As I have said, the fact that women are poor in old age is not due to one factor alone. The appropriate future for pensions will be the subject of considerable discussion. Reports are due to be published in the not-too-distant future. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions wants a national debate, to which I welcome the hon. Lady and her party.

Child Care

22. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): What steps she is taking to support the development of child care as a business. [13824]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Meg Munn): I have contributed to a number of measures, including the development of a leaflet for businesses to support employees with child care provision, which forms part of the gender equality public service agreement for 2005–08, and in delivering targets within the strategic framework for women's enterprise.

Linda Gilroy: Does my hon. Friend agree that co-operative and mutual models of ownership lend themselves particularly to the child care sector? Will she give consideration to the Get Up and Go nursery on the site of the Community Economic Development Trust in my constituency? Indeed, may I invite her to visit it later this year, when I hope she will come to Plymouth?

Meg Munn: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. United Kingdom research on social enterprises showed that more than 700 of the 15,000 most common types of social enterprise—approximately 5 per cent.—were in the child care business, but I agree with my hon. Friend that the sector has an opportunity to grow considerably more.

I should be delighted to go and see the Get Up and Go child care provision. It sounds extremely interesting, and I hope to be able to visit the nursery soon.

Armed Forces (Modernisation)

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): (urgent question): To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his plans for defence modernisation, and in particular if he will make a statement on the future of the Saxa Vord station in Unst.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): Defence modernisation measures announced to Parliament and to Ministry of Defence staff today will improve the support given to our armed forces, release resources for the front line and for new capabilities, and make the best use of taxpayers' money. The future defence supply chain initiative will improve current service levels, enhance operational capability and put the armed forces in a better position to cope with "surge" logistics requirements, while also significantly reducing costs.

The Ministry of Defence has selected an in-house option, which involved close consultation with the trade unions, to provide the best possible combination of effectiveness and cost in our defence supply chain. By updating processes, improving staff training, rationalising the distribution network and closing storage depots at Stafford by the end of 2007, Llangennech by mid-2008 and Longtown by mid-2009, we expect to make savings of over £50 million a year by 2010 and over £400 million during the next 10 years. The new organisation will require about 2,000 fewer civilian posts and about 50 fewer armed forces personnel. Those reductions will contribute to the wider MOD manpower reductions announced in the 2004 White Paper.

A study of the future role of the defence munitions centre at Crombie in west Dunfermline has been completed, and the MOD has decided—subject to consultation with the national trade unions—to implement its recommendations. The study determined that the explosives storage capacity available at DMC Crombie was not required to meet the known and projected storage liability of its customers. In future, Crombie will concentrate on providing a loading-offloading function for Her Majesty's ships and royal fleet auxiliaries, together with berthing and other jetty operations.

If the study's recommendations are implemented, there will be a reduction of 142 posts at DMC Crombie. It is expected that 67 posts will go in the first year, with the remaining 75 being phased out between 2006–07 and 2009–10. Implementation of the recommendations will have the potential to deliver savings of some £18.1 million over 10 years. Subject to the conclusion of trade union consultation, the Army Base Repair Organisation's proposal to start phase 1 of a two-part rationalisation programme will also begin. Phase 1 addresses the immediate impact of the downturn in the ABRO defence revenue projections, but it will not diminish the range of capabilities that the organisation can currently deliver to the front line. As a result, ABRO will reduce its head count to approximately 2,150 posts by 31 March 2006, which includes the potential for up to 246 redundancies.

The changes will realise annual manpower cost savings in the region of £2.1 million in 2005–06, and £8.3 million a year thereafter. As a direct consequence of an announcement made today by Rolls-Royce Defence Aerospace on the outcome of an open competition for future overhaul and component repair on RB199 engine modules, up to 50 jobs will also be lost at the Defence Aviation Repair Agency's engines business unit at Fleetlands in Gosport, Hampshire. The Ministry of Defence has agreed that DARA can now begin the formal 30-day consultation process with the trade unions.

The 2003 defence White Paper recognised that the international situation is radically different from that of the cold war. As a consequence, the size and structure of our armed forces have been subject to a great many changes as our armed forces have adapted to meet the changed environment. The Ministry of Defence is also announcing two such changes today. The cold war radar station at RAF Saxa Vord on the Shetland island of Unst will be put on care and maintenance from April 2006, subject to consultation with the trade unions. That will mean that the station is effectively closed, but that the main operational part of the estate will continue to be maintained should it be required for future use. Further work will be undertaken to consider how much of the remainder of the station will be retained. Radar cover at the level required can be provided by other RAF radars augmented by those of the National Air Traffic Service. Placing the station on care and maintenance means that we can reinstate radar capability should the threat assessment change. Some 70 service personnel, 30 MOD civilians and 10 contractor staff will be affected by the proposal.

I understand that that will be disappointing news for our staff, the island of Unst, which has a population of about 700, and the Shetland islands community. Naturally, I will be happy to work with the Scottish Executive, the local authority and hon. Members to consider any measures within the MOD remit that might help the local community adjust to the proposed change.

As announced on 21 July 2004, ground-based air defence will also be transferred to the Army, and the four RAF GBAD squadrons will be disbanded. I can now inform the House that 37 Squadron RAF Regiment based at RAF Wittering will disband by March 2006, that 16 Squadron, based at RAF Honington, will disband by March 2007 and that 15 Squadron and the RAF GBAD wing headquarters, which is also based at RAF Honington, and 26 Squadron based at RAF Waddington, will disband by March 2008. This phased programme will allow the Royal Regiment of Artillery to take over the pan-GBAD role. The RAF Regiment will now focus on its role protecting other elements of the armed forces particularly on deployment.

As part of those changes, both 3 Squadron RAF Regiment, based at RAF Aldergrove—[Interruption.] Hon. Members should be patient, calm down and listen. As part of those changes, both 3 Squadron RAF Regiment, based at RAF Aldergrove and the Queen's Colour Squadron, based at RAF Uxbridge will be expanded by around 40 personnel each to enhance their operational capability to match that of the other four regular RAF Regiment field squadrons. That will improve the units' ability to deploy on operations and so enhance the operational flexibility of the RAF Regiment in its force protection role. Around 340 posts will be lost as a result of these changes, which form part of the 7,500 post reductions announced last July. I do not know where Opposition Members were when that was announced. I do not expect any redundancies additional to those announced in the House on 9 December 2004 to result from this announcement.

As a consequence of the decision taken last July, the RAF has conducted an overall review of the structure and basing of the RAF Regiment. As a result of that work, 1 Squadron RAF Regiment will move from RAF St. Mawgan to RAF Honington by March 2007. In addition, 2625 (County of Cornwall) Squadron Royal Auxiliary Air Force Regiment, based alongside 1 Squadron at RAF St. Mawgan will be disbanded with effect from November 2006. That decision has been taken because Royal Auxiliary Air Force Regiment squadrons need to be based alongside regular units to maximise training opportunities and to give auxiliary personnel access to equipment held by the regular unit. With 1 Squadron's relocation, that would not be possible at St. Mawgan. Around 75 reservists will be affected. Members of 2625 Squadron will be offered the opportunity to continue their reservist activities with other parts of the armed forces reservist organisations or with an alternative RAF unit elsewhere.

We are doing everything possible to mitigate the impact on the people affected by these announcements. Our current plans envisage that the majority of reductions will be achieved through a combination of natural wastage and voluntary early release, but some compulsory redundancies may prove necessary. Staff and the trade unions are being kept fully informed of developments through meetings, briefings and formal consultation.

Finally—[HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] Hon. Members want the information, and they are getting it—why are they complaining? Finally, the Ministry of Defence is today announcing that the Royal Navy military afloat reach and sustainability—MARS—project has been granted approval to enter the assessment phase of the programme. That is good news for the Royal Navy and for the UK armed forces as a whole. MARS will be a cornerstone of our future worldwide operations, replacing many of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary's existing ships. It will support our new aircraft carriers and the rest of the fleet, as well as deployed amphibious, land and air forces close to the shore.

Where any of these announcements impact on our people, we are doing everything possible to mitigate that impact. Our current plans envisage that the majority of civilian reductions will be achieved through a combination of natural wastage and voluntary early release but, as I said, some compulsory redundancies may prove necessary. There are no redundancies from armed forces staff, and the trade unions are being kept fully informed of developments through meetings, briefings and the formal consultation process.

Mr. Carmichael: I thank the Minister for that substantial answer. I also thank him for his earlier co-operation with me prior to coming to the House today. However, it beggars belief that this information was to be put before Parliament in a written statement. That was surely an abuse of process. I am also disappointed that the Secretary of State himself is not here. I have seen a calling notice from the Ministry of Defence press office indicating that the Secretary of State will hold an off-camera briefing for journalists at 1.30 p.m. If he can brief journalists, surely he should brief this House first.

The news that the Minister brings with regard to RAF Saxa Vord is very bleak for Unst, which is one of the remotest and most economically fragile communities in the country. In a community of 700 people, the loss of 100 jobs and incomes is a devastating blow. Will the Minister assure me that, after almost 60 years, the Ministry of Defence will not simply turn the key in the door and walk away from RAF Saxa Vord? What will he do to ensure that the community is not left to sink? Consultation with trade unions is all very well, but surely there must be consultation with the people most directly affected—the people of Unst themselves.

Will the Minister meet a delegation from my constituency of representatives from the local economic development agencies and the community to ensure that the withdrawal of the RAF from Unst, if it is to go ahead, is done with some sensitivity to the needs and wishes of the local community?

Mr. Touhig: I fully appreciate that it is a bleak statement for the hon. Gentleman's constituents on Unst. I recognise that it will have an impact on the community of 700 people. As I said, we are happy to work with the local authority, the Scottish Executive and the hon. Gentleman to see what can be done to mitigate any decisions arising from the announcement. At present it is for consultation. I assure him that I will happily meet him and any colleagues whom he would like to bring to a meeting, so that we can explore how to co-operate to give assistance to his constituents.

I apologise to the House for my failure in my opening remarks to refer to the fact that I am responding this morning, not my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. [Interruption.] Hon. Gentlemen should wait and be patient. We have time. We do not have to rush this. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is in a meeting discussing responses following the bombings in London in recent weeks. The meeting has priority and has long been scheduled. He means no disrespect to you, Mr. Speaker, or the House. He has other Ministers because he has other duties which are also important. It does not in any way minimise the importance of what I have said. Notice of the written statements has been on the Order Paper since early this morning and the statements have been made available.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): First, on behalf of the whole House, I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for granting the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) the opportunity of bringing the Minister to the House so that he can answer on these important matters. Like the hon. Gentleman, I regard it as a gross discourtesy to Parliament that these important announcements about defence contracts and the restructuring of the Royal Air Force are being sneaked out by way of six ministerial written statements on the last day before the long summer recess. As we have heard, they affect constituencies across the land, from Orkney and Shetland to Cornwall and Gosport. Few Members in the House will not be affected. The Minister's response, which lasted more than 10 minutes, shows how serious and wide-ranging these announcements are and what a grave discourtesy it is to the House that he has been forced to come here and did not offer a statement in the first place. I am rather sorry for the Minister, who is a courteous gentleman. He has been sent here to do the Secretary of State's dirty work, when the Secretary of State himself should have come to the House to answer these points.

As the hon. Orkney and Shetland said, the discourtesy is compounded by the fact that the Secretary of State has time this afternoon to hold a press conference, at which journalists will be afforded the privilege of cross-examining him—a privilege denied to elected Members of this House. It is unacceptable that we will not have that privilege for a further three months.

Furthermore, although this is not one of a number of ministerial statements today, I understand that there is a proposal to scrap nearly all the instructual flying at our 14 university air squadrons, which have been in existence since 1925. My understanding is that the proposal will take effect from 5 October—five days before the House returns—and that there is to be a briefing at RAF Cranwell next Wednesday when the university air squadron officers commanding will be briefed. I challenge the Minister to tell us whether that is true. What are his plans for the university air squadrons? It would be unacceptable if this decision, which affects about 1,000 students across the land, 60 per cent. of whom go on as pilots to join the RAF, were presented to us as a fait accompli when we return in October.

This is part of the steady war of attrition on the RAF, whose number will soon be reduced to 41,000, half of what it was 12 years ago. There is a shortage of pilots, weapons systems operators and technicians. Although the new Typhoon is slowly entering service, morale is low and the entire Jaguar fleet is being scrapped. Yet in the strategic defence review, which was the brainchild of the present Secretary of State, the Government acknowledged,

"Since SDR, our Armed Forces have conducted operations that have been more complex and greater in number than we had envisaged. We have effectively been conducting continual concurrent operations, deploying further afield, to more places, more frequently and with a greater variety of missions than set out in the SDR planning assumptions".

Hon. Members should note the next words, which are those of the current Leader of House when he was Secretary of State for Defence:

"We expect to see a similar pattern of operations in the future."

In other words, our armed forces are being asked to do ever more with less and less.

Last week in the other place, Ministers were subjected to an unprecedented combined assault from six former Chiefs of the Defence Staff, many of whom the Prime Minister appointed. As Sir Max Hastings says in today's Daily Mail:

"There is a crisis of confidence from top to bottom in the British Army."

Britain's armed forces have been poorly repaid for the magnificent service that they have given to the Government. It is time that Ministers repaid the honour that our armed forces bestow upon them.

Mr. Touhig: Let me say again that the Secretary of State meant no discourtesy to hon. Members. I made an error in not explaining at the beginning that the Secretary of State had another commitment and that that was why I am here.

There was no attempt to sneak out the information. Several statements are tabled today, two of which relate to the subject of the urgent question. Clearly, we have sought to ensure that hon. Members have all the appropriate information about the announcements. Hon. Members who remember that the announcements were made last year will know that today's statements today effectively put the meat on the bone of information that had already been given to them to a large extent. There has been no attempt on the Government's part to prevent everyone from having the appropriate and required information.

On the hon. Gentleman's point about me personally, I do not feel that I am being sent here to do the Secretary of State's job. He is well able to defend himself in any circumstances. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I felt that it was my duty to call a Minister to come to the House. The Minister is here, answering the points that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) wanted to raise. We should not labour the point about which Minister comes before us. The important thing is that we are questioning a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. Touhig: I am grateful, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): The Minister is here reluctantly.

Mr. Touhig: The right hon. Gentleman says that I am here reluctantly. Answering to the House for my responsibilities as a Minister is a paramount duty. It is one of my top responsibilities. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State shares that view. It is what I am paid to do and that is why I am here today.

The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) asked about university air squadrons. I have no knowledge of the matter that he raised. I shall look into it the moment I return to the Ministry of Defence and if there is anything that I should communicate to him, I will do that as quickly as possible.

Under the Labour Government, our forces have been valued and supported. We have had the longest sustained increase in public expenditure for more than 20 years. I can find no better words than those of the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), who said last year on 16 December:

"The Opposition agree that there is a need for our armed forces to be more usable."—[Official Report, 16 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 1801.]

The problem with the Opposition is that their hearts tell them that what we are doing is right but they simply do not have the guts to support us.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): My hon. Friend announced the closure of the storage and distribution centre at Stafford in apparently a little more than a year's time. Does he know that the Defence Storage and Distribution Agency has 43 presences in the United Kingdom and one high activity centre, which is RAF Stafford? Yet Stafford is to be the first to close. In the context of running a business, I would have thought that the place with the most valuable asset would deserve more attention before the decision was made. Does my hon. Friend realise that it is estimated that more than 2,000 jobs will be lost in the closures at Stafford, Llangennech and Longtown? Does he know that a good half of those jobs are in Stafford alone? Does he appreciate how substantial a blow that will prove to the local economy and what a terrible shock it will be to the people who learn that their jobs are going? Will jobs actually be lost? Can he say anything today about the civilian jobs at RAF Stafford if closure takes place? There is a critical decision to be made—

[Mr. David Kidney]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Supplementary questions must be brief.

Mr. Touhig: I appreciate my hon. Friend's concern. It is a proper concern for a diligent and hard-working Member of Parliament from any party. As I said, job losses will result from the announcement. The proposals are out for consultation with the trade unions. Clearly, hon. Members have a role to play. If they want to make representations about any of the changes and proposed job losses, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I will be happy to receive them before any final decisions are made.

I appreciate that the process is difficult, but I believe that it is the right process for the objectives that we are trying to achieve. However, I also believe that consultation must be genuine, and we want to have a dialogue. Ultimately, we must make the decisions, but decisions are better if they are well informed by local opinion and views from all sides. We will try to take the views of any hon. Member on board.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for ensuring that a Minister was brought here to explain the consequences of one of today's 65 written statements. In the past week, there have been 156 written statements; last week, there were 34. A charitable person might say that the Government were anxious to convey information to hon. Members as soon as possible. However, it is possible that there is an ulterior motive. Perhaps in the last week before a recess, written statements should all be subject to recall, just as you kindly accepted the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael).

The Minister gave a roll-call of closures. He said that 37 Squadron RAF Regiment, which is based at RAF Wittering, will disband by March 2006; 16 Squadron, which is based at RAF Honington, will disband by March 2007; RAF GBAD Wing Headquarters, also at RAF Honington, and 26 Squadron, based at RAF Waddington, will disband by March 2008. Those are among the 7,000 RAF redundancies that have been announced. It has also been decided that 2625 (County of Cornwall) Squadron Royal Auxiliary Air Force Regiment, based alongside 1 Squadron at RAF St. Mawgan should be disbanded from November 2006. The Minister said that he was putting meat on the bone. May I suggest that that is butchery?

Mr. Touhig: No, the hon. Gentleman cannot suggest that. I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I did not adequately present my points, but I thought that I had been clear. In July 2004, we announced that the role of providing ground-based air defence would be transferred to the Army from four Royal Air Force squadrons and that they would therefore be disbanded. The meat on the bone—so to speak—that I have sought to give the House are the details of the squadrons that will be affected by the decision. The decision was already known and the principle should therefore not surprise the hon. Gentleman.

I am not responsible for all the ministerial statements that were tabled today. We have accepted the principle of Ministers making written statements. If there are to be changes to that, it is a matter for the usual channels and House, not for me as a Minister, to determine. I have tried to underpin in my remarks today that, as a Minister, I have a prime responsibility to come here and answer for Government decisions. That is what I am trying to do. There has been no attempt on my part or that of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to do anything about which the House should not be made aware. We have made the written statements available in the normal way. If there is a problem with that mechanism, that is a wider issue on which I cannot make a decision. I have sought in every possible way to provide colleagues with this information, and I will continue to work with any colleagues who have queries or worries, so that they can be properly informed about this decision.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): The Opposition spokesman raised the issue of university air squadrons. Does my hon. Friend accept that his inability to give us any information about the future of those squadrons will create great uncertainty in bases such as RAF Church Fenton in my constituency, which depend on the university air squadrons? Will he clarify later today what is going to happen, perhaps by means of a further written statement, because it would be unacceptable if an announcement on that matter were made during the parliamentary recess?

Mr. Touhig: I understand my hon. Friend's anxiety, but I am being asked to comment on some piece of hearsay, or whatever it is on which the hon. Member for Aldershot has based his remarks. I am not in a position to do that. It would be improper for me to mislead the House by pretending that I had that information. I have given an undertaking that I will take the issue up immediately I get back to the MOD, and if there is something that should or could be said, we will say it.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): In associating myself with the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), may I ask the Minister simply to confirm to those in the House and those outside that the Government had no intention of making an oral statement today, but every intention of briefing the press?

Mr. Touhig: I think that I covered that point earlier—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack) is a respected Member of the House. I treat him with the same respect with which he treats me, and I will seek to give him an answer. It was intended that there should be written ministerial statements today—

Mr. Forth: That is not the point.

Mr. Touhig: Patience! Just calm down. Those statements would be augmented by briefing in the normal way that goes on right across government—[Interruption.] When the Conservatives were in government, they did exactly the same in terms of putting information into the media. That is the right and proper way to disseminate information. The first responsibility of the Government is to give the information to the House, and that is what we did in the written statements.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): The shipbuilding industry in the UK has been given a tremendous boost over the past few years by record investment, bringing back to parts of the north-east shipbuilding that was taken away by the Conservative Government. May I therefore welcome my hon. Friend's announcement on the MARS programme? That project will provide a future for the shipbuilding industry in the UK. Will he give me an assurance that urgent talks will take place with shipbuilders throughout the country to ensure that the necessary skills and capacity exist in the industry to meet the requirements of the MARS programme?

Mr. Touhig: I cannot give my hon. Friend a specific assurance on that point, but in view of the other announcements that I have made today, all these matters will be taken on board so far as the future shipbuilding programme is concerned.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): So that we may better understand the Government's record on defence, will the Minister confirm that, alongside the amalgamation of Scotland's infantry regiments, since 1997 thousands of jobs have been lost and facilities have closed in Scotland? Those affected include RAF Lossiemouth, RAF Leuchars, RAF Kinloss, HMS Gannet, RAF Stornoway, Fairlie, Rosyth, Machrihanish, and Bin Hill. Hundreds of jobs on the Clyde have also been affected. Is it not the truth that conventional defence is being sacrificed because the Government are more prepared to spend billions of pounds on new generations of weapons of mass destruction?

Mr. Touhig: I am not sure where the hon. Gentleman stands, but I am a passionate Unionist. I believe in the United Kingdom, although I am not so sure that he and his party do—[Interruption.] Let me just say to the hon. Gentleman that this Government have a record, of which we can be proud, of supporting our forces, of investing in them, and of ensuring that they are capable of meeting the challenges that they face today. That means taking difficult decisions. The hon. Gentleman is a member of a party that will never be in government and will never have to take any difficult decisions.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): It is with dismay and incomprehension that I find myself asking the Minister to explain why we are facing job losses at Llangennech, where up-to-date, state-of-the-art equipment has recently been installed. Although unemployment levels have come down rapidly in that area in recent years, it is still very much harder to find alternative employment there than in many of the more prosperous areas of Britain. This decision is also out of keeping with our policy of decentralisation. Please will the Minister explain?

Mr. Touhig: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns. I was made aware of them earlier this week by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales. I ask my hon. Friend to bear in mind that this is part of an overall examination of the support and capability of our forces, and that difficult decisions have to be made in that respect. I understand that it is difficult for her and her constituents in Llangennech. I am sure that she will agree that there are greater opportunities for alternative employment in Wales today as a result of our economy being that much stronger, although that in no way mitigates the difficulties that people will face as a result of this decision. However, as I have said to other hon. Members, we will work as closely as we can with local authorities, local Members of Parliament and others to overcome any difficulties caused by these announcements. They are painful and difficult, but I believe that they are necessary in the circumstances that we face.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): In recent weeks, we have heard of aircraft being unable to fly because of an absence of spares, pilots having only 15 hours' flying time a month, and training being unable to take place because there is no blank ammunition. The Minister has made an important statement today—reluctantly, I suggest. What change will the things he has announced today make to the deplorable circumstances in which our armed forces are acting at the moment?

Mr. Touhig: The hon. Gentleman—

Mr. Forth: The right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Touhig: The right hon. Gentleman—I beg his pardon—makes an important point, and I know that he will be carrying out an important task in his new role in the coming months. What we are seeking to do today is to improve the support and opportunities for our armed forces. These measures will release considerable resources for improving our capability on the front line, and they will make the best use of taxpayers' money. These are the tough decisions that we have to consider at the end of the day. As I have said, improved support for our front-line resources in the difficult circumstances in which they find themselves in different areas around the world must be our top priority in the modernisation process. These proposals will release resources so that we can do that better.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): May I pluck out the one golden thread from the Minister's remarks and test its strength? He referred to expansions at, among other places, RAF Aldergrove. Will he give the House some details of the nature and extent of those expansions?

Mr. Touhig: At this stage I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the full details, and I apologise for that. The proposals will mean extra job facilities at Aldergrove, and I will ensure that, when we have fuller details, he and others will be given the information as quickly as possible. If he will bear with me, I will ensure that he gets the information.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Will the Minister tell us what effect his statement will have on morale in the RAF?

Mr. Touhig: What is important is that we recognise that—[Interruption.] If hon. Members want me to answer—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. A Front-Bench Member should not behave in this manner. A Minister should not be interrupted when he is speaking.

Mr. Touhig: As I have made clear in my statement, there are to be no job losses in the armed forces as a result of these statements. They will affect civilian jobs. I recognise that any decision that we make affecting our forces will have an impact on the morale of everyone in the forces, both serving personnel and civilians. However, I believe that our forces recognise that they have a Secretary of State and a Government who are prepared to back and support our forces with the necessary resources. I am sometimes tempted to be a bit party political about these points—[HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] I am sure I should not, but the hon. Gentleman's party fought an election campaign proposing a £2.6 billion cut in support for our forces. It is appalling to watch the Conservatives crying crocodile tears and wringing out their handkerchiefs today. When they were in government, there were massive cuts in our services, dictated by the fact that they had mucked up the economy. That had nothing to do with the defence of the realm.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): The BBC has announced that there are growing fears about cuts at the munitions facility at Glen Douglas in Argyll. I hope that that report is not true, and that there are to be no cuts there. Will the Minister please tell us what his Department's plans are for the future at Glen Douglas?

Mr. Touhig: I am not aware at this time—[Interruption.] I am trying to be honest with the hon. Gentleman; he can huff and puff all he wants but I am not in a position to give him an answer. I will consider the question that he raises, and I will return to him as soon as I can.

Business of the House

12.10 pm

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for the week after the recess?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): I am repeating much of what I have set out to the House previously, but it may assist Members of the House if I say that the business for the week after the summer recess will be as follows:

MONDAY 10 OCTOBER—Remaining stages of the Civil Aviation Bill.

TUESDAY 11 OCTOBER—Remaining stages of the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill.

WEDNESDAY 12 OCTOBER—Opposition Day [6th Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

THURSDAY 13 OCTOBER—A debate on combating benefit fraud on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 14 OCTOBER—Private Member's Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will include:

MONDAY 17 OCTOBER—Remaining stages of the Transport (Wales) Bill.

I should also like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for 13 October and 20 October will be:

THURSDAY 13 OCTOBER—A debate on e-Government.

THURSDAY 20 OCTOBER—A debate on the work of the Social Exclusion Unit.

Chris Grayling: What will the Leader of the House do to sort out the unedifying mess that we have seen in this place this morning? A Minister of the Crown has been dragged to the House, in response to an urgent question, to make a statement that clearly affects Members in all parts of the House. It is simply not good enough.

What will the Leader of the House do to address the fact that 156 written statements have been rushed out in the last few days before the recess? One cannot help but believe that the Government have not lost their habit of seeking to bury bad news. Will he explain why no statement was made to the House on the changes to the rules applying to special advisers and their relationship with civil servants? This week, that was raised with the Government by the Committee on Standards in Public Life, which stated:

> "Our concern about the 'hole in the corner' way in which the changes were being proposed has been reinforced by the failure to inform parliament or make a public announcement about this amendment to the legislation."

It also stated:

> "Even if the intention is not to extend special advisers' powers, the manner in which the changes have been made could lead to this very perception and consequently a loss of trust in the machinery of Government."

How can the Leader of the House justify the Government's actions in the face of such stinging criticism from our independent standards watchdog?

Despite the events of the past few weeks, Members will now not have the opportunity to question the Government on matters of terrorism, other important national issues or constituency issues until the week beginning 10 October. You will know, Mr. Speaker, that it is important to stress that the recess is much more than a holiday for Members; it is an essential time for us all to do important constituency work. But does the Leader of the House not accept that people outside Westminster will not understand this long gap during which MPs cannot question the Government about what they are doing? Will he now accept that it is time for MPs to be able to table and receive answers to written parliamentary questions right through recess periods, and for the Government to make written ministerial statements as appropriate during recess periods? Will he ensure that that change is introduced immediately?

Mr. Hoon: I am not entirely sure what the hon. Gentleman's point about the number of written ministerial statements is. I assume that he is saying that they should have been made, and that he is not saying that he would have preferred a smaller number, so he has left me in some difficulty as to what his precise point is. After all, each of the Ministers who have made those statements have informed the House, which I assume is precisely what he would have wanted.

On special advisers, a written ministerial statement has been made on that subject, and it is important that the House is kept informed in the normal way.

On the length of the recess, I am a little surprised that this is the first time that the hon. Gentleman has addressed the issue. He made no observation about it when I announced the date of the recess, and he made no observation yesterday in relation to the summer Adjournment debate, when the matter could properly have been raised. I am left with the slight feeling that perhaps only when the Daily Mail rang him up and asked him about it did he think that it was appropriate to make a comment—a subject to which I might return next time he complains about a Minister not coming to the House and not keeping it properly informed. It might be that he prefers to see his name in the Daily Mail rather than in the pages of Hansard.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): I have always been against a 10-week break, but as someone who was on the picket line yesterday, with my hon. Friends and no Tory MPs, may I ask whether efforts will be made before the beginning of the summer recess to try to resolve that industrial dispute? If it is not resolved, is there not every possibility that further action will take place? The cleaners have a very strong case indeed—they are not being treated the same as those who are directly employed by the Commons. Those who jeer should try living on £5 an hour with no holiday entitlement and no pensions. Such hypocrisy is unacceptable in the House of Commons. I am pleased, however, that the House of Commons Commission is apparently to provide better accommodation than the squalid rooms that I mentioned last week. At least that is one step forward.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has raised this matter repeatedly. On the last occasion, I indicated that I would raise the matter in the House of Commons Commission, which was done on Monday. As he has mentioned, the House of Commons Commission will be finding better accommodation for the cleaners, which is right. As far as the industrial dispute between the cleaners and their employers is concerned, obviously, efforts are being made by the employers to seek an appropriate and satisfactory solution.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): As we enter what I consider to be an excessively long recess, and at the risk of being accused of being the first to call for the recall of Parliament, may I express the hope that there will be no practical impediment to recalling Parliament if events demand that course of action, and that Ministers will find a way of keeping all Members, not just Front Benchers, advised of developments in security matters?

I have just one other question for the Leader of the House, on Iraq. When he was Secretary of State for Defence, whatever our differences, I recognised that he was assiduous in keeping the House informed of developments by making statements. We have British forces in the field, who, sadly, occasionally take casualties. We have a deteriorating situation with, we are told, 34 civilian deaths in Iraq every day, and many people assessing whether Iraq is approaching civil war. And even as cautious an observer as Senator Joe Biden has said:

"It's not a question of 'staying the course' but of changing course".

Can it therefore be right that we have not had a single statement or debate specifically on Iraq in this Parliament? Indeed, the last statement was six months ago, and the last debate more than a year ago. Is not the House entitled to have a view on the conduct of our policy in Iraq?

Mr. Hoon: Clearly, should the House need to return during the previously announced recess, it is important that that should take place. I made it clear that should such a requirement arise, there will be no practical difficulty for the House to reassemble, wherever that might be. The hon. Gentleman, and other Members, will understand what I mean, given that the length of this recess has largely been dictated by the need to improve the security arrangements in the Chamber.

As far as Iraq is concerned, the hon. Gentleman is not entirely fair in being so critical. There has already been a defence debate, which was an obvious opportunity—my recollection is that the title of the debate was "Britain in the World"—to raise the question of Iraq. Only this week, we have had Foreign Office questions, and there are four-weekly opportunities to question Defence Ministers. I do not therefore accept the criticism that there have not been opportunities in this Parliament to deal with the question of Iraq.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware that two days ago the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality made an important statement changing the treatment of refugees, who will now be given five years' leave to remain instead of immediate settlement. No consideration appears to have been given to the impact of that change on children, who face the prospect of having their lives torn apart twice if the proposal goes ahead. Can the Leader of the House assure us that we will have an opportunity to discuss this matter as soon as Parliament returns in October?

Mr. Hoon: I am confident that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will have given full consideration to the impact on families. That is a necessary consequence of the very difficult decisions that he and his colleagues have to take. Certainly, however, there will be further opportunities to debate and discuss this matter when the House returns in the autumn.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Earlier this year, the House passed legislation—with the support of the Procedure Committee, the House authorities and indeed, you, Mr. Speaker—to enable Parliament square to be restored to its normal peace and tranquillity. Placards remain evident directly opposite New Palace Yard even though we are in a time of heightened security, so can the Leader of the House say when the authorities will carry out the wishes of Parliament and restore Parliament square and the pavement to peace and tranquillity?

Mr. Hoon: The right hon. Gentleman is right to say that appropriate legislation is in place to allow effective action to be taken. Obviously, it is necessary for those responsible for enforcing the legislation to determine the correct balance between people's freedom to demonstrate and communicate their views, security requirements, and hon. Members' need to get on with their work properly and in peace.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that George Cubie, one of the House's senior officers, will have retired by the time the House returns after the summer? He has only put in 39 years' service and could not stay on to match my 40, but he beats anyone else in the Chamber today. As Clerk of Committees, he presided over the greatest transformation in the back-up services available to Committees in 25 years, and all the Committee Chairmen are grateful for that. He has been a wonderful source of advice to me and to the other Chairmen here today. We will miss him, as he has been great to work with. Will my right hon. Friend join us in wishing him a very happy retirement?

Mr. Hoon: I am extremely grateful to my right hon. Friend for that question. When the members of the Modernisation Committee spontaneously elected me as their Chairman recently, I was able to pay tribute to George Cubie's work on behalf of that Committee. He has taken forward a very considerable programme of change and I know how widely admired he is by previous members of that Committee and how much the House will miss his services.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House reflect on the number of written statements issued this week? There have been 156, and that is out of all proportion. Although he has defended that this morning, I believe that he should think carefully about this matter. He has referred to the Modernisation Committee, which agreed that hon. Members should be able to table written questions during the recess. That provision was supported by his predecessor, so why are the Government so opposed to it now?

Mr. Hoon: I make the same point to the hon. Gentleman that I made to the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling). Does he think that there should be a smaller number of written statements, or that written statements should not be made to inform the House of developments in the work of Government Departments? I should have thought that he would welcome the number of written statements and their quality, as they make clear the Government's determination to keep hon. Members fully informed. Obviously, it is important that hon. Members retain the ability to solicit information from Departments during the recess. I am sure that they can take advantage of the generous allowances made available for secretarial facilities and write to Ministers, who would expect to respond.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Can we have a debate when we return on the implications for the structure of the NHS of the Government's choice agenda? Does my right hon. Friend understand my despair at the possibility of another restructuring in the NHS? Does he agree that the Government's reluctance to let changes bed down before uprooting them and starting again is positively Maoist?

Mr. Hoon: I am fully confident that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and her Ministers are well aware of the significant amount of change experienced by those who work so hard on our behalf in the health service. I recognise my hon. Friend's concern that the NHS should not be in a state of perpetual revolution. It is important that those hard-working people have the opportunity to deal with recent changes and to continue to serve our communities so well.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): When we return, will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on industrial derating in Northern Ireland? Thousands of jobs will be lost if the Government maintain their present position. Understandably, there is massive concern, especially among small and medium-sized businesses.

Mr. Hoon: I appreciate that this is an important and significant issue for Northern Ireland. I thank the hon. Lady for raising it and I shall ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland writes to her on this subject.

Mr. Ian Austin (Dudley, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend arrange a debate on what is being done to tackle health inequalities? Although increased expenditure in the NHS has produced improvements such as shorter waiting times and better treatment for many illnesses, it has been reported this week that people in my constituency of Dudley, North die an average of eight years earlier than their neighbours in the south of the borough. Such a debate would enable us to examine the causes in detail and to look at the work being done to tackle such inequalities. We would also be able to determine whether resources are being properly targeted to give my constituents the same quality and length of life as those living elsewhere.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend raises a very important issue and one that is central to the way that the Government are tackling health care across the country. The problem of inequality is precisely why we are spending so much money on the NHS. When we came to office, NHS spending amounted to some £34.7 billion. It has risen to £69.7 billion now, and on present plans is estimated to rise to about £92 billion. That money is specifically designed to ensure that the same standards are achieved across the country. We look hard at best practice in different areas to ensure that that is spread across the whole population. We now have the resources available to make sure that that happens.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): The Government have a formula for funding police authorities around the country, but the funding for Northamptonshire has been £5 million short over the past three years. That has denied the people of the county at least 50 full-time police officers. Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on that obvious anomaly?

Mr. Hoon: If the hon. Gentleman had been here in 1997 and seen the poor support given to the police and police authorities by the previous Government, it is possible that he would not be making that observation today. I know that there are more police officers in Northamptonshire today than was the case in 1997.

Mr. Bone: That is not the point.

Mr. Hoon: The point is that we have substantially increased police funding and police numbers across the country, including in Northamptonshire. The hon. Gentleman should give the Government credit instead of making carping criticisms.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will have noted the mocking laughter from Opposition Members when my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) raised the question of the House of Commons cleaners—[Interruption.] They are laughing again. However, there is considerable support among Labour Members for a proper, fair and just settlement for the cleaners. What is intolerable is that there is a differential between the conditions for permanently employed House staff and those for contract cleaners. There is no logic in that, and it is outrageous that a person can work here for nine years and yet at no point be offered any pension entitlement. That is what has happened to one of the cleaners I spoke to yesterday, and it is not acceptable in modern Britain.

Mr. Hoon: As I understand it, staff directly employed by the House work in a different capacity and do rather different jobs. Leaving that aside, however, I made it clear in my earlier answer that it is important for the employer and the relevant trade union to negotiate and reach a proper settlement. I certainly encourage them to do so.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): I want to make it clear that no Conservative Member was mocking the very worthy cause of the contract cleaners. However, we were somewhat amused by the mock heroic efforts of the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) to join the picket lines, in a throw-back to the 1970s—

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): Shame!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Dr. Lewis: I think the Leader of the House will be sympathetic to my request for a statement when the House returns. It is about the 8,500 multiple sclerosis suffers who are desperately waiting for the validation of a drug called AIMSPRO, which has been trialled for the last few years. Changes in medical guidelines have resulted in its withdrawal and as a result, those who have witnessed great improvements in their condition now feel all the symptoms returning. Will the Leader of the House do all that he can to look into this matter before the House returns? It is obviously very cruel when those whose condition has improved greatly see their one chance of such improvements becoming permanent being put into reverse.

Mr. Hoon: Every Member of this House is well aware of the suffering that this appalling disease causes—often to friends and family—and of the importance of appropriate treatment. But the hon. Gentleman and other Members know that the availability of prescribed drugs is determined wholly independently by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, which is independent of Government and makes appropriate clinical judgments in the light of the appropriate medical evidence. It is right that that independent approach to this difficult and often sensitive issue should continue.

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow) (Lab): May I return to the forthcoming change whereby those with refugee status will no longer be given leave to remain in the country? I draw the Leader of the House's attention to early-day motion 569, which is in my name.

[That this House is concerned at the proposal in the Government's five year strategy for asylum and immigration to end the practice of granting indefinite leave to remain in the UK to people who are given refugee status and to replace this by up to five years' temporary leave to remain; believes that while this may not be legally incompatible with the provisions of the 1951 Geneva Convention, it is a retrograde step since it reverses the policy of granting indefinite leave introduced by the Government in 1998 without any evidence either that problems have arisen as a result of the current policy or that other countries which grant only temporary leave benefit as a result; is further concerned that the uncertain position this will put refugees in is totally inconsistent with other Government policies to assist the integration of refugees in the UK; further believes that this will inevitably lead to inhumane decisions when refugee families with children are threatened with removal after living in the UK for several years and establishing family life, leading in turn to further pressure on the immigration appeals system, and the caseload of honourable Members; and urges the Government to abandon this unnecessary change.]

That significant policy change, which will affect a lot of people, was announced in a written statement on Tuesday but it will come into effect on 30 August, so it will be impossible to discuss it in this House before it takes effect. Will the Leader of the House ensure that we discuss it as soon as we return from the recess? It is not satisfactory for such a change to be implemented in the middle of the recess.

Mr. Hoon: I understand my hon. Friend's concern. I have noted the importance of this issue to families, and I know that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will want to write to him about it.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): The security work that will be carried out in the Commons in the coming weeks presents us—both new and older Members—with a unique opportunity to compare the length of the coming recess with the previous broken recess, in which we returned for two weeks in September. If that is true, does the Leader of the House agree that we should have a short debate on this issue when the House returns, followed by a vote, and permanently settle the question of the recess? Some of those who, like me, voted for the House to return for two weeks in September are now having second thoughts. We would appreciate the opportunity for a further debate and vote.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his fair approach to this issue. I do not believe that I am breaching the confidence of the Modernisation Committee when I tell the House that it discussed the other day the need to consider the parliamentary calendar and to examine not simply the way in which we work across the day—that has been the subject of many such discussions—but our work across the parliamentary schedule. The right hon. Gentleman has raised an important issue, and as someone who strongly supported the idea of September sittings, I can see that they have not proved as satisfactory as many Members wished. On the other hand, I also recognise the concern, which has been raised today and will go on being raised, about the long period of the recess. Of course, the practical difficulty responsible for such gaps and way in which the previous schedule operated is the timing of the political party conferences. We may well have to address that issue.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Get rid of them.

Mr. Hoon: I know how much Conservative Members are looking forward to their next party conference; Labour Members are probably looking forward to it even more.

Anne Moffat (East Lothian) (Lab): There has been much talk, even this morning, about our armed forces and—rightly—about the conflicts in which we are involved, but we tend to forget about Gulf war victims. The medical condition of a constituent of mine, Mr. Murray Lomax, deteriorated after serving in that war, yet he is having to deal with various loopholes in order to get the benefits to which he is entitled. We should look after the people who helped us then, just as much as we look after those who are helping us now.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I know from my previous experience the efforts that the Ministry of Defence make to provide appropriate medical care, treatment and assistance to all those who serve this country so well.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): As the Government have made the fulfilment of their policy in Northern Ireland dependent on a favourable statement from the IRA, will the Leader of the House find time when we return—if that statement is not up to the Government's expectations—for the Government to outline their new policy for Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hoon: Obviously, we all hope that there will be a favourable statement, and that continuing support can be provided to the people of Northern Ireland in their efforts to establish peace and justice in that part of the world. I am sure that if such a statement is made during the recess, there will be every opportunity to debate it on our return.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): First, may I associate myself very strongly with the request from my hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) concerning the change in refugee status and the lack of opportunity to discuss it? I also want to take my right hon. Friend back to two weeks ago, when I asked him to arrange for a debate on the middle east peace process. We are at a crucial point in that process. Israel's withdrawal from Gaza could lead to an agreed two-state solution that is recognised internationally, or Israel might see that as the end of the process and continue to occupy sections of the west bank. That would leave an unviable Palestinian state with sections illegally occupied by Israel, and the wherewithal would remain for further conflict. This is an important issue; may we have an early debate on it?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right and, as I told him two weeks ago, the Government not only keep this matter under constant review, but are actively engaged in promoting a settlement on both sides of the argument. We believe that we are having some success and that progress is being made. I can assure my hon. Friend that there will be an early opportunity for the House to discuss this matter.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): May I draw the Leader of the House's attention to this morning's news of the crisis in the African republic of Niger which reported that at least 2.5 million people are affected by a very severe food shortage? The United Nations says that at least 150,000 children could die and according to Oxfam, parents are feeding their children on grass and leaves in an attempt to keep them alive. According to a BBC reporter, fewer than one in 10 of the starving are making it to the few feeding centres in the region. I appreciate that there is no time for a debate on this matter, but I remind the Leader of the House that two and a half years ago, the Government were a very big donor to the relief package in Ethiopia. May I ask him to make very strong representations to the Secretary of State for International Development about the urgency of this situation?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this issue. I know that my right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for International Development are closely monitoring the situation in that very difficult part of the world, and I undertake to ensure that they write to him about the efforts that they are making.

Mr. Forth: Is it not becoming obvious to the Leader of the House that we must have an urgent debate on written ministerial statements? His very junior colleague, the Under-Secretary of State for Defence, was dragged here by Mr. Speaker—obviously very reluctantly—to answer questions from a number of Members about matters pertinent to their constituencies. Yet that same junior Minister had the impertinence to hide behind the written ministerial statement, claiming that that seemed an adequate response. It is not an adequate response. Will the Leader of the House therefore undertake to look again at this matter and, if necessary, to get his ghastly Modernisation Committee to look at it, in order to establish that Ministers have a duty to come here properly to answer questions from Members, and not to hide behind written ministerial statements?

Mr. Hoon: Clearly, the House is making some sort of progress when the right hon. Gentleman acknowledges, in however curmudgeonly a way, that the Modernisation Committee does have a role and that he could conceive of something for it to do. I suppose that that is some sort of progress—even modernisation—so far as the right hon. Gentleman is concerned.

The difficulty we face, inevitably, is that Ministers have chosen to make a number of written ministerial statements, which the right hon. Gentleman would no doubt welcome, and I accept and recognise that there is always a judgment to be made about whether a statement should be made in written form or orally. That is a question of judgment, and on the occasion referred to, Mr. Speaker rightly decided that the matter was one that should afford Members an opportunity to ask questions. No one could possible argue against that, and nor did my ministerial colleague.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): Might the Leader of the House provide time for a debate about the United Kingdom's relationship with the International Criminal Court? When the legislation on that was going through Parliament, we warned that it might give rise to cases against United Kingdom servicemen being taken to the court, but none of us thought in our wildest imaginings that it would lead to charges of war crimes against British servicemen being brought by our own Government. Will he admit that no warning of that was given to the House when the legislation went through, and it would be well worth having a debate on that, perhaps when there is no danger of matters being sub judice?

Mr. Hoon: I am certainly not commenting on any individual case. It may well be that since the time when the hon. Gentleman shadowed on defence, he has not kept up with all the developments. He should know that particular prosecutions are being conducted under English criminal law and by English courts, in the sense that our military courts martial system is part of our own system. They are not being conducted by the International Criminal Court, and simply trailing that across his observations is a deliberate attempt to suggest something that simply will not happen.

May I make one final observation about the hon. Gentleman's efforts, again, to attract headlines by mentioning war crimes? War crimes have been offences against English law since 1957. Although I was very small at the time, I know that there was a Conservative Government in office then.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): On Monday, the Secretary of State for Health published a report by Nigel Pleming QC into the activities of two former psychiatrists working in North Yorkshire at Kerr Haslam. The report catalogued 20 years of systemic abuse against vulnerable women with psychiatric or mental health disorders. It has taken three Secretaries of State to get the report into a published state. It cost £3.5 million to produce. More than 80 women were involved in the abuse, and the report contains a catalogue of failings in the national health service of which we should all be ashamed. Will the Leader of the House make sure that when we return in the autumn there is a full debate on the report and that the recommendations made by Nigel Pleming are acted on?

Mr. Hoon: I apologise for not being familiar with the particular case, but I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State writes a full and detailed account of the Government's reaction to the report.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): Is the Leader of the House aware of the confusion and chaos caused by the Secretary of State for Transport in Tuesday's Second Reading debate on Crossrail? Will he request the Secretary of State to come back to the House to make a statement about the legality of his instruction to the Select Committee on Transport regarding the Crossrail terminuses? I read today in my local newspaper that the Secretary of State has given private assurances to the hon. Member for Reading, West (Martin Salter), which I regard as discourteous to me. I would like assurances that the Committee can consider Reading as the western terminus.

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is the absolute model of clarity and someone who is always extremely courteous to the House and who always sets out circumstances with absolute precision. There was a procedural debate before Second Reading of the Crossrail Bill. I looked at the terms of that debate, and I think Ministers set out the position very fairly, indicating that it was a matter for the Select Committee to consider but saying, very fairly—I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has not given them credit for this—that in the event of the Select Committee's believing that its terms were insufficient to deal with the range of issues that might be raised, the matter could come back to the Floor of the House and appropriate adjustments be made. I do not think that the hon. Gentleman could have had a fairer response than that from Ministers.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): As the right hon. Gentleman represents an east midlands constituency, he will be aware of the importance of the boot and shoe industry to Kettering, Northampton and the county of Northamptonshire. Does he share my shock and surprise at the written answer from a Department of Trade and Industry Minister that no specific economic assessment has been made of the Northamptonshire footwear manufacturing industry or of the competitive pressures facing the industry from imports? Will he draw that matter to the attention of relevant Ministers, urge that an urgent statement be made in the House when we return, and allow representations from local industry?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman raises an important matter affecting his constituency and constituents. I suggest that if he wants such an assessment made, he should write to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, setting out the position in the normal way.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): May I press the Leader of the House for a general debate in Government time on Northern Ireland when we return? As he knows, it is many years since we have had such a debate, and there are many important issues to discuss, not least those referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Belfast, East (Mr. Robinson), but also wider issues such as the attack on our education system, the threatened imposition of water taxes and, not least, the continuing anti-Unionist bias in public appointments. May I urge the Leader of the House to take the matter seriously and to hold a debate when we return?

Mr. Hoon: I accept the importance to the House and to the country of there being such a debate on Northern Ireland. I do not accept all the observations that the hon. Gentleman made in support of his request, but I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is anxious to keep the House as informed as possible of important developments in Northern Ireland.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): As we commemorate the 60th anniversary of VE day, may I ask the Leader of the House to promise an early debate on the national health service treatment of war pensioners? That is of particular concern to Mr. Harry Talbot in my constituency. He is 90 and has a war wound to his leg, yet he has had podiatry care withdrawn after many years, on cost-cutting grounds. Does the Leader of the House agree that our heroes deserve better than that?

Mr. Hoon: There has always been a debate in this country about whether we should treat war veterans—those who have given distinguished service on behalf of this country—as a separate category in terms of our overall national health service. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that that is the case in other countries, but generally that is so because their health care provision is not made on the universal basis on which we provide it in this country. The specific answer to the hon. Gentleman is that we endeavour to ensure that everyone, whether or not they have had a distinguished war record, is given the very highest standard of treatment in our national health service. At the risk of repeating myself, that is why the Government have devoted such significant extra resources to the NHS to ensure that standards are not only maintained but improved.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): People in my constituency feel very passionately about democracy. They take voting very seriously. When our former Member of Parliament defected from Labour to the Liberal Democrats, people were very angry, particularly schoolchildren who are learning about politics and who want to protect democracy. Will the Leader of the House give us a debate on my early-day motion 619?

[That this House notes that an honourable Member who defects is not representing the wishes of the electorate who voted for them; believes that an honourable Member who decides to defect must fight a by-election within three months on switching parties in order that the electorate may choose whether to follow their lead; and calls on the Government to approve such a precedent.]

To protect our democracy, it is vital that hon. Members who defect should fight a by-election.

Mr. Hoon: That is an interesting observation. As someone who studied history long before he studied law, I can invite the hon. Gentleman to look, perhaps, at the career of one of our greatest parliamentarians and greatest Prime Ministers. Sir Winston Churchill did, from time to time, leave one party and join another.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Then he went back.

Mr. Hoon: Indeed, he went back, which is perhaps relevant to the particular case in question, though not too relevant. The hon. Gentleman will also be aware if he studies that period carefully and the career of Sir Winston Churchill that in those days upon ministerial appointment by-elections had to take place—not something, I assure him, that I recommend to the House.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): The local acute hospitals trust in my constituency is planning to cut beds and move people into the community, but the local primary care trust is consulting on a plan to close all beds in Romsey and the New Forest. Given the deficits and the fact that cuts in district nursing services are also threatened, will the Leader of the House ask a Minister to come to the Floor of the House and explain to Members of Parliament in Hampshire just who has their eye on the bigger picture?

Mr. Hoon: Again, without wishing to repeat the statistics, the Government have put enormous resources into our national health service. It is important that those resources are not described as cuts, in the way that the hon. Lady suggested. Inevitably, that extra spending requires that the money be used in the most efficient and effective way possible. We are looking to provide high standards across the country, including in the hon. Lady's constituency.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): Will the Leader of the House find Government time when we return from the recess to debate the practical effects and implications of the Licensing Act 2003? In my constituency I have a significant number of pubs in the town centre that want to stay open until very late into the night, indeed the early hours of the morning, which has caused great concern among not only my constituents but the local police, who are worried about the effect that it may have on violent crime, antisocial behaviour and nuisance, especially as there is no public transport to get people home at that time in the morning. The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety said on the radio this morning that the licensing law was still under review. Will the Leader back that up by having an urgent debate on the issue when we return in October?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has made a good point, and perhaps by implication another one: these issues are best left to the wisdom of local communities. People in the community can make judgments about the wisdom of the lateness or otherwise of licensing hours. There will undoubtedly be some parts of the country where such late opening is welcome, subject to the appropriate policing. In other parts of the country it may be less welcome and appropriate. The hon. Gentleman asks for a debate in Government time, but there is an Opposition day available in the first week back. I am sure that he can use his considerable new-found influence to persuade those on his Front Bench to devote that time—they have yet to decide what the debate will be about—to that important question.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): With the announcement today of the shedding of so many defence jobs, affecting so many hon. Member's constituencies, surely it is right and proper that a Minister should come to the House to make that announcement and that it should not be made as one of 65 written statements. Will the Leader of the House assure me that when announcements of such significance are made in future a Minister will volunteer to come to make a statement to the House?

Mr. Hoon: I think that that question has been dealt with at some length and in some detail. A Minister came to the House and answered questions about the announcement in some detail. I cannot add more to what has been said already, not least by Mr. Speaker.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): The Leader of the House will be aware that the organisation charged with promoting gender equality is the Equal Opportunities Commission. A look at its website shows that of its 17 most senior members of staff only four are men. In Wales, where I come from, of the 50 people employed by the EOC only about five are men. Can we have a debate on the workings of the commission so that we can find ways of encouraging it to start practising what it preaches?

Mr. Hoon: Earlier in my career I once had the privilege of working with Barbara Castle. I recall that when she was asked why as Secretary of State for Social Services she maintained the differential retirement ages at 60 and 65, she said that it was to redress the imbalance of thousands of years.

Personal Statement

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a personal statement. The Committee on Standards and Privileges has today published a report concerning me and it has requested that I make an apology to the House by way of a personal statement. This I readily do at the earliest possible opportunity.

The complaint to the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards followed the publication of two articles in The Sunday Times last March that made a number of allegations about my conduct. By far and away the most serious allegation was that I had sought to use my parliamentary position as Chairman of the Select Committee on International Development to obtain or to attempt to obtain some personal financial gain. In respect of this matter, the commissioner found in his report that there had been no indication whatever in the course of his inquiries that I had sought to exploit my position as Chairman of the International Development Committee to further my private interests.

The commissioner did, however, find that I had breached the code of conduct in a number of respects; that in certain instances I got it wrong. No one is sorrier than me for that. For what I got wrong, I said in person on Tuesday to the Committee on Standards and Privileges that I was very sorry and I repeat to the whole House that I am very sorry.

The Committee in its conclusions says that my case illustrates the importance, not least in terms of public perception, of Members scrupulously separating, and being seen to separate, their public role from any private business interests. The Parliamentary Commissioner says in his report that he does not believe that I set out to exploit my public position for personal advantage, but he took the view that I failed to exercise sufficient care in distinguishing my public concerns from some of my private interests. I accept that judgment.

The Committee was in particular concerned about a letter that I wrote to the Secretary of State for International Development, which it concludes breached the advocacy rule. May I say that I apologised in person to the Secretary of State face to face back in April for anything that I might have got wrong in my letter to him, and I am confident that the Secretary of State accepted that apology in the spirit in which it was given.

In respect of my letter to the Secretary of State and other matters of concern, I have been given the opportunity to explain my actions. That I have done in detail. My explanations are in the report for the House and for anyone to see. My letter to the Secretary of State was clearly very poorly written, as it has led to a number of misunderstandings, but I have to accept, as I wrote the letter, that the consequence of those misunderstandings fall to me and, as I said to the Parliamentary Commissioner, I fully accept that the perception of an MP's conduct is important. The Parliamentary Commissioner and the Committee have concluded from their reading of my letter that I breached the rules, and I of course accept their judgment. That was most certainly not my intention.

I do not believe that there is anything in the Commissioner's findings or the Committee's report that suggests that I have done anything ignoble, dishonest or discreditable. In that I got matters wrong, I have at the earliest possible opportunity apologised in person to the Secretary of State and apologised in person to the Committee on Standards and Privileges, and now I say sorry to the House. I hope that the House will accept this as a heartfelt and unconditional apology for what I got wrong. I hope that any fair-minded person reading the commissioner's report will conclude that what I got wrong was by way of inadvertence and omission rather than through any deliberate attempt in any way to abuse my position as a Member of this House.

Point of Order

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Earlier today, rather than reply to my question, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that he had placed a report on energy security in the House of Commons Library. I have been to the Library and it has no such report. I would appreciate your advice on what can be done to protect hon. Members from this sharp practice.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have to watch our language and, "sharp practice" is a bit strong under the circumstances. Let me look into the matter and we will see whether the report can be put in the Library.

Orders of the Day

London Olympics Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

12.59 pm

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I wish to take this opportunity to place on the record the warmest congratulations of—I hope—the whole House to Seb Coe, Keith Mills and the whole 2012 bid team, including Barbara Cassani, who chaired the bid for the first year, on the excellence of their campaign and the result of which we are all so very proud.

The decision made by the International Olympic Committee on 6 July can change this city and this country forever. It awarded London the greatest prize that sport can bestow. The moment that Jacques Rogge opened that envelope will be one that millions remember for the rest of their lives. An act that appeared to take an age took in fact only a few seconds. Then we heard the simplest of statements: that it was "London", and that was sheer magic.

The very next day, however, that euphoria turned to agony. The events of 7 July will forever be linked to, and help to define the spirit of, the 2012 Olympics in London. Those two days showed the world, in different ways, the very best of London. On 6 July, in Singapore, the world saw—directly personified in the presence of those 30 young people, representing 20 nationalities, from Langdon school in Newham in the east end of London—the tolerance and diversity that is London. They also saw a statement of our ambition for the future, which is not just to host the greatest sporting event in the world for 17 days but to unlock the ambition of millions of young people up and down our country—a real legacy for both capital city and country. In London the next day, and ever since, the world has seen the resilience of Londoners again, linked to a determination that the grief, the mourning and the outrage of the terrorist attacks will not translate into division or hate and to continue as the city of tolerance that has so defined us to the rest of the world.

Why was it that we won in Singapore against—as many would say—all the odds? There is a simple answer to that question. The IOC was moved by the spirit so clearly articulated and represented in our bid and the presentation to its members. The IOC realised that for London the games were much more than 30 days of Olympic and Paralympic sporting excellence. For London, the games are a chance to transform one of the poorest and most deprived parts of our capital city; to inspire millions of children with dreams of sporting success; to launch a nationwide cultural festival; and to unlock sporting talent, both at home and abroad.

On the strength of our bid to host the Olympic games, we have also begun a programme of sustained support and investment in our young athletes, with the development of the talented athlete scholarship scheme—TASS—and 2012 scholarships. We will bestow on our most talented young people the financial support that they need to realise their potential and to fulfil their ambition.

[Tessa Jowell]

We look back on a legacy of too much wasted sporting talent, especially in the children of families who are without the financial and other means to devote to nurturing the kind of talent that could become world class. There are too many children whose talent has never been developed, simply because their families could not afford the cost of their ambition. The talented athlete scholarship scheme and 2012 scholarships are direct and practical ways to address that problem. We celebrated the success of our gold medallists at the Athens Olympics, but we should remember that five of those medals were won by a combined margin of less than half a second. That is why, if we are serious about ensuring that talent and potential are realised, those two schemes are so important.

The results are already impressive. At the Amateur Athletics Association under-20s national indoor championships this year, TASS athletes won six gold medals, seven silver medals and six bronze medals. As one TASS athlete said:

"As a student I am continually worried about money. At least now it should be easier for me to train and compete without worrying about paying for it."

Two weeks have passed since we were awarded the games and we know that our focus now has to be on delivery. There is no time to waste. Much of the effort and a substantial share of the resources spent on bidding for the games were focused on preparing for delivery. I am delighted to announce today that the Government have already taken the first major step in the development of the best ever Olympic park in Stratford. I have today given the London Development Agency the go-ahead to start the massive construction and regeneration programme that will shape the Olympic park to be ready in seven years' time. The first step is the undergrounding of the power lines that blight the Olympic park and the lower Lea valley.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Now that the Secretary of State has introduced the subject of money, can she give us—as she develops her argument on the Bill—her estimate of the total cost of the entire project and some idea of the cost to London council tax payers per year, and for how many years?

Tessa Jowell: The answers to both parts of that question have already been clearly set out in the submissions to the IOC and before the House. We have before us a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity, not just to develop excellent Olympic facilities, but—working closely with my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister—to deliver sustainable communities and a powerful legacy for one of the most deprived areas of Britain. I pay the warmest tribute to the Deputy Prime Minister for the imagination that he has shown in understanding the potential of the Olympic development for the east end of London.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): I apologise to the Secretary of State if she was planning to discuss this point, but when she addresses regeneration will she consider the several hundred businesses that will have to be displaced? Many of them feel that the level of compensation they are being offered is inadequate. Will she give an undertaking to look at the issue and ensure that no one loses out in that process?

Tessa Jowell: I believe that the figure is lower than 700—

Richard Ottaway: Several hundred.

Tessa Jowell: It is about 350. The matter is one for negotiation between the LDA and the businesses concerned, and I am aware of the progress of those negotiations.

The Government were clear and consistent in their support for London's bid, and I also pay tribute to all the major political parties in the House who were such strong and consistent supporters of the bid—

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP) rose—

Tessa Jowell: With the exception of the hon. Gentleman.

I underline the importance of cross-party support and consensus in securing the bid but it is absolutely clear that we cannot bid for, win or stage the Olympic games without clear and unequivocal Government support.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): I am slightly concerned about the magnanimity shown by my right hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), who is not in the Chamber today, is the shadow Chancellor for his party. He said:

"London badly needs better transport and more police. It does not need the Olympics."

He also objected to people in Twickenham paying for facilities in the east end of London, some of which will be used for only 18 days and then demolished. Does my right hon. Friend agree that we do not mind everyone jumping on the bandwagon as long as they can eat some humble pie?

Tessa Jowell: I can assume only that the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) was not speaking for his party, but it would not be the first time that we have heard a chorus of different voices from that party—the flexible approach to policy.

Several hon. Members rose—

Tessa Jowell: I shall allow more interventions later but I want to make some progress, as many people want to speak in the debate.

I may be counting my chickens but I believe that the Bill is evidence of cross-party support for the games and of our determination to get moving with their staging, to set up the structures to deliver them and to make sure that the public interest is protected and that public money is properly spent, so that the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic games are delivered on time and within budget.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Investigations by Robert Booth, a freelance journalist, showed that towards the end of 2003 a heads of term agreement was reached between the London Development Agency, acting on behalf of the bid team, and Stratford City Developments that neither would frustrate the planning applications of the other. At the time, Sir Stuart Lipton was a director of Stratford City Developments and also chairman of the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment, which was conducting a design review of the Olympic bid team's proposals. There is no evidence that Sir Stuart took part in the design review, but does it not show the need for complete transparency in all the many public-private sector arrangements that will be needed to deliver the project? There should be proper parliamentary scrutiny of such arrangements.

Tessa Jowell: I have noted my hon. Friend's intervention and I shall be happy to write to him further. The important thing is that substantial sums of public money and, through the lottery, of the public's money will be invested in the games.

Mr. Forth: How much?

Tessa Jowell: The public sector undertaking in relation to the staging and to building the infrastructure is £2.375 billion. There will be additional investment arising from regeneration in the area immediately surrounding the Olympic park and further investment in London's transport structure, so the long-term benefits for London will be considerable. No one could deny that transparency has already been established in setting out the costs of the games.

Several hon. Members rose—

Tessa Jowell: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski), but that is the last intervention I shall take for quite some time.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for allowing me to intervene. I am extremely pleased to see Lord Coe in the Gallery this afternoon—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. May I explain to the hon. Gentleman and to the House generally that we do not normally refer to people outside the Chamber during debates?

Daniel Kawczynski: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Secretary of State is talking about London, which is the key part of the Olympic bid, but places throughout the country want to take part in our great success, and in Shrewsbury we hope that we can host a rowing event on the River Severn, so will the right hon. Lady discuss how Shrewsbury and Shropshire can take part?

Tessa Jowell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that question. I note that he joined the tribute that I made to Lord Coe and his colleagues at the beginning of my remarks. If he can contain himself, I shall come back to the point about the importance of the whole UK benefiting from London's hosting the games.

I want to set out for the House the shape of the Bill. The Bill does three things: it creates the public body that will get London ready to stage the games—the Olympic delivery authority; it provides the powers needed to meet IOC requirements for the way that the games and the Olympic environment are managed; and it provides the Mayor with an Olympic-specific power so that he can meet his obligations as the signatory to the IOC's host city contract. I shall provide an outline of the scope of the legislation in each of those areas, before describing in more detail how some of the clauses will work.

The Olympic delivery authority will be the body that manages the Government's interest in the Olympic construction project and the public money going into it. It will make sure that the necessary infrastructure is in place by 2012, and that all the venues are built. Clauses 3 to 6 and schedule 1 allow for the authority to be created, grant it the necessary powers and functions and specify how it will be structured, organised and funded. Clauses 8 to 16 deal with transport, and establish the ODA as the co-ordinating authority for the Olympic transport plan. Existing transport authorities will be under a duty to co-operate with the ODA in order to implement the plan and to deliver Olympic transport services.

The Bill also provides for the creation of an Olympic route network and the ODA will be able to issue traffic regulation orders on that network; for example, to establish Olympic lanes or parking restrictions. Obviously, the authority's role will need to evolve over time. Before 2012, the ODA will focus on acquiring land—80 per cent. of which is already under public control—constructing venues and planning transport.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Will the authority have an obligation to pursue sustainable development in its operations? This is a huge opportunity for a low-carbon games. In my constituency, we have a major manufacturer of solar cells. We have a vital opportunity to develop a showcase for that industry, and to catch the imagination of the general public and deliver a low-carbon games.

Tessa Jowell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. Sustainability was one of the key characteristics of the bid when it was presented to the IOC back in February and it is certainly a very clear criterion that the Deputy Prime Minister will be looking to address in all the regeneration investment that will be going into the Olympic park.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Tessa Jowell: I want to make progress, if I may.

After the games, the Olympic delivery authority will take charge of reconfiguring the venues. That is vital, because of our intention to use the Olympics as an opportunity to create facilities with a lasting purpose, not just in London but right across the UK. Indeed, a number of facilities, such as swimming pools and indoor arenas, will be relocated from the Olympic park to other parts of the UK. This is an absolutely critical issue in meeting the very high legacy threshold that we have set in judging the success of the games.

The ODA will have a small board containing between seven and 11 people who will provide expert advice and oversight in each of these areas. There will be direct lines of accountability to the Secretary of State, who will make board appointments and have the power to direct the ODA if necessary.

We have discussed these arrangements with the Office of Government Commerce, which is satisfied that they are fit for purpose. The OGC will be engaged throughout the process in ensuring the most rigorous oversight of the tenders and then of the contracts as they are let. The ODA will also be the planning authority for the Olympic park. To ensure propriety, decisions on planning applications will be taken by a discrete planning committee. The committee will follow the model established by the urban development corporation.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the work that she did to secure the success of the Olympic bid, but in terms of being able to spread the benefits of the Olympics around the country, can she also give consideration to the fact that, if contracts are going to be let, regional development agencies should be involved in this process so that companies in the regions might access all the work that will come out of the Olympic bid?

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and it is for that reason that we have on the face of the Bill given regional development authorities a responsibility in this respect, which would by implication extend not just to bidding for contracts but to seeking to maximise the tourism benefits of the Olympic games to their region. This is all part of the intention to ensure that the whole UK benefits from the games; obviously the games will have the greatest economic impact in London but we hope that by purposeful policies, starting early, we can spread those benefits throughout the UK.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Northampton is in the middle of one of the Government's growth areas and therefore well placed to help with the regeneration process. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that towns that might want to provide training facilities, provide support for teams or provide premises for different sports will be able to access the guidance and be on an absolutely level playing field for bidding to be part of this enormously successful project?

Tessa Jowell: In addition to the role of the regional development agencies, which I have outlined, the nations and regions committee that was established by the bid team will continue to underpin the efforts to secure the maximum UK-wide benefit of preparation camps and the other potential opportunities that I have outlined, and I am sure that my hon. Friend, who is a passionate advocate for her constituency, will ensure that people in Northampton have a chance to secure some of those benefits.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Tessa Jowell: No; I am going to make some progress.

The Olympic delivery authority will be the planning authority for the Olympic park. As I said, to ensure propriety, planning decisions will be taken by a discrete planning committee.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): Before the Secretary of State moves on, will she give way?

Tessa Jowell: No.

The importance of the ODA to the Olympic project is evident—a single body with a clear task, accountable to Parliament. The ODA will be a time-limited body, focused on delivering the London games, and clause 7 therefore provides for the Secretary of State, having consulted the Mayor, to lay an order to dissolve the ODA at that stage.

I shall now turn to the way in which the legislation seeks to meet the clear requirements that are set down by the International Olympic Committee. It will be equally important that there is careful management of the Olympic environment during the games to fulfil the commitments that have been given in London's bid book.

The ODA will co-operate with local authorities to ensure that the streets are kept clean and well lit and will be able to step in to do that work itself if necessary. It will also have a role in enforcing the regulations that restrict unauthorised advertising and trading around venues. Those regulations will be needed to comply with the requirement of the host city contract. Clauses 17 to 31 and schedules 2 and 3 aim to restrict the commercial exploitation of the games in five ways: by updating the existing Olympic symbol protection legislation, for instance to include protection for the Paralympic symbols; by providing additional protection against ambush marketers who try to associate themselves unfairly with the games, by using words like London, summer and 2012; by allowing regulations to be made restricting unauthorised advertising around Olympic venues; by allowing the same sort of regulations to be made restricting unauthorised street trading; and by making ticket touting a criminal offence in relation to Olympic events. These provisions all reflect the commitments made in London's bid documents to meet the requirements of the IOC's host city contract.

I turn now briefly to the Mayor's powers. It was the Mayor of London, along with the British Olympic Association, who signed the host city contract with the IOC; and to provide absolute clarity that the Mayor can honour his commitment, clauses 32 and 33 will give the Mayor a specific Olympic power to comply with his obligations under the contract and to prepare for and manage aspects of the London Olympics. Clause 33 also provides that the GLA's Olympic power can be switched off by the Secretary of State.

I have set out for the House the way in which the Bill will meet the particularly stringent IOC requirements in relation to the control of advertising, with criminal sanctions to enforce breaches, and I have set out the role of local planning authorities—

Mrs. Lait: Please give way.

Tessa Jowell: I will give way on planning.

Mrs. Lait: I am most grateful to the right hon. Lady because this could reduce the length of my speech. Under clause 4, which refers to the ODA's planning powers, she herself said in her earlier comments that the LDA is in negotiation with roughly 350 businesses at present, but under the terms of the Bill the ODA has to implement the current planning guidelines. That means that there is a limit to the negotiations. Is she saying that the planning legislation overrides the negotiations that the LDA is currently undertaking, such that 350 businesses could well go out of business because they cannot get the proper value that they should get?

Tessa Jowell: I think, with respect, that the hon. Lady is confusing two things. The LDA is negotiating relocation with up to some 350 businesses and I do not wish to be drawn on detailed negotiations of a contractual nature. The LDA is the proper body to negotiate with those business and to secure a satisfactory outcome. That is the point. This does not impact on the planning powers of the ODA.

Clauses 21 and 22 set out the role of the ODA and of local planning authorities. There are further powers relating to the control of street trading in the vicinity of Olympic venues and sanctions to curtail that. Consistent with the IOC's requirements, clause 29 makes ticket touting a criminal offence specifically in relation to the 2012 games.

I have mentioned the importance that the IOC attaches to the protection of Olympic symbols. That protection is extended in clauses 30 and 31. Clause 31 and schedule 3 create a specific event association right in relation to the 2012 games. The measure is designed to prevent people from using innovative ways to associate themselves with the games but without using specific protected words or symbols.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Tessa Jowell: I shall move on to reaffirm and underline the importance of the points made by a number of hon. Members in interventions about the benefits that we hope will extend to the whole United Kingdom. In clause 34, regional development agencies are given a new purpose—to prepare for the London Olympics.

Mr. Love: I add my voice to the congratulations to my right hon. Friend on the role that she played in winning the bid. A number of provisions in the Bill are designed to ensure that the priority is to deliver the games by 2012. Is she confident that the Bill contains enough protections to safeguard the regeneration aspects of the development, so that the focus is not exclusively on delivering the games?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention and pay tribute to his advocacy of the Olympic bid and the regeneration of the lower Lea valley, which will bring great benefits to his constituents. He has been an advocate for many years when the Olympic bid did not have many friends to call on. We would miss the opportunity of a lifetime if regeneration were not inextricably linked to the purposes of the creation of the Olympic park and the lower Lea valley. I can assure my hon. Friend of the priority that is given in the Bill to regeneration.

Jeremy Corbyn: My point is about regeneration and the protection of existing communities. In the boroughs surrounding Stratford and the other sites, there are many very poor people. There are also many artistic communities that have limited and low cost facilities. Will the Secretary of State ensure that the games do not end up with a succession of yuppie flats and developments, and that the beautiful people and the rich do not move in after the games and take over the whole area, and that instead it will be of real benefit to the poor and needy of north and east London, who should not suffer because of the games, but should benefit from them?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that important point. I hope he will be reassured in part by the fact that the Olympic village will represent a substantial contribution to London's affordable housing. Working with the communities around the Stratford park and the lower Lea valley has been an important part of the bid's approach to date, and it will continue, because of the risks that my hon. Friend outlined.

The last time the Olympic games were held in London, it was against the backdrop of a world devastated by war and a country looking for inspiration. In 1948, just over 4,000 competitors from 59 different countries competed. School buildings were used to house athletes. A temporary track was built at Wembley stadium and many Government buildings were converted to temporary uses. The games could be watched on television only by those who lived in Britain. Athletes were asked to bring packed lunches. Despite all that, the games were a success. Three years later, the nation celebrated the Festival of Britain. The festival raised the nation's spirits while promoting the very best in British art, design and industry.

Sixty years later, the 2012 games will be very different. They will probably be the biggest ever staged. They will be held in a brand-new Olympic park with nine world-class sports venues. Over 11,000 athletes from 200 countries will compete and will be watched by 4 billion people across the world. They will create a legacy like no other in Olympic history. They will leave behind the biggest urban park built in Europe for 150 years, 3,600 new homes—affordable homes—12,000 new jobs, three new schools and a generation inspired to get active by the opportunities of sporting excellence. The games will create economic opportunities across the UK, billions of pounds worth of contracts, and a huge boost to tourism and the UK's global exposure. Training camps for athletes will be spread around the nation.

Pete Wishart: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Tessa Jowell: I give way to the hon. Gentleman only because, if I did not, it would lead to an allegation of cruelty to Scots.

Pete Wishart: I have been waiting patiently to say something nice to the right hon. Lady. May I say on behalf of the Scottish National party how sincerely and wholeheartedly we congratulate London on securing the games? It is incumbent upon her to match the rhetoric and demonstrate that it truly was a national UK bid. Now that we have secured the games, may we consider the ludicrous funding arrangements—the £1.75 billion of lottery money, which will deprive the grassroots sports organisations that we require to do well in 2012?

Tessa Jowell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, which was well worth waiting for. He has been consistent in at least one respect—his opposition to using lottery funds to meet the costs of the Olympics. That will not change. That is the way the public contribution will be met, in large part. However, I welcome his conversion to the value of the games, not just to the people of London, but to those of Scotland as well. I thank the people in Scotland who have throughout recorded their strong support for the games coming to London. That was an important and persuasive part of the case that we presented to the International Olympic Committee.

Throughout the country, we will see training camps for athletes. In the run-up to the games, the torch relay will sweep the country, heralding the start of a nationwide cultural festival. There will be music, comedy, fireworks, carnivals and a special Olympic Prom, all to embody the bid's major themes of voyage, exploration and exchange.

Delivering the 2012 games and Paralympic games will be a challenge like no other. I am sure that in the years ahead we will see, perhaps in all parts of the House, doses of scepticism as the plans for implementing the games are rightly subject to scrutiny. I hope, however, that that healthy scepticism will not tip over into unhealthy cynicism.

As a nation, we have an opportunity that we must seize—an opportunity to deliver tangible facilities and transformation to one of the poorest parts of our country, and to bring changes in the quality of life of the people who live there that they could not have dreamed of. We also have other, more intangible opportunities to seize—to express pride in our country, to express solidarity, to celebrate the tolerance in our diversity, and to be guardians of the dreams of millions and millions of young people. That is a prize which, I hope, will continue to unite the House in the years between now and 2012. I commend the Bill to the House.

1.40 pm

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): I begin by echoing the comments that I made in this Chamber on 6 July when the Secretary of State was in Singapore. The congratulations of the whole House are due to my noble Friend Lord Coe on his inspirational leadership of the bid team and in securing the London 2012 bid. But congratulations are also due to all those involved in putting the bid together, including Ministers and officials in the DCMS, and the Prime Minister for his personal commitment to the bid.

It is important that there is real support for the Olympics and Paralympics on both sides of the House. The intervention of the hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart) on behalf of the Scottish National party suggests that we have indeed obtained the support of all parts of the House.

Mr. Charles Walker (Broxbourne) (Con): Will my right hon. Friend give way for just a moment?

Mrs. May: On the basis that my hon. Friend said that he would be nice, I will give way.

Mr. Walker: I would love to be nice to the Secretary of State because I am from Broxbourne and we are absolutely delighted to have got the canoeing. May I congratulate the Government and everybody who played a part in bringing the Olympics to London and just north of the M25 to Broxbourne, which is fairly near Scotland, but probably not near enough? May I make one plea, because it is very important that the Olympics are for everyone, and too often we see the corporate moguls move in? It is important that my constituents, the people from Waltham Cross and Cheshunt, which are not particularly rich areas, should have a chance to go to the canoeing in Broxbourne and take part in this great celebration.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention and I echo his comments. I think he will find that the elements of the Bill that outlaw ticket touting for the Olympics will go some way to ensuring that what he hopes will be the case for his constituents.

It was the cross-party support for the London 2012 bid that went some way to ensuring and convincing the IOC that Britain was united in its ambition to host the Olympic and Paralympic games. It is with the same spirit of co-operation that we approach the Bill and all other legislation that may be needed in order to deliver the games. We all know the potential that the 2012 Olympics and Paralympics have to transform London and the lives of so many young people throughout Britain.

We hear the phrase "a lasting legacy" used on many occasions when talking about London 2012. It underpinned the whole of our bid. That legacy is twofold. There is of course the opportunity to regenerate one of London's poorest and most rundown areas, although in doing so it is important to ensure that those displaced by the project are properly compensated. I hope that the Secretary of State will have recognised from the interventions from my hon. Friends the Members for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) and for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) that there is still considerable concern about the issue among those businesses and others who will find themselves displaced by the regeneration. So there is that opportunity to provide low-cost housing to thousands of families, to improve transport and infrastructure links and to build some of the world's finest sporting facilities for years to come. Those are all matters that the Bill has the power to deliver.

What the Bill does not address is the part of the bid that so impressed the IOC delegates: the commitment to inspire thousands of young people throughout the country and indeed the world; to bring something into the lives of boys and girls, to give them a reason to work harder, something to aim for—the thought that perhaps they could be standing on the podium collecting Olympic gold in 2012.

On the Saturday after the bid success was announced my swimming teacher, who is herself a British world championship triathlete, talked about her son, who rows for Reading Bluecoat school in my constituency, which managed to qualify for the Henley regatta for the first time ever this year. She hoped that the bid success would inspire him—that if he works hard he could be there in 2012. That is the spirit of enthusiasm, optimism and dedication that we want to encourage by having the Olympics in London.

However, those aspects are not dealt with in the Bill, and we shall be looking to the Government for further reassurances that they are putting in place the mechanisms that will deliver on that promise to our young sportsmen and women, not only to those who may be Olympic athletes of the future, and encourage an interest in sport and a healthy lifestyle as an offshoot and a legacy of the Olympic games.

Mr. Love: I seek a couple of reassurances from the right hon. Lady—first, that she will speak to authorities such as my Conservative-controlled authority in Enfield, which has been somewhat lacking in its support for the Olympic bid. I hope that it will be able to change its mind and get fully behind it. But the real reassurance that we need is that the Opposition will now get behind the Mayor of London and support the precept that will be critical to delivering the Olympic games in 2012.

Mrs. May: If the hon. Gentleman will wait, I have something to say about London authorities and the Mayor of London in relation to the Olympics.

The Bill establishes the framework for London's games, a games that the Opposition, along with the Government, hope will be the finest the world has ever seen. We also hope that it will be a games that produces a significant, if not the largest ever, crop of British gold medals, and medals generally. We also hope that it will be a games that is delivered on time—it has to be delivered on time—and to budget. We will continue to give our support to the Government, but that does not mean that we will not criticise or raise concerns when we have them.

We support the Bill, but all hon. Members must be careful to ensure that the Bill will genuinely deliver what we all want to see—the best Olympics and Paralympics ever—and that means that it must be subject to proper scrutiny. There are issues that should be raised at this early opportunity if we are to ensure just that.

We all know that the ultimate guarantor of Olympic funding is to be discharged in a sharing arrangement with the Mayor of London and through additional national lottery funding. Any cost overrun will be picked up by taxpayers, by London council tax payers and, potentially, through loss of income to charities and other good causes throughout the country.

The Minister for Sport and Tourism has already made it clear that almost every Olympic host city has seen the cost at least double from initial estimates. In evidence to the Culture, Media and Sport Committee on 15 January 2003, he said:

> "On the financing, one point that was very interesting on our visits to cities that have already run Olympics was that in broad terms, on the cost, every one of them has doubled from the first figure that was given."

Sydney and Athens ran more than 100 per cent. overspends. Sydney's original bid costs were estimated at £1 billion and the games ended up costing about £2.3 billion. The final figures from Athens are not yet established, but the original bid estimate of costs was again £1 billion, and costs published to date are £3.98 billion.

The Opposition are determined that London should learn the lessons from those cities, and we must ensure that the games are brought in strictly to budget and on time. We owe it to the many thousands of athletes who will be participating to do just that. We also owe it to council tax payers and to taxpayers, who will be left to pick up the tab long after the last medal is awarded if we do not put the right financial controls in place.

We are pleased that Government propose that the Olympic delivery authority's accounts will be examined and certified by the Comptroller and Auditor General, who will lay a copy of the statement and report before Parliament, because I assume that that will allow the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee to examine and investigate the accounts. Perhaps the Minister will be able to confirm the PAC's role when he winds up the debate.

However, in the interests of transparency, and to allow the House fully to consider and discuss the development of the work, I hope that the Government and the Secretary of State will go further and agree to have an annual debate in the House on progress on the preparations for the games so that it is open to proper parliamentary scrutiny.

The Government and the bid stakeholders have made public commitments to the IOC to establish the ODA. In particular, commitments have been made that the ODA will have development control powers in the Olympic park, powers to acquire land, and powers to control and co-ordinate Olympic transport. All those commitments are delivered on within the Bill.

The Secretary of State will appoint members of the ODA after having consulted the Mayor of London. The Bill is not about Olympic goals or sport development. It is about street sweeping, massive building projects, and developing transport and infrastructure links. All those are complicated, costly and difficult to deliver. We have seen what can happen if we do not get the delivery of such projects right. That is why it is essential that we have the right people to do the job—not political appointees or placemen, but professionals, experienced in managing and delivering large-scale projects on time and on budget. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us how the Olympic delivery authority will be appointed, and reassure us that the process will be open and transparent and that the Government intend to seek proven professionals.

In the light of recent events, security is at the forefront of all our minds. We remember that the Olympics have been the victim of attacks on past occasions. We welcome the provisions to allow consultation with police commissioners from the metropolis and the City of London, and the British Transport police, as part of the transport plan. The Bill makes no mention of the overall involvement in security and policing of the event as a whole, although I understand that a Cabinet-level security committee will oversee the games. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us more about the security arrangements and their funding, but if he cannot do that today, I trust that in due course a Minister will announce the arrangements to the House.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I believe that security has been costed at £23.125 million. Given the events to which the right hon. Lady referred, does that figure not seem rather low? Might not the Government have to think again about what is needed?

Mrs. May: The hon. Gentleman is right, in that there is a costing for security. I understand, however, that it is not £20-odd million, but £225 million. Perhaps the Minister can tell us, today or on another occasion, whether that is the total sum or whether, as I suspect, other sums will be available from policing budgets or the overall Home Office budget. I am sure, however, that the Government will keep the matter under constant review.

One element of the Bill worries us particularly. We recognise that delivering the games is a huge task, and that additional powers will be needed to meet the challenge. We also understand that we need to grant the Mayor of London Olympic-specific powers allowing him to fulfil his obligations as a signatory to the host city contract. The powers in the Bill are far-reaching, however. Clause 32 is potentially the most controversial measure, as it gives the Greater London Authority—and therefore the Mayor—very wide-ranging powers.

In its impact assessment, the Government claim that that there is no risk in the clause because "power is to be clearly defined and time-limited to address any perceived risk of overspill".

Yet the clause gives the GLA power to "do anything . . . for the purpose of complying with an obligation of the Mayor of London under the Host City Contract" or to prepare for and manage the games. It contains no requirement for the GLA to consult the London boroughs that will play such an important role in delivering the Olympics. We fear that the absence of a requirement to consult not only the boroughs that will be the homes of event venues but those that will have to help deliver the transport, street cleaning and logistics to deal with hundreds of thousands of visitors to London will have a major impact on the ability to deliver those services. I hope that the Secretary of State will be willing to work with us to develop a framework allowing proper dialogue and decision making with the London boroughs.

Mrs. Lait: I agree about the importance of negotiation with the London boroughs, but it worries me that the Greater London Assembly has no effective control over the Mayor, while the Secretary of State is an appointee to the Olympic delivery authority. Is there not a democratic vacuum between the role of the ODA and the role of the Assembly?

Mrs. May: I share some of my hon. Friend's worries. It is notable that parts of the Bill give powers to the Mayor of London specifically, while others give the powers to the Greater London Authority. It would be helpful if the Minister could elaborate on the distinction that the Government draw between the two persons of the Mayor and the authority. Perhaps he will tell us how they think the democratic process will be available to ensure that the powers are being applied appropriately, so that we have a genuine London games and not just an event for which the Mayor is responsible. It is important for all London authorities to be part of the process, and not to feel that any interests that they have are being sidelined by the actions of the Mayor.

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Con): Is not what my hon. Friend said particularly pertinent given that the Olympic bid team felt unable to appear before the London Assembly recently when it had security questions to ask? Does that not suggest that the Bill should include a reference to the Assembly? I declare an interest, as a member of the Assembly.

Mrs. May: As my hon. Friend says, he has particular experience of the role of the authority and its need to be involved. I am sorry that the bid team could not appear before its members. I sincerely hope that that will be possible in the future, and that on subsequent occasions relevant questions can be answered.

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): I think the right hon. Lady is confused about the Greater London Authority Act 1999. The Mayor is directly elected and, as the only executive member of the Greater London Authority, has the role outlined in the Bill. I think that is quite right.

As a former member of the Assembly, I know that the London bid team has given evidence in the past. No doubt the successor bodies will do so in the future. I do not think anyone opposes such involvement, and I think the right hon. Lady may have misunderstood the position.

Mrs. May: I am grateful to the hon. Lady, if she is right about the bid team having appeared before the Assembly. It seems that we have two Assembly members in the Chamber, each giving a different view. Perhaps the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling) would like to discuss the matter outside the Chamber.

London now contains a number of elected bodies. The Assembly is elected, as are the London borough authorities and the Mayor. All elected bodies will have a role to play, and should be able to express their views and feel that their constituents' interests are being served. I can tell the hon. Lady that there is a practical point to be made about both the boroughs and the Assembly. If the games are to be delivered, given the implications for the whole of London, all who have been elected to fulfil their various roles should be able to participate in consideration of how that delivery will be achieved.

We are also concerned about the provision that gives the GLA even wider powers. Clause 32(2)(h) allows it to "take action in respect of places outside London."

I cannot believe that that is what the Government intended. I do not think I am the only Member who is alarmed to learn that the GLA will have powers to "arrange ... construction ... undertake works of any description"

and

anywhere in the country. That may not be what was intended, but those are the powers that the Bill gives the GLA. I ask the Secretary of State to look at the clause again and discuss it with the Local Government Association to ensure that, as representatives of local authorities across the country, its members are comfortable with it.

We want to ensure that the benefits of the games are brought to the United Kingdom as a whole, although given my local interest I am pleased that the excellent facility at Dorney lake has been chosen as the venue for the rowing. Of course it is not possible to bring Olympic events to towns and cities all over the country, but the games can attract tourists and visitors who may then wish to see more of what our country has to offer. I would be grateful if in due course the Secretary of State were to provide us with more guidance about how she intends to bring the benefits of the games to a wider audience. We should discuss the possibility of towns and cities offering training camps and sporting facilities to visiting athletes.

Many hon. Members have intervened on behalf of constituency interests today and on the previous occasions on which we have discussed the Olympics. I am interested to hear what assistance the Government will give to local authorities which are interested in hosting training camps in their areas.

We must not forget that the Paralympics is an important part of London 2012. My constituency benefits from an excellent sports association for the disabled, which counts among its members Paralympic medallists, including gold medallists. Up and down the country, talented athletes are watching what the Government do to promote and encourage them to capture British golds at the Paralympics. The Bill does not address that matter, but we expect the Government to provide greater clarity in due course about the resources to support competitors in the Paralympics.

It is worth remembering the sense of joy and euphoria that was felt not only in London but across the UK when the announcement was made. Given the dark days that have followed, it is important to recall the power of this sporting occasion to lift and inspire the British people. The Olympics have the potential to bring a positive change to the whole of the country. It is now up to the Government to live up to that potential and deliver a lasting legacy by hosting the finest Olympic games that the world has ever seen.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the next speaker, I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has placed a 15-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches, which applies from now on.

2.2 pm

Lyn Brown (West Ham) (Lab): I addressed a gathering in West Ham on Saturday as part of the VE and VJ celebrations. After we had reflected on the dreadful events of 7/7, I urged my constituents to take the joy and elation back from the callous bombers who destroyed many lives and our euphoria. Today, I urge hon. Members to take our joy back and to continue to celebrate our amazing victory in bringing the Olympic games to the United Kingdom.

The Olympic games is a prize that we, as a community, strived to gain over the past three years. Many West Hammers contributed to the attainment of that prize—for example, by contributing to community forums to garner support or talking to international or national delegations. Children sent their hopes and dreams to the International Olympic Committee, and the council contributed ideas and expertise to the bid. We contributed to the bid, and we demand the right to celebrate winning that amazing prize for West Ham. West Ham is proud, excited, expectant and optimistic, and it is beginning to celebrate its success, and I humbly ask hon. Members to celebrate London's and the UK's success.

My constituents are looking forward to participating in the games. We hope and expect that some of our residents will compete. Some of our residents will work as technicians, reporters, photographers, translators, artists, vendors, taxi drivers, chefs, medics and hoteliers. We expect some people to start companies, to sell services and to make their first million because of the inspiration and opportunity offered by the games. We are asking our people and our businesses to consider what they might reap from the largest peacetime event in history.

Some of our residents will be among the 70,000 volunteers who make the games so special. Recruitment has already begun, and to date 17,000 Londoners have volunteered, which shows their excitement about and commitment to the games. In my borough, more than 500 volunteers have received training and will participate in the London triathlon and volunteer for other activities in our libraries and schools. The opportunities to volunteer will help to reinvigorate civic pride and civic engagement, which will possibly provide skills, build confidence and increase employment.

The physical and economic transformation of my constituency will hopefully be matched by a blossoming of the unique cultural vibrancy of those dynamic and creative communities. The bid team acknowledged the importance of the cultural development framework prepared by the five boroughs, which includes the concept of a new east bank for London—a community-focused yet internationally renowned cultural hub stretching from Stratford city to the Greenwich peninsula.

To achieve those objectives, we must plan because, to use a well-worn phrase, to fail to plan is to plan to fail. Some are concerned that previous Olympic games did not reap the expected social and economic benefits given the financial outlay, although it is difficult to ascertain what social and financial benefits were expected. If one does not plan to reap a specific and quantifiable benefit, one will fail, and the social legacy of the games was not top of previous Olympic agendas.

As a local councillor from Newham, I have discussed the benefits with a number of local, regional and national agencies. Those benefits will massively change the deprivation indicators in east London. If we work to ensure that the legacy of the Olympic games is the renewal and regeneration of an area of the country—and indeed of a generation—we will succeed.

One concern is that the Bill does not refer to local authorities such as my own, and their role has not been recognised. I contend that the opportunities presented by the games will be fully realised, deep rooted and sustained only if the community is engaged with the physical and social changes. Local authorities are uniquely charged with that responsibility and are uniquely positioned to discharge it. Sir Robin Wales, the elected mayor of Newham, has already contributed as a member of the London 2012 legacy board. I ask the Secretary of State to ensure that the legislation fully recognises the essential role of local government in the planning, delivery and legacy phases of the London 2012 Olympics.

The regeneration of communities is a partnership between the different tiers of government, their agencies and the communities they serve. Without such partnerships, the renewal and regeneration of areas will not be accomplished. The Olympics will bring billions of pounds of business to national, regional, and local companies over the next eight years and more. The Olympics will see the creation of 19,000 new jobs in construction, ICT, media, retail, health, hospitality, sport and the creative industries.

Sarah McCarthy-Fry (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): Although I welcome the new jobs that the Olympics will bring, particularly in the construction industry, we must remember that the Government are also creating new construction jobs through programmes such as building skills for the future, and better homes. I hope that hon. Members agree that in planning for the Olympics we must ensure that we have enough training places to allow our young people to obtain the necessary skills to take advantage of those jobs and that we have sufficient capacity in the construction industry to meet the various demands.

Lyn Brown: I agree with my hon. Friend. If we do not set up training programmes and plan to get our children into those jobs, we will simply fail. The games will bring an opportunity for us to showcase our talent, creativity, innovation and design to global audiences, and will transform the local and regional economy.

We must, however, remember that there will be casualties from the regeneration of the area. Local businesses will be displaced because of the need to create space for the Olympic Park stadium. The Bill allows for the necessary compulsory purchases. I ask the Government and the London Development Agency to take immediate steps to reassure the businesses concerned and to proceed to expedite the responsibility of relocation and compensation. Land must be acquired at a fair market rent.

Mrs. Lait: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for allowing me to pursue an issue that I took up with the Secretary of State—that of compensation on compulsory purchase. As I understand the Bill—I will be grateful if she tells me differently—the LDA is limited to the current terms of the planning Acts, which means that it cannot go beyond compulsory purchase price. Can the hon. Lady explain where she sees the area for negotiation?

Lyn Brown: I am about to deal with that.

We need to ensure that the planning that is essential for the continued vibrancy of the companies concerned is expedited as quickly as possible. Firms have talked to me about wanting a fair price and about needing to ensure that any red tape is dealt with sympathetically so that they do not incur down time and therefore financial loss, which will mean a loss of confidence among their suppliers and customers. I ask the LDA or the Olympic delivery authority to streamline the planning and licensing permissions to avoid delays that might otherwise impede the relocation process.

I am further concerned by reports that break clauses in leases are being used as a device to lessen compensation, which may result in job loss and a loss of economic activity in the area. We all want the games to bring in additional businesses and business growth, not to see the demise of long-established businesses of international renown. Access to increasing opportunities is vital. Newham is the tenth poorest area in England and Wales and the fourth poorest in London. It is flanked on its western borders by the London borough of Tower Hamlets and the London borough of Hackney, which are the first and second poorest areas in the capital.

Think of the vast area of deprivation, the lack of skills, the high mortality rate, and the low educational achievement. West Ham has the lowest employment rates in the country. A third of our households contain no one in employment. Our people die six years earlier than those in the community of Westminster. More than half our children live in poverty. Imagine what could be achieved for this community by the benefit of the games. A games that fails to benefit these people—benefit, not displace them—will be a failed opportunity and a failed investment. If we can secure these benefits for the community, it will reciprocate.

The country and the world can rely on the energy and enthusiasm of east Londoners. After all, more than anywhere else in the world, this is where the world comes together. Some 110 languages are spoken in Newham schools alone. It is a place where diversity is not just tolerated but celebrated. Every athlete will find a community to cheer them on.

In return for the honour of hosting the games, we promise that visitors from the rest of London, the rest of the UK and the rest of the world can expect the warmest of welcomes in the east end. As staff, hosts, passionate spectators, and enthusiastic and efficient volunteers, West Ham residents will make the 2012 games unforgettable. In return, we must collectively ensure that the 2012 games are remembered not only for providing a truly world-class event but for providing long-lasting benefits to east London, to London, and to the whole of the United Kingdom.

2.14 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Notwithstanding the appalling tragedy that befell London the day after that wonderful moment as Jacques Rogge fumbled with the envelope and announced that London had won the Olympics, the hon. Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) is absolutely right to say that today we must use our discussion of this vital Bill as an opportunity to celebrate the success of London and of the whole country.

I have had opportunities on other occasions to give my thanks to all those who have been involved in that wonderful success—Seb Coe, Keith Mills, Barbara Cassani, the Prime Minister, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport team, including the Secretary of State and the Minister for Sport and Tourism, and many others, including the large number of elite athletes and young athletes who joined us as part of the bid team in Singapore. They all deserve our praise for a fantastic achievement. A few days before the announcement of the result, the Prime Minister anticipated how he would react were we to be successful, saying:

"it's not often in this job that you punch the air, and do a little jig and embrace the person next to you".

I can assure hon. Members that when the announcement was made in Singapore very many people were punching the air, doing jigs and embracing the people next to them, but we understand that it also happened in London and right across the country.

We all know that winning the bid is not the finishing line but merely the starting gun that signals the hard work that is necessary to ensure that we deliver what we promised to deliver in 2012—the best-ever Olympic and Paralympic games. This Bill is part of that process of getting on with the work that is necessary to achieve that. We all know how important it is to get on with it quickly, because there are huge prizes to be won. We know that from all the other countries that have benefited from having the Olympic games. Just one example suffices to illustrate it. Before the 1992 games, Barcelona was ranked as the 16th most popular destination for tourists; since then, it has been for many years consistently ranked in the top four. If other countries and cities can benefit, there are also huge prizes for London.

Of those prizes, five crucial ones are on offer. First, above all, the delivery of the 2012 games will help to invigorate our sporting nation. It is worth reflecting that one influential International Olympic Committee member said, after London had been awarded the bid:

"Seb's presentation was not so much on London as on sport."

It was, and rightly so. The underpinning philosophy that should guide the way in which we deliver the 2012 games is the way in which it can invigorate our sporting nation. That is a vital goal. This week, as our schools finish for the summer holidays, 70 per cent. of those leaving school will drop out of any sporting activity whatsoever—that is a staggering 390,000 children. We need to find ways of persuading them to continue being involved in sport, and the Olympics will help in that process. It is frightening to think that by 2020, on current trends, 70 per cent. of women will do no exercise other than walking. We are all aware of the problem of obesity, which has trebled among children in the past decade, and overall is costing this nation £8.2 billion a year. I mention that figure to draw attention to it in comparison with the cost of the Olympics. Obesity is costing £8.2 billion a year. The expenditure of some billions of pounds on the huge prize of the Olympics pales into insignificance by comparison. The games will inspire the nation to get active, and I welcome that.

The Bill will also create a lasting legacy for our sporting infrastructure. Unlike some of the previous games, it is being planned so sensibly that there will not be enough "white elephant" sports facilities to start, as in the cliché, an "albino zoo". That will not happen here because of how we have planned for it.

Secondly, the games will enable the regeneration of three of the most deprived boroughs in the United Kingdom, and will bring broader economic benefits across the whole country. The games will be crucial in the lower Lea valley, which will blossom and benefit hugely, like so many other areas.

Thirdly, the Bill will enable zero waste games, which will help set sustainability standards for the future. The IOC recognised that our games offer comprehensive and positive environmental legacies, which are prizes worth striving for. Fourthly, the activities leading up to the games will showcase our country's excellence in art and culture. Indeed, the bid already did so with schemes, such as the "40 Artists, 40 Days" project, in the countdown to 6 July. With Jude Kelly at the helm we have every reason to believe that the London 2012 games will also offer a world-class cultural programme.

Fifthly, another crucial prize, the games will unite the nation, sharing in the build-up to 2012 and in the excitement of the games themselves. Those are the huge prizes to be won, but several hurdles need to be overcome to ensure we attain them. It will not come as any surprise to the Minister or his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that from time to time, supportive of the games as we are on the Liberal Democrat Benches, we will be critical of some details. Earlier this month, David Moorcroft, chief executive of UK Athletics, said,

"This is one issue where politicians can truly unite and show the public that they can co-operate when they need to and challenge when they need to do so, but do it in a way that is for the greater public good."

Any concerns or criticisms that we may have on some details will be discussed with the Government in the spirit of finding a way forward for the benefit of the games and the nation.

As the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said, we face some challenges. We must deliver the games on time, and we have got off to a flying start with our intention to get the Bill on the statute book as quickly as possible. We need to avoid all the delays that could arise from unclear lines of responsibility. In a recent debate in Westminster Hall, some of us referred to the huge complexity of the current arrangements in sport. This Bill, together with other activities connected with planning for the games, adds a number of additional bodies to that sporting framework. It is crucial that each body knows what its responsibilities and lines of communication are and what it is accountable for. We must get that right to avoid problems of delay. I am not thinking just in terms of structure; I am thinking of areas, such as construction and transport, where we need to ensure perfect co-ordination.

During the debate on Crossrail, the right hon. Lady, like me, was concerned about some aspects of the Bill. We are concerned that current arrangements for Crossrail give the Office of the Rail Regulator power to give overall primacy to Crossrail above anything else. Conflicts may arise about some transport arrangements for the Olympic games, so I am delighted at the agreement that that issue will be looked at by the Crossrail Select Committee.

We also need to ensure that Crossrail and the Olympic games do not conflict over the need for people with relevant skills. I hope that the Minister will work closely with the Department for Education and Skills to ensure that we provide appropriate training now to ensure that we have people with the right skills to carry out the jobs, rather than us having to rely on workers from overseas.

We must deliver on budget. That will be a challenge. Other countries have had difficulty maintaining their budget plans. We have robust budget plans for the games, but prices can change. Construction costs are increasing at three times the rate of inflation. We need to explore how further to protect Londoners from significant increases in their council tax, more than has already been announced, and how we can ensure that no additional raids are made on lottery funds.

We must deliver a safe games. The IOC approved Britain's security arrangements and praised us for our role in helping to make the Athens games safe. Our plans are robust, but in the light of the recent terrorist attacks they must also be seen to be robust. There needs to be greater reference to security in the Bill. It is surprising that the Bill places no specific duty on the Olympic delivery authority to have regard to security in planning decisions. I hope to return to that issue.

There is a need to balance the IOC requirements with the needs of UK residents. The Olympic movement is an immense force, overwhelmingly beneficial, but with the potential to be overbearing. While honouring the requirements of the IOC to restrict advertising, street trading and ticket resale, legislation needs to be light touch and flexible. We should not gold plate any IOC requirements in respect of those issues.

We must ensure that throughout the next seven years and right up to the games we maintain the current, fantastically high level of support for the games. It is worth looking at reports in local newspapers the day after the announcement was made. The Herald in Glasgow, for example, said,

"Scotland can expect a huge tourist boom, as spectators extend their stays to take in the sights."

A newspaper in Gwent, Wales said:

"Gwent can expect excellent knock-on effects from London's selection to host the 2012 Olympic Games."

In Northern Ireland the Belfast Telegraph stated:

"The Olympic Games in 2012 will trigger a huge sporting bonanza for Northern Ireland."

From all the nations of the United Kingdom we have seen an immediate reaction of genuine excitement about winning the games and genuine belief that all parts of the United Kingdom will benefit. My local paper, the Bath Chronicle said:

"Cheers could be heard across the city", and in Birmingham the report was,

"This is great news, not just for London but for the whole country . . . This is a huge regeneration opportunity, which we will seize with both hands to ensure that all our communities benefit."

That is what people expect and we must ensure that they are not disappointed. We must ensure that each part of the country is given the help and support that it needs to maximise its potential. As the Secretary of State said in response to an intervention, the nations and regions support group under Charles Allen has a crucial role to play. I know that it has been working long before we won the bid but it has already held meetings subsequently and I hope that the Minister will tell us a little more about the support that each part of the country can expect.

I find the Bill's references to regional development agencies confusing. It implies that RDAs can undertake work in their regions in relation to the games if the Olympic delivery authority asks them to do that. One would have thought that they should be able simply to get on with work if they believe that it is appropriate for their region.

We have already heard what the Bill does. It creates the Olympic delivery authority; gives that authority powers to provide a transport infrastructure, including sophisticated traffic management, low carbon vehicles, the Olympic javelin train from King's Cross to Stratford, with a travelling time of only seven minutes and so much more; empowers the Mayor of London to spend council tax revenues for use in the games, and fulfils various IOC requirements on touting, training and advertising and ensuring that the Olympic environment is clean and hassle free. The Bill will achieve great things but it also asks us to take a leap of faith.

We took a leap of faith with the bid and we were proved right. However, we are being asked to take a leap of faith with the Bill. It does not mention many key issues such as immigration and tax arrangements for athletes, their entourage and supporters. It does not refer to the role that Her Majesty's Customs and Excise will have to play in dealing with the likely flood of counterfeit merchandise. It does not mention the huge challenges that we will face in 2012, when we shall have not only the games but digital switch-over in London. The media authorities have the huge task of ensuring clear spectrum for broadcasters who want to beam out each day's events in London.

Even when the Bill refers to key issues such as the prize of setting new sustainability standards, it often does not go far enough. For example, I should like the ODA to be made to have regard to sustainable development in fulfilling its planning responsibilities. That could be done in clause 5.

The Bill requires a leap of faith for another reason. During the passage of the Gambling Bill, I criticised the Government for including so many opportunities to give the Secretary of State secondary powers. One in every 10 clauses in the Gambling Bill gave the Secretary of State secondary powers. In the Bill that we are considering, one in every three clauses provides for a new power for the Secretary of State through secondary legislation. I hope that the Minister will assure us that, when the Committee considers the Bill, it will see as many of the regulations as possible in draft form.

We will pick up on several other issues in Committee. I have already referred to the problem with Crossrail. Why, in outlining the mayoral powers, does the Bill contain no provisions to enable the Greater London assembly to scrutinise their exercise? Why do not restrictions on ticket touts include more onerous restrictions on newspapers and online market places such as eBay advertising illegally touted tickets? Is it not odd that, in relation to the role of the powers of the GLA, the Bill does not refer specifically to consulting the ODA or, as many others have said, local authorities?

Mr. Walker: Are not hospitality packages another touting problem? A ticket with a face value of £50 can be sold on with a rather grotty lunch attached for £750. Is that not a form of touting for which we need to watch out?

Mr. Foster: There are many examples. Hon. Members know of people paying large sums for a towel and getting a free ticket to an event thrown in. I know that the Government have been considering ticket touting seriously, but I hope that the time will soon come when we debate ways in which to prevent not only ticket touting for the Olympic games but all other forms of touting.

Mrs. May: Given the outlawing of ticket touting, does the hon. Gentleman agree that there should be suitable arrangements for the resale back to the Olympic authorities of tickets that people are, for practical reasons, unable to use? People need to be able to sell those tickets on, so that other people who wish to visit the games have a genuine opportunity to do so.

Mr. Foster: The right hon. Lady is absolutely right. I should like to reflect, in passing, that if some of the events organisers who complain about ticket touting were to establish more effective operations to enable the official resale of tickets for people who, perhaps through illness, are unable to use them, some of these problems could be resolved. Stopping ticket touting, especially in this internet age, requires far more than that, however. I am delighted that there are tough measures in the Bill, but I hope that they will go wider and address the issue raised by the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker), for example.

I have already mentioned the fact that the role of the RDAs appears to be somewhat restricted, and I hope that we shall have the opportunity to address that. I would like the Minister to answer at least one of the questions put by the right hon. Member for Maidenhead. Yes, the Olympic development authority is to produce an annual report and give it to the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of State will ensure that it is available to Parliament. That is welcome, and I hope that the same will apply to the annual report of the Comptroller and Auditor General into those accounts. However, I entirely support the right hon. Lady's call not only for the report to be made available to Parliament but for an annual debate to be held in Government time on the subject.

Given this country's proud record of being almost the founders of the Paralympic games, I hope that we shall always ensure that whenever we talk about the Olympic games, the Paralympics will be given equal importance. In that respect, is it not somewhat strange that while the Bill refers explicitly to the need to comply with the Race Relations Act 1976, there is no similarly explicit requirement to comply with the Disability Discrimination Act 1995? I hope that that omission will be remedied.

In the run-up to the bid, huge numbers of people across the country gave their support. Now we have succeeded, and we celebrate that. We praise all those involved in ensuring that success. We recognise, however, that we have but seven short years in which to deliver the commitment that we made to provide the best games ever. The Bill forms part of the necessary procedures that will ensure that we do that. I can assure the Minister, his Secretary of State and the House that we will give our full support to the Bill, notwithstanding that there are areas in which we believe that it could be improved. We will continue to provide our support over the next seven years to those working on every aspect of the preparations for the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic games, and, as a starter for 10, we will certainly support the Bill.

2.38 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I am pleased to take part in this debate on what will obviously be a massive event for London and for the whole country. I strongly endorse the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown), in which she pointed out that this will be a great event that is to be celebrated and welcomed, and that, above all, the basis of the bid was the regeneration of an impoverished part of north and east London. We must ensure that the games provide that regeneration, which will help the poorest people in that community, and that that assistance carries on after the games. We do not want to see the removal of the poor people of London to make way for the Olympic sites and all that goes with them, as has happened in other cities. The example of Barcelona is interesting, because that city managed to ensure that there was a huge social development spin-off from its games.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Ham mentioned employment opportunities. My borough borders the City of London, hers borders Canary Wharf, and Hackney borders both, as does Tower Hamlets. We have not seen an enormous number of jobs in the City or in Canary Wharf being made available to people in the surrounding boroughs. Instead, large numbers of people come in to fulfil those functions in both those places. I hope that the Olympic experience will not simply be the shipping of more people from further and further away and more commuter jobs, but that the chronic unemployment in that part of north and east London will be tackled.

[Jeremy Corbyn]

As a proud London MP, I hope that those things will come to pass, that London as a whole will benefit from the games, and particularly that the terrible housing crisis that faces the poor people of London, with more than 250,000 on waiting lists, will in some sense be alleviated by the construction of the Olympic village, and that it will be housing for affordable rent.

Meg Hillier: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is great news that the London Development Agency is setting up a business support and job brokerage unit, with people appointed by Christmas, to make sure that the concerns that he, I and other Members share are fully addressed?

Jeremy Corbyn: I agree with my hon. Friend on that point. The London Development Agency, the Mayor and the Minister will have to be assiduous not just in ensuring that all the Olympic facilities are developed, which is crucial, but that all the spin-offs go where they are intended to go. We told the world that our bid was on behalf of a multi-cultural city of London, and that it was about regeneration of a poor part of our city. We must deliver not just on the glittering stadium but on all the other things, too.

As a London MP, I also have a lot of sympathy with points made by colleagues from other parts of the country. While the games will obviously be held in London, and the major construction work will take place in London, we must ensure that the construction materials, prefabrication of buildings and so on are sourced from British-based companies operating in areas of high unemployment and problems, so that there is a real spin-off all around the country. As someone who grew up outside London, in the midlands, I can imagine people feeling, "Here we go again. London is getting everything and the rest of the country is not benefiting." I am sure that the Minister is well aware of that, and it is up to Members of Parliament to ensure that their areas do benefit.

I want to raise some specific items, and I hope that the Minister will reply to them. London's transport infrastructure was a problem area for the bid, particularly in comparison with that of Paris. The Mayor is well aware, as is the Secretary of State, of the need for huge improvements in the underground and bus networks and such tram networks as will have been developed by that time. Crossrail will not have been completed by that time, so it will not have much effect.

North and east London have a considerable network of railway lines. I am glad that they are no longer under threat of closure, as they were in the dark days when the Conservative party was in government, but rather have benefited from increased investment and increased usage, which is very welcome. I want the Minister to address the issue of the East London line, however. At the moment, the East London line extension, which has been approved, goes only as far as Dalston, whereas if it could be included in the Olympic development plan it could go through to Clapham junction, which would link up with facilities in south London that are to be used as part of the Olympic games. If it could be extended from Dalston junction to Highbury and Islington, it would link up with the Victoria line, and the spur off to Finsbury Park would link it up to the east coast main line. A direct tube network would therefore link east coast main line trains either at King's Cross or stopping at Finsbury Park to go straight into the Olympic area. Such a short extension of the line would not be horrendously expensive, but it would be a valuable link within the rest of the London network. I have pressed that case on the Mayor and the Secretary of State, and such an approach seems highly logical at this stage.

My other points relate to the creation of facilities around London that can be used to assist the Olympic games development. There is a shortage of swimming pools across London. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) will know that there is a splendid baths facility in Hornsey road in Islington, which was used as a training centre for the 1948 Olympics. Sadly, the baths have been closed, and a succession of developers has failed to develop the site. However, the building is still there, and more discussions are being held about it. The Hornsey road facility is the only 50 m pool in north London. We will need pools of that size for training purposes, and I urge the Minister to join me on a 91 bus trip to have a look at the baths together. I am sure that he will be bowled over and open his cheque book immediately to ensure the development of Hornsey road baths as a sports facility once again.

Earlier, I asked the Secretary of State about local communities. A considerable artistic and creative community exists around Hackney Wick, Tower Hamlets and the Olympic area in general. That is partly due to economic factors, as the rent for artists' studios and creative space there has always been relatively cheap, compared with the rest of London. I suppose that that is reminiscent of Hampstead in the 1940s and 1950s, since when the many artists who used to live there have been priced out.

Artists, sculptors and people of a creative bent make up an important part of London life. It would not be a good Olympic legacy if they were all to be expelled from their low-cost facilities to make way for the games. I hope that the relevant authorities and the Mayor will remember that part of London's creativity stems from all the art and artists that areas such as north-east London supply. I hope that real efforts are made to protect the conditions for artists and ensure that buildings removed to make way for Olympic sports facilities are replaced with equally cheap and accessible places for such people. In that way, we can maintain the wonderful ethnic and artistic diversity that is London. Most artists subsist on less than £8,000 a year, and so obviously have little chance of renting a studio in an expensive venue.

My final general point is more global than local. It has to do with the conditions under which much sports equipment, such as shirts and clothing, is manufactured around the world. The sweatshop mentality behind the production of high street brand names can be traced back to child labour and sweated labour in south Asia, Indonesia and many other countries. There are serious campaigns demanding that the equipment and clothing that will be bought and used are manufactured on an ethical basis. I hope that the Secretary of State and the Olympic authorities will take those campaigns seriously. These games are about diversity, equality, fairness and accessibility, and the Government must ensure that all the clothing that is licensed and used comes from ethically sustainable sources. The equipment and clothing that is available should be manufactured in places that do not use sweated labour or employ workers in dangerous working conditions. Such items should be put together in places that have good employment practices and where unions are recognised and workers have rights—all the things that we want for ourselves.

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware of Oxfam's campaign to ensure that the IOC adopts the fair trade legislation for the 2012 Olympics, and does he support it?

Jeremy Corbyn: I am indeed aware of that campaign. It is one of the factors that caused me to discuss the matter. I support Oxfam's campaign, and I hope that it is accepted as part of the basic requirements for the games. We can make these games very different from what has gone before. They can be advantageous for London and the country as a whole, but we must work very hard to ensure that they are.

The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) spoke about accessibility, and I agree with him. It is right that the Bill should refer to the race relations legislation, but why on earth does the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 not appear on the face of the Bill? I assume that that is merely an oversight, as the hon. Gentleman said, and that all games facilities will be fully accessible. Obviously, they will have to accommodate the Paralympics, but I want to be sure that every facility will be fully accessible.

The Bill gives various people enormous powers—in respect of planning, development, contract letting and so on—that must be exercised with caution, openness and transparency. There has to be some means by which we can prevent a house price and building boom from taking off in north and east London, as that would remove from those areas the very people who have made their homes there, and who have won the bid for London by their poverty and their needs.

Harry Cohen: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is incumbent on the Minister in his winding-up speech to expand on the Secretary of State's earlier comments about "discreet" planning powers for the new Olympic authority. I do not know what "discreet" means in this context. Does it mean that the authority will meet completely in secret, that it will take its decisions secretly and that people will not know who is on it? Does my hon. Friend share my concern about that, and does he agree that the Minister should explain what "discreet" means when he winds up?

Jeremy Corbyn: I have been mulling over the use of this word. It could mean discretion, being discreet or lots of things, but it is a very odd word to use where planning authorities and planning permission are concerned. As Members, we all get involved in planning matters, and the one thing that we all demand is openness, transparency and accountability for the decisions being taken. So I hope that we will not hear too much more of this word "discreet", and much more about the taking of open planning decisions, so that we can ensure that nothing dubious is going on.

I hope that the Minister will recognise that the people of London welcome the games and want them to succeed, but that there are issues that we must assiduously address to ensure that the benefits are what we said they would be when the team won the bid in Singapore, and that the real beneficiaries are the people who desperately need the benefits that this regeneration plan can bring.

2.51 pm

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): It is a great pleasure to take part in a debate that is so welcomed in all parts of the House. The hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) asked the Minister to explain what was meant by "discreet", but I rather think that in this instance, it means specific and is spelt slightly differently.

It is a palpable pleasure that the UK has won the bid for the Olympics, and I add my congratulations to those offered to Lord Coe and his team and, indeed, to the Government. As one who participated in the debate to persuade the Secretary of State that perhaps we ought to back the Olympic bid, I am delighted that London and the UK have secured it. There has been a great transformation, in that the Scottish National party also welcomes the successful bid—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Perth and North Perthshire (Pete Wishart), who conceded the point, should know that anybody trained to sail on the Clyde will find it easy to win gold medals on the channel at Weymouth.

I welcome our securing the bid, the boost to sport and the interest that the young are already displaying in the Olympics and in the challenge of getting involved. It is they who will be the medal winners in a few years' time, and we all share their palpable enthusiasm—exemplified by what happened in West Ham on the night of the bid. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, I chaired a health authority that covered the boroughs of Hackney, Tower Hamlets and Newham, so I am well aware of the deprivation in that part of world. Having visited the Lea valley, I can only congratulate those who had the vision to see the opportunity that the east end now has—as, indeed, does the whole of London.

Today is the time not to carp and criticise—none of us wants to do that—but to ask questions to ensure that we establish the basis for a truly successful games. If the Minister cannot answer my questions today, I hope that he can answer them in Committee. We have talked at length about the Olympic delivery authority that the Bill sets up, which is chaired by the Mayor of London and has a limited membership. I hope that among that limited membership there will be a chief executive of the calibre to deliver such a complex and enormous operation as the Olympics will be. I also hope that there will be a project director used to delivering complex construction projects on time and at cost. One of my particular concerns is potential difficulties in the planning system that might delay construction.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) enunciated the difficulty of working out to whom the ODA will be accountable. The Secretary of State indicated that she would appoint the members. We have expressed a desire that the House should have an annual debate, with the Public Accounts Committee or a Select Committee being able to take evidence on progress, but that still would not answer who is ultimately responsible for delivery. Responsibility is diffuse at present. Does the London Assembly have any powers or ability to question the ODA, or to manage its overall criteria? Who will be able to remove under-achieving members of the ODA? Will it be the Secretary of State or the Mayor? How will we judge whether someone is or is not doing a good job?

A complex structure is emerging, as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) pointed out when he said that he wanted clear lines of responsibility. We need, as soon as possible, to see an organisational structure. The number of organisations already involved could lead to complex relationships. Unless carefully managed with clear lines of responsibility, that could lead to confusion.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): It is important that the organisation committee includes a member with responsibility for the country beyond London, and its composition should not be purely geographically based. May I ask the Minister to take cognisance of that when considering the organisation of the games? We should also consider the historic significance of this country's role in founding the modern Olympic movement. In particular, I think of Dr. William Penny Brookes who in 1850 founded the Wenlock Olympian Society, which celebrated its 119th running of the Olympic games just a couple of weekends ago. I hope that we will at least be able to send the torch through Much Wenlock on its way to London in 2012.

Mrs. Lait: I do not represent a Gloucestershire seat, but I think that Gloucestershire can claim to have recreated, at an even earlier date, the original Olympic games on Dover hill, but I take my hon. Friend's point.

We do not want an ODA that is too big, and the operation has to be clearly and tightly managed.

Some financial questions are very much at the front of the minds of London council tax payers. Obviously, we want the Olympics to keep to budget, and we recognise that the Treasury has already set aside contingency sums. In the bid document, the Government also accepted responsibility for any cost overrun. That has been divided broadly between the lottery and the Mayor of London. If there is a cost overrun—we all hope that there will not be—we would like to know who is responsible for what percentage share. Council tax payers in London will find it daunting if, according to a current estimate, they are to pay an extra £20 on a band D council tax bill for the next 40 years. We need clarification of whether the 12 per cent. Treasury tax take on the Olympic lottery will be used as a further contingency, or could reduce council tax payers' contribution of £20 a year to half of that.

Meg Hillier: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Lait: If the hon. Lady will give me a second so that I can finish my point, I will be happy to go away—[Laughter]—to give way. I will go away at the end.

We must also ensure that council tax payers have an idea of the finite sum of money for which they will be responsible. The Bill should set out the amount of money that London council tax payers will be responsible for at, say, 2005 prices plus inflation.

Meg Hillier: I suggest to the hon. Lady that she is raising a scare by suggesting that London council tax payers will be paying for 40 years. Does she not agree that the benefits to London will be enormous? I agree that we need clarity, but the benefits to Londoners are particularly important, so it is only fair that they should pay their share.

Mrs. Lait: I agree that London will benefit enormously. I hope that the hon. Lady will take part in the Committee stage, when we can tease out how much London council tax payers will be responsible for. It would also be sensible if they could see on their bills a statement of how much the Olympics are costing them each year.

I have long believed that there should be a bigger role for the private sector in the delivery of the Olympics. We want to ensure that the private sector has as much access as possible to the bidding. I am slightly concerned that an organisation such as the London Development Agency could itself take responsibility for construction. With the best will in the world, while it may be a good commissioner, it is not a good provider. We have to ensure that the private sector gets as much access to the contracts as possible.

One of the issues that I was keen to tease out from the Secretary of State was planning. The Bill gives the ODA planning powers similar to those that the London Docklands Development Corporation had, and we have seen what a success the LDDC was. One thing that concerns me is that the current compulsory purchase powers in the planning Acts are passed over to the ODA for the purposes of the Bill. If that happens, many businesses will find themselves not receiving the compensation for removal that they believe, and their valuers tell them, that they need and deserve.

If we were, for instance, to adopt the French system for the provision of the Olympic facilities, people could be bought out at a price that they could accept and there would be no delays in delivery as a result of the planning system. The planning system could be one of the keys to delays and hence cost overruns. Why is the Minister not prepared to adopt the French system of buying people out?

We have also to consider the impact on businesses around the Olympic site that perhaps do not fit the image of the modern Olympics, such as old warehouses that are not a pretty site but are outwith the envelope of the Olympic developments. What sort of compensation should they be looking for?

Several hon. Members have raised the issue of transport, and earlier this week we debated the Crossrail project and the impact that its construction might have on the Olympics. My hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field), who unfortunately cannot be here this afternoon, made the point that Crossrail will be being built during the Olympics and will mean that Charing Cross road will be closed for two years, not only to traffic but to pedestrians. The businesses in Charing Cross road, especially the bookshops, are part of the cultural offering that London makes to any visitor, and those businesses will suffer severely. I was pleased to hear that the Select Committee will be able to consider the interaction of Crossrail and Olympic construction, and I hope that such issues can be resolved sensibly, because I am a great supporter of both.

We want to see London's transport links developed, but we must be careful about the interaction of their construction with the construction of the new Olympic venues and village. The pressure on the construction industry will be enormous. Hon. Members have already mentioned the need to ensure that we have enough people in training to provide the building skills that will be required, but we must recognise that people will need to come in from outside the UK. We should encourage as many as possible to come to ensure that we can deliver all the projects. The East London line extension is one of those projects and the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) has already mentioned the impact on his constituency. It will also have an impact on my constituency. Several stations will be closed for varying periods—two years, 18 months, a year.

Ms Dawn Butler (Brent, South) (Lab): Is the hon. Lady suggesting that local people will not be trained and able to do the construction work and that we should spread the net wider? Surely part of the Olympic legacy should be that we ensure that local people are trained in construction and able to take well-paid jobs.

Mrs. Lait: I agree with the hon. Lady. We want to ensure that as many people as possible are trained to take advantage of the jobs that will be available. However, I doubt that we can train sufficient numbers, so people will come from all over the world with their skills, at management and professional levels. I have no objection to that, because the introduction of new skills raises the level for everyone. That is a real legacy that the Olympics will provide. However, we must also ensure that the construction projects are managed so as to minimise disruption to everybody else as they try to move around London to get to work and create the wealth and infrastructure that we need to deliver a world-class Olympic games.

The East London line development is a case in point. We must ensure that it is delivered in a way that minimises disruption to everybody. We need better transport to Heathrow, from east to west. We also need to build into that, in the case of my constituency, the tram from Beckenham to Crystal Palace so that people can then travel on the East London line. The issue of Crystal Palace has been of concern for many years. We need to ensure that we get that development right, too. If we can achieve everything that I have mentioned—it is a long menu—we will have a world-class Olympics, and it is thanks to all hon. Members encouraging the Government and our team for 2012 that we have the Olympics in seven years' time.

3.9 pm

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): First, I inform the House that I am a trustee of TimeBank UK, the largest volunteer group in the country, which is charged with the volunteer programme for the Olympics. My hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) said that she thought that 15,000 people had volunteered, but in fact they are volunteering through our website at the rate of one every five seconds. More than 30,000 have registered so far, and we held a meeting this week to discuss what to do with them for the next seven years. We need only 75,000 volunteers in total and at this rate we shall have them all by next weekend.

I am closely associated with Stoke Mandeville and have been part of its fundraising team to make the Paralympics the best in the world. I am proud to say that we have already raised about £7 million.

Mr. Love: I was interested in my hon. Friend's comments on volunteering and I am pleased that so many people are coming forward. The knack is to ensure that the volunteering programme reflects the diversity of both London and the UK. Do his figures show how the different communities that make up London and the UK are reflected in the volunteers?

Derek Wyatt: I do not have that breakdown, but I will get it for my hon. Friend. Given TimeBank's existing work—for example, it carries out all the mentoring on behalf of the Home Office for families who take in asylum seekers—I am sure that the strength and commitment of its team will be satisfactory, but I will obtain the figures and place them in the Library.

Like everyone else, I congratulate the team. Seb Coe, Keith Mills, Mike Lee and Alan Pascoe have done well, but two people have not been given enough credit. The first is my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State who had the unenviable task, three years ago, of convincing a rather sceptical Cabinet that the bid was worth while, but to her great credit, she gathered support and did so. We must not forget that. The second person was one of our ambassadors in Singapore, who, so my spies tell me, was doing the rounds with great élan: the Prime Minister's wife was corralling many members of the IOC and introducing the Prime Minister to them. The campaign was very much like a general election campaign—that is where some of the other bid teams got things wrong—where the last four days are critical. We got the last four days right and France did not. That was the key, so we should also commend the Prime Minister's wife.

I was lucky enough to see the Sydney bid at close hand, as I visited Sydney twice before the games. I made a post-games visit to Athens as part of my Select Committee work. Making such a bid is like a couple of entrepreneurs setting up a start-up company: they have got to the starting line and obtained their money—in this case, we have been awarded the games. There is then a rather difficult situation, after the initial public offering, in that the management of the company last only for the next 18 months and, because they cannot cope with managing a brand-new company, are replaced by professionals. We should not be surprised if the current management team is not the same in 18 months' time. That is normal and we should expect it.

The key thing is to ensure that the ODA understands how companies are built and developed, and that the appointment of people to the management team is critical. I realise that the Secretary of State will make those decisions, but we need to understand that members of the management team will need to be replaced, not at regular intervals, but in two or three years' time.

Two things worry me, and they have been raised by other Members. The first is security. There was a hijacking at the Munich games in 1972 and a bomb at Atlanta in 1996. Greece did not expect expenses for security of £2 billion, which it had to take on the hip. The Athens games cost the Greek Government 10 per cent. of gross domestic product. In any normal economy, that would be overwhelming. Given the problems that face any major world event, security is critical and I do not really see why it should always fall on the home team to provide the money. The IOC is a very rich organisation indeed—it will probably take between £20 billion and £30 billion in TV fees over the next 10 years—and although it is generous in giving at least $1 billion to the host city, I do not see why there should not be a separate fee for security, and we need to argue for that between now and 2012.

Secondly—I will not be popular for saying this—we must look again at how this matter is managed in the House. We did have a Minister without Portfolio whose only portfolio was managing the dome. The dome was built on time and to budget. It was popular with some people. The only thing that did not materialise was our 12 million visitors—we only got 6.8 million. Everyone who told us that we would get 12 million was wrong, including every tourism expert and everyone from British Airways. If we can have a Minister for a rather minor event like the millennium dome, it seems to me that, as we grow our expertise in the Olympics, we need a Secretary of State for the Olympics, or a dedicated Minister for the Olympics only. That is very important. The Secretary of State has wide responsibilities. She not only has the Department for Culture, Media and Sport but she is Minister for Women too. As this complex, difficult area develops, the Government should look at establishing a Minister for the Olympics.

The ODA will report to Parliament and it will be required to send an annual report to the Secretary of State. I wonder whether we might beef that up. It is critical that the Government find time every year for the House to debate that report, as other hon. Members have said. I say that because I chaired a meeting two weeks before Singapore on the design implications of the Olympics. About 100 designers attended and the Minister for Sport and Tourism was there. One aspect made me nervous, and it has been raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn), who is no longer present: housing.

In essence, so far the housing looks to be rather like Le Corbusier and the 1950s high-rises that went up in south and north London that we are now blowing up and taking down. We could be much more Port Sunlight, New Earswick and Welwyn Garden City. We need a very different approach on this and, if we go for high-density, cheap housing, we will deeply regret it within 10 years. It will not be the site that we think it is in legacy values. That is why there should be a way for hon. Members to feed our expertise into the system.

In The Observer last Sunday, there was an interesting article by Tim Payton, in which he floated the idea of Olympic parks across Britain. I am greatly attracted by that idea. We are all struggling in our constituencies, wondering which 1 per cent., or 1 per cent. of 1 per cent., we can get of the big budget of the Olympics. We are struggling to find out how we can participate if we are not a London borough. I just wonder whether the Olympic parks might be a good idea.

I also wonder whether we can persuade the Minister to look at that 12p in the pound of the lottery that goes to the Treasury. Although £750 million from the lottery will be made available for the games, a hell of a lot of money is still going to the Treasury from that 12p. Could we make that a bond that could go into the market to develop the Olympic park idea, so that if we beefed up the regional development agencies' interest in this whole procedure, we could at least give some of the money from the 12p to each RDA, to make some sort of infrastructure facility bid?

I live in Kent. We are the largest local authority. We do not have a single Olympic event. We do not have any facility that could host an American team or a Japanese team, and therefore we shall need to come for money.

Mr. Walker: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that it would be nice if we took the Olympics across the country and perhaps had dedicated sports centres and training centres that would allow the whole country to join in the Olympic year. Is that the sort of thing he is considering?

Derek Wyatt: It will not be for me to consider, but last week we had a debate in Westminster Hall on elite sport and, when the Minister for Sport and Tourism replied to the debate, he said that that evening he was seeing Charles Allen, who was in charge of the nations and regions part of the Olympic bid. We are all trying to understand how we can participate. For example, I think that my constituency has the second-best windsurfing in the world, in Sheerness, but of course we do not have a hotel facility for 80 people. Even if we built a hotel for 80 people, we would not be able to use it as a hotel once the windsurfing teams had gone. We do not want a white hotel. We want some system that will help us understand. If we want windsurfing, we must approach the international body first, then the British Olympic Committee and the British windsurfing organisation. We do not have the experience or expertise to understand the decision-making process, nor do we have the money. We are trying to understand what we can do. I hope the Minister will say in his winding-up speech that there will be a one-day conference so that all our chief executives, not just of the RDAs and councils, but of sporting bodies, can reach a better understanding of how we can participate.

It would be good if the RDAs could be challenged to do an Olympic audit. It would be instructive to know how many swimming pools, tennis courts or equestrian centres we have that are of Olympic standard. If they are not suitable, our councils must find the money to build them so that we can attract those sports. If we do not do that, Paris will, and so will Brussels, Hamburg and Berlin. We are competing for overseas teams not just inside the United Kingdom, but across western Europe. Hon. Members will remember that our Athens team took accommodation in Cyprus and our team to the Sydney Olympics took accommodation in Brisbane for two years. That is big business and we need to understand how best we can participate.

If the Minister is so minded, I should be interested in serving on the Committee that will consider the Bill.

The Olympics could be a huge catalyst for sport. There are three things that we do not have in the UK: there is no sports think-tank, there is no archive of every piece of sports film ever shot, and there is no sports museum. If there is some way that we can lasso the Olympics system in order to upgrade sport to the prominence that it should have but has never had, this is the one opportunity to do that. With regard to sport archive development, will the Minister convene a meeting with the British Library to ask it to serve as the digital infrastructure for the United Kingdom and make the Olympics its first priority so that we can gather all the films that have been made about sport in the United Kingdom? Because the British Library is the best in the world, perhaps the project could be extended to garner sports film from the whole world.

As I have said before, the film of the 1948 Olympics, which was made on nitrate, is three hours long and has never been shown on television—I am still praying that BBC3 or BBC4 can find the time—was saved and digitised only because two people spotted it in a can about eight years ago in the British Film Institute library. We must not lose such material.

Another aspect that has not been discussed because it is not entirely covered by the Bill is the legacy that we leave the world from the games. Those of us who celebrated the millennium remember 300,000 people in Pall Mall. Why can only 80,000 go to the opening ceremony? Why can the celebration not take place all over London? Why should it not be celebrated in every football stadium? Would it not be wonderful if, like the opening of the millennium celebrations which started with Sydney harbour bridge being lit up with fireworks, we lit up all the cities around the world that have hosted the Olympic games, sharing an opening ceremony with all those cities and bringing a family of cities into the Olympic movement?

We should leave something so that people could say, "Ah, yes, London did that", much as we did in 1908 when we created the marathon. We also created the winter games in London in 1908 by freezing a swimming pool in the middle of the athletics pitch and skating on it. That eventually led to the winter games of the Olympic movement. In 1948 we introduced the photo finish and starting blocks. We have contributed many things as legacy, but they are tiny. It would be good if we contributed something major.

When de Coubertin set the marker for the games in 1896, it was for sport and arts. There were gold medals for poetry and music. We have a Nobel prize for literature, and it would be great if we could return to some aspects of the creative part of the Olympics. My hon. Friend the Member for West Ham said that 120 nationalities would participate. Would it not be spectacular if there was some way in which we could celebrate their cultures and our culture together, beyond just sport?

Once again, I commend everyone who has made this possible. It is the most exciting thing that will ever happen in my time. My son called me from school to say, "Dad, dad, we can go." He is only 13, and we do go to lots of sporting events. I said, "Son, I am not going to take you, I am going to watch you."

3.24 pm

Mark Hunter (Cheadle) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to make my maiden speech to the House today. First, I add my congratulations to London on its successful bid to host both the Olympic and Paralympic games in 2012. I am sure that London's Olympic bidding team must have taken great encouragement and inspiration from Manchester's tremendous success in hosting the Commonwealth games back in 2002. Members from across the north-west region will surely agree that those games were not just a great sporting spectacle, but succeeded in bringing together communities, including my own, in a way that few other events can do. The residents of Cheadle made up a considerable proportion of the vast army of volunteers whose selfless contributions made the Manchester games such a success. The community spirit and enthusiasm shown three years ago by my constituents is typical of the local population, whom I am privileged to represent.

It is also an immense privilege to succeed my friend and colleague, Patsy Calton, as Member of Parliament for Cheadle. Hon. Members will no doubt recall the courage and determination that my predecessor demonstrated only a matter of weeks ago in this very House. Having known Patsy for many years, I know that her qualities as a person and as a Member of Parliament were not defined only by the bravery and commitment that she displayed throughout her illness. She was an inspiration to, and a great servant of, the community in so many other ways. The drive and tenacity that she showed when assisting her constituents was matched only by her attention to detail and her sharp mind, which she employed in the House and in Committee. Her sheer work rate on behalf of the people of Cheadle will be celebrated for many years to come within the constituency and beyond. She came closer than most to bridging the gap between being a champion of the local community and a politician of national standing.

Let me take a moment or two to explain a little more about the constituency of Cheadle. It is located on the southern tip of the Greater Manchester conurbation, and many local residents consider their area to be part of Cheshire, as the constituency historically was. Even the briefest tour of my constituency amply demonstrates why residents feel this way. The word "leafy", used frequently to describe the constituency, simply does not begin to do justice to Cheadle. We are blessed with magnificent, award-winning parks and nature reserves, such as Bruntwood park and Gatley Carrs, and tree-lined streets throughout the local area. I would advise any hon. Member fortunate enough to be visiting the area that there are few better days out to be had than taking a trip to Bramhall hall, a magnificent 14th-century manor house and its surrounding park.

A number of hon. Members have probably visited my constituency over the past few weeks, and I hope that they all enjoyed themselves as much as I did. However, I assume that Members of the party to my right are unlikely to be putting in an appearance again for some considerable time.

[Mark Hunter]

It is not just the precious green belt and open space that make our area so special. We have a number of district centres, all with unique characters, which serve to provide a network of villages and community centres across the constituency. Cheadle village, Cheadle Hulme and Bramhall are all distinct local centres with a range of amenities but which also face constant challenges from out-of-town retailers and other pressures.

Cheadle is considered a prosperous area and the statistics appear to bear that out. An initial assessment would show that local people, in general, are highly educated, highly skilled and relatively highly paid, particularly in a regional and sub-regional context—a typically affluent suburb, some might say. That broad-brush approach, however, does not tell the whole story. It does not, for example, take account of the large number of pensioner households in every part of the constituency. Nor does it take account of the pockets of deprivation that can be hidden from Government funding formulae. It also fails to recognise the needs and expectations of the community.

The dire funding arrangements for local services are the topic of debate locally. As leader of the local council for the past three years, I can say that there is a certain grim predictability about the financial settlement for local government every year. It leaves the council that is responsible for so many vital local services in an unenviable position, as both a low grant and a high council tax authority. It means that a two-pensioner household in Heald Green can end up paying more council tax than, say, a Cabinet Minister is expected to pay in a different authority area, although our council spends less per head than any other Greater Manchester authority. Moreover, all the evidence suggests that the situation is likely to be exacerbated by council tax revaluation.

A pupil at King's Way school in Gatley in my constituency is funded at around £1,000 per year less than a pupil at a school just over a mile away, in neighbouring Manchester. Local schools already achieve excellent results, but so much extra potential could be released if we benefited from a fairer funding regime. All the signs suggest, however, that the inequality will only get worse unless something is done.

The position is replicated across a range of local services. Indeed, not long ago my predecessor had to fight tooth and nail to retrieve £1 million of funding for Stepping Hill hospital that was rightfully its money. As for crime and antisocial behaviour, we are all familiar with the raft of legislation that has emanated from the Chamber in recent years. The sad reality is that, during the same period, my constituency has seen the closure of one police station and the failure to establish a long-promised police post in Cheadle Hulme to replace it. There is no shortage of legislation, but there is a pressing need for more police officers to enforce the law. The principle of fairness underpinned the Liberal Democrat election campaign in May, and I intend to pursue it in respect of the funding of local services in Cheadle.

I am sure I am not the only Member whose constituents need and deserve a vastly improved transport network. Fortunately, my constituency has a coherent strategy as part of the south-east Manchester multi-modal study. The strategy includes completion of the Manchester airport eastern link road, as well as construction of the Poynton bypass and the A6 Hazel Grove bypass. The current road network, involving the infamous "road to nowhere"—the airport link road—only serves to funnel traffic on to suburban roads in the Heald Green, Woodford and Bramhall areas, where the infrastructure is totally unsuited to coping with the volume.

I am not the first Member for Cheadle to refer in a maiden speech to the importance of delivering the A555 relief road scheme, but I hope for the sake of my constituents, and indeed neighbouring constituents, that I am the last.

While I intend all those serious issues and many more during the time for which local people allow me to serve in this role, I consider myself one of the most fortunate Members in the House in being given the opportunity to represent such an attractive, confident and cohesive community. It is therefore with sadness for the loss of my friend, but also with immense pride, that I have the privilege to serve the people of Cheadle. The constituency has seen some of the benefits that a major sporting event such as the Olympics can have for a community, in so many different ways. Other Members have said the same this afternoon. With careful planning, I hope that London can repeat that success in 2012 not only for the capital, but for our country as a whole.

3.34 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for indulging me and other London Members, who have had to duck in and out of the Chamber to find out the impact of this afternoon's traumatic events on our constituencies and constituents.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) on his maiden speech. As far as I am aware, I have never visited Cheadle, and although he did not say anything that put me off the idea, I suspect that it may be a little time before I get the chance to do so. I congratulate him on his model maiden speech and wish him well for the remainder of the Parliament.

This afternoon's events again bring into juxtaposition the Olympics and terrorism in London. It seems to be an unholy coincidence that just as the euphoria of the bid success in Singapore was succeeded by terrible atrocities the following day, today we are debating the Olympics and again we have seen appalling events in London. By 2012, the pain caused by the horrors of a couple of weeks ago, which will never be forgotten, will, I hope, have eased. A successful games will be the best memorial to those murdered two weeks ago. So far as I am aware, my constituency suffered more than any other two weeks ago, in that four of my constituents—Rachelle Chung Far Yuen, Michelle Otto, Neeta Jain and Anthony Fatayi-Williams—were victims. Those four people came from four different ethnic backgrounds, which reflects my constituency's diversity, London's diversity and our country's diversity.

Diversity was a key factor in our successful bid. Every visiting team will have its own home crowd, because among London's residents there are people with roots in every nation in world. Some of those residents are recent arrivals to our shores, while others have been here for generations. The Norman Tebbit cricket test was out of place when it first appeared; it is out of place now; and it will be ancient history when we host the games in a few years' time. People will back the GB team as well as the team from their roots country, which is how it should be. The GB team will be strengthened by our country's diversity, because competitors from different backgrounds will add to our chances of striking gold, and the whole of our country will support it, irrespective of ethnic roots. A successful 2012 games is the best way in which to answer the bombers. I am pleased that the Mayor, Ken Livingstone, has announced that relatives of the victims and those who were injured will be given pride of place in the stadium at the games.

Bombers and terrorists do not believe in the Olympics or the Olympic ideal. My hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) has referred to the history of the ancient Olympic games. The Olympic truce was another feature of the ancient Olympics. We should consider trying to stop wars around the modern world, at least for the couple of weeks of the games, in the same way as wars were stopped in the ancient world as part of a religious duty. Greece tried to engender such a truce before and during the Athens games.

We must build quickly and locally on the great enthusiasm for the Olympics. Good practice notes are needed to help communities and local authorities use the games as a focus for their own sporting endeavours. As has been said, London council tax payers will pay some £20 a year towards the cost of the games, and if we are to maintain enthusiasm, we should spread around the benefits.

How should we go about arranging training camps for visiting teams and how can other countries' Olympic associations find out what is available in our different communities? Shaftesbury Barnet harriers, one of the country's leading athletics clubs, is based at the Copthall stadium in my constituency, where there are also two specialist sports colleges and many other public and private sports facilities. Some of those are in need of investment to bring then up to scratch, although in many cases it is not a large amount of money. We need to know whether that investment is available and how it can be readily accessed to ensure that in hosting visiting countries' teams we can provide the facilities that they need to ensure that they can compete to the best of their ability. Will there be some co-ordination among areas able and willing to host visiting teams or a competitive environment with one authority bidding against another? I would prefer proper co-ordination around the country and around London to ensure that the games are distributed fairly.

Ms Butler: Does my hon. Friend agree that co-ordination is also needed as regards the delivery of apprenticeships? We need to ensure that companies that are already established in delivering skills for jobs, such as Stonebridge House, are used in the bid process.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I hope later to raise one or two issues concerning the construction projects.

In housing visiting teams we should build on diversity around the country to try to host teams in communities with which they have links. For example, in my area we have a large Jewish community with many excellent connections and roots in Israel. We have one of the largest Indian communities in the country, and many African nations are represented. Is it possible for several areas or local authorities to get together to put in a joint bid to host some of the larger teams? We need some guidance on how those arrangements should be made and accessed. The proposed Olympic delivery authority could play a useful role in the co-ordination of such activities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Ms Butler) anticipated my remarks when she mentioned the role of apprenticeships as we go about organising the construction projects. It is fair to look at what has happened elsewhere. In Greece, much of the construction work, large and small, was farmed out around the whole country, benefiting the whole of Greece and the Greek economy. There is no reason why that should not happen here, given that this will probably be the biggest and most important construction site in London and the south-east, if not the whole country, once terminal 5 is completed.

My hon. Friend also said that this should be an opportunity to ensure that there are plenty of local jobs for local people. Foreign teams of construction workers may arrive from all over the European Union, perhaps in the same numbers as their sporting teams given the scale of the project. There is no excuse for not making efforts to ensure that local people are trained up, through the apprenticeships that my hon. Friend mentioned, to play their part in building the major projects in the east end. It would be alienating for local young people if they saw people coming in from outside and the sporting facilities going up with no jobs for them.

Those who work on the sites must have proper terms and conditions and health and safety arrangements. That is particularly so in the case of overseas workers. During the last Parliament, the Work and Pensions Committee's report on the work of the Health and Safety Executive highlighted the problems of health and safety in the construction industry, with particular reference to the position of migrant workers. I hope we can take that into account in our approach to the letting of construction contracts.

Ms Butler: In the context of the trade unions, will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating the GMB on the deal that it has managed to secure whereby Wembley stadium in my constituency will be built on time next year?

Mr. Dismore: As a fellow GMB member, I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who makes an excellent point. The GMB has played a major role in that success. Trade unions can play a constructive role in ensuring that the work force plays its full part in delivering such projects on time. We have some excellent trade unions working in the construction industry. Their job is not only to ensure decent terms and conditions and health and safety but to act as a proper link between management and work force to deliver these important projects.

Many others Members wish to speak, so let me say in summary that we would welcome a cultural Olympics throughout the capital. London is the cultural capital of the world for theatre and art. The Olympics will bring enormous economic benefits to London and the country as a whole. The legacy of the Olympics will be long-lasting.

I congratulate all those involved in the bid. It was a hard but worthwhile job, and a job well done. Now the real work starts to deliver the Olympics. I know that all my colleagues in London, in this House and in local government will do their utmost and make great efforts to ensure that the games are successful, as will the Government.

3.45 pm

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), particularly as it is not a Friday, when he is not constrained by a time limit. I noticed the passion with which he spoke about the Health and Safety Executive, which we will hang on to with great interest.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) on an excellent maiden speech. I did not go to Cheadle during the campaign, although I have to admit to spending a lot of time on the telephone, talking to his now constituents. He should not take it for granted that I will not call in future, but I congratulate him and look forward to hearing his contributions in the years to come.

Like others, I congratulate the bid team on a fantastic triumph. Seb Coe and the others deserve every accolade. We should not forget the efforts of Barbara Cassani, who laid the foundations at the beginning of the bid. For Londoners it was a rollercoaster week with such euphoria on 6 July and such depression on 7 July. It is up to the people of London to make a success of this. It is the greatest honour that the world can bestow on a city and we must make the best of it.

London will reap tremendous benefits: the legacy, the development of the facilities and the inspiration to our young people. I agree with the hon. Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) that we must involve the boroughs as much as possible. I should be interested to hear from the Minister how parts of London with facilities to offer can put them forward. Will there be a sort of clearing house? In the Croydon and Bromley area there is Crystal Palace, which has already been mentioned and does not need a clearing house, and schools such as the Whitgift with tremendous national-class facilities, which it would love to make available. Guidance is needed on how that is best achieved.

Plans for London are undoubtedly ambitious. There will be a number of temporary facilities, such as Lords, Wimbledon and Horseguards Parade. There will be places around the country, such as Weymouth for rowing and sailing, in which I take a particular interest. The Lea valley site is extremely large. Canary wharf is only 85 acres; Lea valley will be 500 acres. It will need top-class management to fulfil its potential and to bring about the necessary restoration and regeneration of the east end. I do not want to make party political points, but lessons can be learned from the Jubilee line and the dome. The hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) held out the dome as a triumph; others might not see it that way. The lessons of development and project management have to be learned from those projects.

A lesson is to start building early. If we leave it to the last minute, as in Athens, there will be the inevitable scramble, which we want to avoid. A key player will be the Mayor of London. I am pleased that he is given substantial powers to cut through bureaucracy. With a major development, many organisations feel obliged to be consulted and want to have their finger in the pie. It will take a fairly ruthless so-and-so to cut through that and drive the project forward.

The people of London still need clarity about finance. The Secretary of State said in her opening speech that the position was clear. It is clear if the games are on budget, but if the cost overruns, it is not clear who will pay and how the contributions will be found. If the Minister is not in a position to elaborate tonight, will he provide a steer in the coming months?

I want to consider the affected businesses. I have taken a particular interest in one company, F. H. Brundle, whose sole proprietor is a constituent of mine. He has run a business in the relevant area for several years and owns a freehold site. However, he is obliged to relocate. He is a builder's merchant who picks up passing trade that comes from the east end of London into the development sites of the City and the west end. The London Development Agency is offering to relocate him five miles away in Beckton or 12 miles away in Rainham Marshes. Neither site has freehold available. My constituent has a freehold site and there is therefore no question of like-for-like compensation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) made the point in relation to clause 4 that the sums of money are equivalent to those that would be paid if the land were purchased compulsorily. If that is the cap, the businesses will lose money. They have to find a new site and build on it and relocate factories. Not all the staff will be able to move with them. There will be redundancy payments and relocation costs. Investment value will be lost because the businesses have freeholds but will end up with leaseholds. Business will be lost in the transition and because the firms are no longer on such a prominent site. My constituent estimates that he will lose several million pounds.

I know that the Minister has an open mind and that he does not want such consequences. However, the Bill suggests that, with all the good will in the world, there will be losses. I hope that either I have read it wrongly or the matter can be tackled in Committee. I hope that there will be scope for proper compensation for the businesses that are affected by the problem.

Before the bid was successful, the line was always that the matter was for the LDA to determine. The Minister knows that I asked about that on several occasions and the Secretary of State claimed that it was a matter for the LDA. However, the LDA says that it is constrained by statute and finance. We are going around in circles and only two people can cut through the problem—the Minister and the Secretary of State. I would be grateful if the Minister could tackle the matter as a priority because businesses will be seriously affected. There is a lack of suitable alternative sites nearby. The sites on offer from the LDA are not ready to plan for or start development. There is uncertainty about the available funding and compensation. Many businesses are already worried about the time frame for their location.

The Olympic games will be a major project, subject to the scrutiny of the nation and the world. There are bound to be problems. There will be scandals, accusations of corruption and issues that we have not anticipated. It is incumbent on us all to keep our nerve when the going gets rough. We are not considering a political issue. All the parties want to get behind the games and make them a success. London has the ability to put on a great games, but we must deliver.

3.54 pm

Mr. Robert Flello (Stoke-on-Trent, South) (Lab): I, too, would like to praise all those involved in the bid, but I would like specifically to single out those who have not been mentioned by name earlier. Over the past few days, we have discussed the difficulties involving our cleaning staff here in the House who have been campaigning hard for an increase in their pay. I want to pay tribute to all the back-office staff—secretaries and the like—who have worked so hard on the Olympic bid and who have not been named. Yes, a lot of good work has been done by Lord Coe and his colleagues, but without the support staff, none of it would have happened. So I want to put on record my praise for them.

Many right hon. and hon. Members have commented on the tremendous opportunities offered by holding the Olympics and the Paralympics. I hope that we take the opportunity to embrace what has come out of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and the good will that exists to ensure that people with disabilities are rightly and fully included in our wide-ranging society. In that regard, we must ensure that we give equal weight to the Olympics and the Paralympics.

My constituency can look back for inspiration to the 1920s, when Bob Leavers from Longton was a swimmer of some renown. More recently, it has seen the emergence of a brother and sister sprinter partnership in Alex and Ashleigh Nelson, who have won some championships in the past few months. It is important that we start now to identify those inspirational athletes, and that we inspire our young people to come forward to be trained and brought through.

I would like the Minister to consider this suggestion: across the country, we have many specialist sports colleges; let us rebrand them. Let us make them specialist Olympic colleges. Let us really seize every opportunity provided by the Olympics and the Paralympics to ensure that we inspire our young people to embrace this opportunity. There are other, more wide-ranging facilities in our communities. Many of the schools in my constituency have swimming pools. Over the years, there have been various swimming galas, but they seem to have lost the impetus that they had in the past. Let us take the opportunity to ensure that all our facilities used to the maximum. Let us do an audit to determine which schools have swimming facilities, running tracks and so on, and ensure that they are being used to the utmost and made available to the community. There are also many new facilities such as children's centres springing up in my constituency. Let us look at those to see whether we can bring them into use for the Olympics and Paralympics.

The difficulties involved in ensuring that athletes are able to compete has been mentioned. This might sound corny, but I urge all our communities around the UK to adopt an athlete. Let us identify the athletes in our communities and embrace and support them. Let us help them and work with them to give them every opportunity over the next seven years to get into pole position—I hope that I am not mixing up my sports—so that they can fully participate, up there with the best, and bring home gold for us.

Of course, the not-so-young can also get involved. I am sure that hon. Members will be amazed, seeing this athletic form standing before them, to learn that older athletes or potential athletes can get involved, not only in sporting events but in other areas such as volunteering. It is important that it is not only Londoners who feel able to volunteer. We need to ensure that people across the UK can volunteer to take part.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I chair the National Strategic Partnership for Volunteering in Sport, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will be pleased to learn that we have just held a meeting here in the Commons this morning. Indeed, some of the other members of that body were in the Gallery a moment ago. More than 25,000 people have already signed up for volunteering. I do not know what I am going to be doing in seven years' time, but I want to endorse the point that my hon. Friend is making: everyone in the country can participate in the games by signing up, and they can sign up now.

Mr. Flello: I am grateful for that intervention, because it is important to make sure that every community is involved. Given some of the difficulties that some communities are facing at the moment, this is a good time to stretch out the hand of friendship to them, and to make sure that they are part of the plans in the lead-up to the Olympics and Paralympics.

Several Members have started to put forward their constituencies as possible training venues. [Interruption.] I hear the cry, "Surely not" around me. It is important that a complementary approach is adopted, as some constituencies might have facilities that are perfect to host a particular training venue, and adjacent constituencies might have other facilities that would support and complement that. We must avoid a bidding war, and work with rather than compete against other areas to ensure that bids are coherent.

As many Members have mentioned, sport and volunteering are not the only possibilities arising from the Olympics. Over the past couple of days, colleagues representing north and east Staffordshire constituencies have come together to try to give some political leadership to the region. We are looking to form a north and east Staffordshire Olympic taskforce to engage with various agencies such as the regional development agency, the north Staffordshire regeneration zone, the various city and county councils, the Staffordshire sports partnership and, as has been mentioned, trade unions. A tremendous opportunity exists for trade union membership across the UK to be used as a conduit to bring in volunteers and to spread the message about how people can get engaged and take part in various activities. That huge network needs to be tapped into.

Builders, plumbers and the like will be required to construct facilities in London. Many Londoners already find it difficult to obtain a plumber, however, and if they all go off to work in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown) and in Hackney, Hendon and other areas, there will be a gap. Let us therefore encourage our young people to go into careers in plumbing and building—there will also be vacancies locally as others go off to do work in the areas being developed. My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley) has a facility in her constituency for training people with such potential, and we must make sure that learning and skills councils are on board.

The north and east Staffordshire area is ideally placed for logistics. Teams travelling from all over the world will wish to set up in different parts of the UK and to bring over equipment in advance. Storage and distribution facilities will therefore be necessary. Without wanting to plug north and east Staffordshire too much, it is a perfect location for such activities. As a final plug, the Olympics will need an official supplier of ceramics, and where better than Staffordshire?

I hope that the Olympic team will consider setting up regional park-and-ride facilities across the wider UK, to which people can drive and then get public transport into London, rather than everybody being required to drive down to the south-east and then get a train. That would ease congestion in the area and ensure that the whole package is better for those coming to the Olympics.

On ticketing arrangements, which several colleagues have mentioned, I hope that the International Olympic Committee will give careful consideration to providing better concessionary arrangements for hard-working families. I also hope that steps are taken to ensure that people across Britain are able to afford the tickets and that a suitable public transportation package is put together.

The question of fair trade has already been raised in the debate. It is vital that we make sure that the Olympics and Paralympics do not provide an opportunity for manufacturers to sell sports equipment and national team clothing put together by child and sweatshop labour in developing countries at poverty wages. We must show real world leadership and make sure that these Olympics and Paralympics are the fair trade games.

In conclusion, the news about the Olympics is excellent for the UK. People across the country must be able to seize the opportunities that come their way and take advantage of every possible spin-off. We must work collectively as a country and not in competition with each other. We should save the competition for the Olympics and Paralympics.

4.5 pm

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute to this debate. I shall keep my comments brief to allow other hon. Members to make their contributions, but first I want to congratulate the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) on his excellent maiden speech. I had the opportunity to visit his constituency recently and can confirm that it has many beautiful and leafy roads for people to walk along. I look forward to returning in the not-too-distant future.

I want to echo many of the sentiments already expressed in the debate about the benefits that staging the Olympic games in London in 2012 will bring to the UK. I am very proud that Scott Wilson, an engineering consultancy in my constituency, will play an important part in some of the logistics behind the event. The Secretary of State spoke about the potential benefits for the whole of the UK, and I agree that the Olympics will provide a lasting legacy in terms of sporting facilities. The games will give us a unique opportunity to showcase our country and to unite behind the event.

However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) said, it is time to ask questions. I want to bring to the attention of the House concerns that the scope of the Bill could make it difficult for community organisations and the business community to show their support for the 2012 Olympics. Community organisations and many small and medium-sized firms can never hope to be official sponsors of this great event, as such a role costs many thousands of pounds, but I am sure that they will want to support an event that will be an integral part of our lives for the next seven years.

One specific concern is that the Bill will prevent any references to the games from appearing in our communities other than those made by the media and the official sponsors. There is an important balance to be struck between protecting the official sponsors of the games and people's broader freedom to note this important event.

Official sponsorship is an important part of the revenue stream needed to fund the games, and I understand that we must protect the value of the games for potential sponsors. In many ways, the Bill is designed to prevent ambush marketing, in line with one of the IOC's requirements. I am sure that hon. Members will be familiar with the IOC's definition of ambush marketing, which refers to all

> "intentional and unintentional attempts to create a false or unauthorised commercial association with the Olympic movement or the Olympic games."

The inclusion of the relevant clause in the Bill is understandable, as large corporations have engaged in blatant ambush marketing in many recent high-profile sporting events. However, I believe it important that we distinguish between unfair association, involving an implied endorsement and a consequent marketing gain, and mere reference to or allusion to the games, in which an Olympic logo might not even be used. Here, I am referring to schedule 3, under the terms of which, any reference that may > "create in the public mind an association between the London Olympics" and words such as

> "2012 . . . twenty twelve . . . gold . . . silver . . . bronze . . . London . . . medals . . . sponsor" and even "summer" would constitute an infringement.

There is a big difference between ambush marketing and reference to the event by a third party who is not an official sponsor. Such a party could be a small local business or even a community group. That the use of the words that I have listed might infringe the law is a matter of great concern, and it does little to support our cross-party efforts today to get as many people as possible involved in the forthcoming event.

If there is no implied suggestion that an organisation or business is an official sponsor, or that people could be confused into thinking that such an association existed, such an organisation should not fall foul of the legislation. We need to consider this issue very carefully. The danger is that we will tip the balance away from encouraging the country to support the event, toward what could look like censorship. That is a particular danger for community organisations and businesses. A passing reference by them to the games could mean that they were committing an offence, and they could face a fine of up to £20,000.

I fully understand the need to provide certainty in order to protect sponsors' rights and, indeed, the integrity of the Olympic movement. But I want the Minister to reassure us today that care will be taken and that we will not gold-plate this legislation. We must not put in place draconian rules that exceed the needs of the IOC, and which risk alienating the public and business by outlawing reference to the games in publicity or in events, for fear of incurring the heavy fines to which I have referred.

This is a unique opportunity to unite the whole country, but it is important that we strike the correct balance between guarding against ambush marketing by those who seek to benefit from the games commercially without being sponsors, and taking account of those who want to support their community and the games—be they businesses or other organisations—and to be part of one of the most important events in our country's history.

4.12 pm

Laura Moffatt (Crawley) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller), who is entirely right in saying that this is the beginning of our opportunity to scrutinise this Bill and to celebrate. I hope that, as a Member from outside London, I can demonstrate in my contribution that we in Crawley are truly delighted that the Olympic games is coming to London and to the UK.

Most of my friends and family will find it hilarious that I am supporting a sporting activity, given that I object to walking 15 yd to the car, but I have to say that I have been completely enthused by the whole process. I am glad to say that I have form on this issue, in that, as early as the beginning of last year, I was asking my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State what the Olympics will mean to towns and cities outside London. I suspect that I was flying a few kites, without really being certain that the bid would come to anything. However, I am delighted that there is evidence in Hansard that I was interested in the issue then. I remain interested in it, and committed to ensuring that not only Crawley but the rest of the UK benefits from the fantastic opportunity presented by the Olympics and Paralympics coming to this country.

It is completely fortuitous that Crawley happens, in a few weeks' time, to be opening one of the best sports facilities that this country will see. It includes a fantastic running track, a leisure centre that will be the envy of the country and a 50 m pool. The pool has been provided for the people of Crawley—it was their money, and they built it. But we can see that there are fantastic opportunities to enthuse and engage with young people. I am glad that my political history lies in an enlightened Labour council that has always provided first-class facilities. To see that matched now by the Government's commitment to making sure that the games come to the United Kingdom is to see something extremely special to us all.

When we were building the facilities, we were worried we would not have enough money, and I am glad to say that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and Tourism received a delegation from Crawley to hear about the benefits the development would have. We began then to be a bit more excited by the idea that there might be opportunities for us in our part of the world to be able to contribute. And we believe that that is what we are doing in Crawley—making a contribution to the tremendous bid. It is not just about getting our name on the map, but about contributing to ensure that the 2012 Olympics and Paralympics will be the most successful ever, and I firmly believe that they can be.

Part of the Olympic bid involved diversity, and many hon. Members have mentioned that. For a town with almost 15 per cent. of its people coming from different ethnic minority groups, it is important that we deliver an Olympics that truly encompasses all the fantastic diversity that we have in the UK.

There are several other reasons why we are very keen. I have mentioned the enlightened approach of Crawley borough council, which has delivered fantastic athletes to the UK. Not a Member will not be aware of Daley Thompson, the fantastic decathlete who won gold in 1980 and 1984—an Olympic gold medallist who came from Crawley. He was offered free facilities, in Crawley, to make sure that he was able to achieve his magnificent wins. The same goes for Mick Jones, the hammer thrower, who won gold at Manchester in 2002 and who continues to compete. A woman I am particularly proud of and know well is Jane Blackburn, who won gold for archery at the last Paralympics. The House can see we have a fantastic history of not only contributing facilities but making sure that people are developed from those facilities and will be encouraged to be able to take part in what will be a fantastic games.

I have some questions for the Minister. I am keen that Crawley plays its part, but I firmly believe that we need an orderly collection of towns and cities able to contribute and that things should not be done simply by saying, "We have better facilities, so it should be us." We should be able to look to the ODA to assess properly the facilities and opportunities that towns and cities can offer and to ensure that they are recognised in such a way that we feel secure about having been offered an opportunity.

I firmly believe that would leave a good legacy for many years. I have spoken with people who were involved in the Sydney bid, and I have family members in Sydney who are involved in the volunteer programme, which continues to this day. People are continuing with the volunteering habit that they developed in the Olympic games, and that has to be a tremendous spin-off, which we need to accept and develop, and we have heard from other hon. Members just how that can be done.

We have fantastic links. Gatwick airport is in the Crawley constituency, and we are developing plans for a university campus to offer accommodation. Having said all that I have said about a co-operative approach, I do not think that there can be a better town than Crawley to contribute to this fantastic games. That is precisely what I am saying to my right hon. Friend the Minister, to ensure that we are considered and that we make this truly a magnificent time for the United Kingdom.

4.20 pm

Mr. Andrew Pelling (Croydon, Central) (Con): I very much agree with what the hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) had to say about the opportunity that the Olympics, as a celebration of sporting excellence, can offer us, not only in fostering sporting excellence across the United Kingdom and identifying sports people who will win medals for us, but in taking the fullest advantage of the sports facilities that different communities can offer. For London, this celebration of sporting excellence is important. We shall see many facets of sport across greater London and the games will bring many nations together. With so many different people, London offers such diversity.

One matter that has not been mentioned so far is that the bid was successful because it offered the prospect of being the greenest Olympics. Public transport will be used to allow people from across the whole of London to reach the games. It is important, especially for my constituents in south London, that the Government's very good promises to invest in the East London line and extend the trams across south London, particularly to Crystal Palace, will provide support for good green travel plans.

I am pleased that much reference has been made to the accountability of the Olympic delivery authority on the potential for cost overruns, especially in the context of the role that the Greater London Assembly has to pay—has to play, but also potentially pay—in holding the Mayor to account and scrutinising the power given to him by Parliament to restrict that budget if he has a two-thirds majority in favour of doing so.

I made an intervention earlier in the debate about the great reluctance of the Mayor, the London Development Agency and members of the Olympic bid team to present themselves before the London Assembly when its members recently had questions to ask about the efficacy with which the bid would be taken forward. It strikes me that there will be a conflict in the procedure if the ODA refuses to appear before the Assembly when it has a role in restricting the budget that may be made available for this important initiative for the country as a whole. A sensitivity has been created by the tremendous gearing towards the London taxpayer when only 8 per cent. of the GLA's spend is funded from London council tax payers.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): Transparency is fundamental in ensuring that the finances are robustly controlled. Does my hon. Friend agree that a good way to create transparency is to allow scrutiny by Londoners and separate out the Olympic precept on council tax bills in the same way as the London Mayor's precept is spelt out?

Mr. Pelling: That is a helpful suggestion. It might also be helpful to require the ODA to appear once or twice a year before the Assembly for scrutiny. That might be a way to facilitate understanding, rather than create potential conflict, which would not be helpful to progressing this important initiative.

I am also concerned about how the ODA will proceed on issues such as decontamination of the land, burying the power lines and any problems left over from the small nuclear power station—the GLA raised that issue recently. All those issues have the potential to cause significant cost overruns, so it is important to have transparency on them.

The role of the London Development Agency has not been mentioned positively so far in this debate, but the agency and the GLA should be congratulated on the positive role that they have played so far in the success of the bid. The LDA will have a significant role to play in the future and I shall be interested to see what the relative roles of the agency and the GLA will be, as laid out in the schedules to the Bill. Significant powers will be given to the GLA, and on balance that should be seen as a positive development.

It is important that the LDA should also be required to report frequently on its performance with regard to the Olympic process. As someone who used to sit on the LDA board, I have noticed the significant transfers of spending from other parts of London that are not close to where the Olympics will take place, even areas of great social deprivation. Such developments should be closely followed.

In conclusion, the Olympics offer the prospect of sporting excellence, but it is also important to ensure the greatest excellence in the way in which they are delivered, because London taxpayers cannot afford any kind of cost overrun when the gearing in the London tax schemes is so high.

Lynda Waltho (Stourbridge) (Lab): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter), whose speech displayed an excellent grasp of all the issues affecting his constituency and obvious dedication to it. I wish him well in his future political life in this place.

I wish to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister and the whole Olympic bid team on their hard work and determination in bringing the Olympics to London. There is nothing like an international race involving the French and the Brits to get the heart and lungs pumping. We were a little late out of the blocks but still took the winner's tape, which shows the mettle of the British team.

Along with the rest of the country, my constituents have welcomed the decision to bring the games to London in 2012, because they recognise the prospects for the whole country. Like my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I have been amazed by the reaction from children and young people. On numerous occasions when I have visited the schools, clubs and colleges in my constituency, they have shared with me their hopes and dreams of success in the future, focusing particularly on 2012 as the culmination of all of their ambitions. Imagine the effect on all those hopes and dreams when Conservative-controlled Dudley council announced plans to close Brierley Hill swimming baths, a facility that serves my constituents and those of the Minister for Trade, my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, South (Ian Pearson). Many of my constituents from Brierley Hill, Amblecote and Quarry Bank learned to swim at Brierley Hill and many children still receive their lessons there. Local schools use the baths and the leisure centre is home to the Brierley Hill and Stourbridge swimming clubs and to the Dudley Dolphins diving club. In addition to competitive sport, the baths and the rest of the leisure centre provide local people with opportunities to improve their fitness and to relax.

The decision to close the baths is in direct conflict with advice from Sport England, whose survey proved that Dudley as a whole has poor provision of sporting water space. Our club swimmers and juniors have great prospects for achievement in 2012, but no hope of assistance due to that short-sighted council decision. The blow was all the harder to take when the first citizen of Dudley, the mayor, added his vote to close the baths. The local newspaper, the Stourbridge News, which serves Dudley, South and my constituency, has launched a campaign with SOS—Save our Swimming—to retain the baths, or at least to encourage the council to find an alternative piece of land for a replacement facility, to provide a venue for learning vital life skills and for maintaining the fitness and health of all my constituents, as well as developing the talents of young swimmers and divers in Dudley and Stourbridge.

I hate to be the spectre at the feast, but my constituents voted for me to protect their interests and to champion their rights. They have the right to good health and good local council services and, most importantly, my younger constituents deserve the chance to dream and to achieve. All that will be harder to attain in the light of that short-sighted decision. I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to join me in condemning that decision, to add his name to the petition to save the baths and to use his good offices to prevail on Dudley council to reverse the decision.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): I apologise for the fact that I was unable to be in the Chamber for the first few minutes of the debate, especially as the whole debate has been so positive and enjoyable. Such a spirit of celebration and consensus is particularly appropriate on the day before the recess.

I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) on an excellent maiden speech. He knows, probably better than most people, that Patsy will be a hard act to follow, but I am confident that he will do well. I welcome him to the House.

I feel that the debate would benefit from a Scottish perspective. As many Members will know, there has been much support in Scotland for the London Olympic bid. The Scottish Executive supported the bid team, and many polls conducted among the Scottish public have shown a high degree of support. Generally, certainly in the House, there has been cross-party support among Scottish MPs, with the possible exception of the Scottish National party, although perhaps, as we heard earlier, even the SNP may yet be convinced of the benefits to Scotland. I am certainly convinced that Scotland will benefit greatly from the Olympic games in London.

As Members may know, Hampden will be one of the locations for the football tournament. Glasgow is ideal for that, as there is intense passion for football in the city; Rangers and Celtic matches always provoke a lot of cheering and high spirits. Indeed, Scotland would be an ideal location to kick off the football tournament, which will be held before the main opening of the games. I hope that the organisers will consider that option.

Scotland has hosted other national sporting tournaments. The special Olympics were held in Glasgow in early July and were a great success, partly because the city has a reputation for being friendly and good at hospitality. Scotland also has a national treasure in the tartan army, which is famed for travelling round the world to support our team; the army was much loved by the French people during the World cup in 1998 and is held in great affection. However, at the last World cup, people were unable to see the tartan army in such large numbers, as unfortunately Scotland did not qualify. However, we Scots have also learned to lose with good humour. It is important to be able to do that in sport, and certainly in many cases the taking part and the enjoyment are also important.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) mentioned the way that sport can unite the nation, and I was reminded that even sports that are not usually on the front or back pages of newspapers—sports that do not usually get a lot of publicity and generate a lot of interest—can unite the nation. I recall the winter Olympics, when, like many others, I went into the office to work the next day and found that everybody had been up until the small hours of the morning watching the curling team's victory. That is not a sport that one would usually expect the masses to be interested in, but it provides an example of how sport can unite people and get their enthusiasm going.

Obviously, huge economic benefits are likely to be experienced across the UK. David Williams, chief executive of Events Scotland, has estimated that that benefit will run into hundreds of millions of pounds for Scotland alone. Obviously, that will involve training camps being set up, attracting teams to come and prepare for the games; Scotland is well placed to do that. Sports facilities of international standard, such as the Scotstoun stadium, which has international standard badminton and athletics, Strathclyde country park with its rowing lake, and even the Tollcross Olympic swimming pool over in Edinburgh, will, I am sure, act as great attractions. Indeed, in my constituency we have a £14 million world-class training complex for a range of football clubs—Murray Park, based in Milngavie. So Scotland has world-class facilities, up to international standards, and I am sure they will help Scotland, through the London Olympics, to attract teams from around the world to benefit the economy.

As other hon. Members have mentioned, the games are also likely to act as an inspiration to achieve sporting excellence within the UK. Not all Members can claim the experience of my fellow Scot and right hon. and learned Friend the Member for North-East Fife (Sir Menzies Campbell) of participating in an Olympics as a competitor, but I am sure we all share the desire to see young people raise their ambitions to become Olympic champions in 2012.

Last week, in fact, two young constituents of mine, David and Stephanie, visited the House with their parents. After the tour, when they had learned all about the history, I was chatting with them outside and they were saying that they were keenly interested in sport. Of course the conversation turned to the Olympics and the excitement that if they persevere and train hard, it might even be possible that they too could compete not just in the Olympics, but in the Olympics in the UK. That thought acts as a wonderful motivation for young people taking part in sport. Indeed, Andy Murray, who is fresh from doing Scotland and Britain proud at Wimbledon, has said that the thought of playing Olympic tennis at Wimbledon with the backing of the crowd would be perfect, and I too think that would be perfect, especially if it put us in with a shot at the medals in tennis.

In addition to the economic benefits that would surely arise from the training camps, there is the issue of tourism, which needs to be looked at seriously. We must be careful to ensure that strategies are in place to encourage people to use their visit to London, perhaps for the Olympics, as a starting point for a visit to other parts of the UK. The central belt of Scotland is just five hours on the train from London—or an hour on the plane, even if that is a slightly less environmentally friendly way to travel. It takes a little longer to get to the north of Scotland or the wild west—the highlands and islands—but it really is worth the trip, and many areas of the UK would fall into that category.

We need to get better at stimulating tourism across the UK by visitors to London. When I was studying in London, sharing a flat with students from America, south-east Asia and around the world, I often felt like an outreach of the Scottish Tourist Board. Often the attitude was, "I have seen London so I have done the UK." We need to open up people's horizons and say, "London is fabulous but actually there is so much more on offer in the regions of England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland." We need to ensure that we are very much on the ball with encouraging that. The UK is a diverse, rich network of communities and there must be some new, inventive ways in which we can spark interest in tourism to other areas.

I conclude by saying that, obviously, we need to maximise these fabulous opportunities for London, Scotland and the rest of the UK. Many congratulations to everyone involved.

4.39 pm

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): The hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson) is right to draw attention to the UK-wide tourist opportunities that the Olympics provide. I echo that.

I am delighted that the Olympics are coming to east London. I repeat my congratulations to all involved in the successful bid, including the ministerial team, who did extremely well. Waltham Forest is one of the four local authorities that are in the Olympic park, and Leyton in my constituency will house the velodrome for the cycling and, I believe, the BMX sports. Waltham Forest contains Chingford. For a long time its MP was Norman—now Lord—Tebbit. He once made a famous statement about getting "on yer bike" to find work. All these years later, I am pleased to say it is a case of getting "on yer bike" for the Olympic cycling in Waltham Forest.

The 2012 Olympics promise to be the greatest event on earth. The world's eyes will be upon us and it is in the national interest that we make a success of it. It brings many opportunities, especially for the regeneration of an environmentally and financially poor part of east London. Lots of jobs will flow from the construction work and services, and we need to ensure that the local population, including local youth, is trained up with the skills necessary to benefit fully from that employment. Extra resources must be put into that skills training.

There are health advantages to be had as the population is inspired to get fitter, taking part in sport using existing facilities and, after 2012, the legacy facilities. It is important that schoolchildren are given the chance and encouraged to get fitter, too. In recent years there have been attempts at free access schemes—for example, to swimming pools. Those schemes must be expanded to offer schoolchildren free access to pools and tracks. Arts for the Olympics should not be neglected, and we should utilise the talents of those who are more artistic than sporty. I echo the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) about utilising art.

Many Londoners are worried about the cost of the Olympics and especially about a rise in council tax. The Olympic precept on the council tax as an element of the funding package to meet the games' costs is due to commence in 2006–07 and last for 10 years. In a press release in May 2003, the Mayor stated that the maximum addition to council tax to fund the Olympics would be £20 a year on average on a band D property. That strikes me as a reasonable precept. It would raise £625 million. If there were a cost overrun, that would require £650 million from the precept and the council tax charge would be for 12 years rather than 10.

The agreed funding package for specific Olympic capital costs is £2.375 billion, but if the costs go beyond that, although the Government are the ultimate guarantor of Olympic funding, they would expect to agree a sharing arrangement with the Mayor of London. So cost overruns still have the potential to cause damage to council taxpayers and they must be avoided. The costs must be kept under control. It is important to keep construction costs from spiralling, as happened with the dome, the Jubilee line, the Scottish Parliament and several other projects. We do not have a good record of controlling costs, but we must do so for the Olympic facilities. That means letting the tenders and getting the work done early. The later it is, the more the contractors have the taxpayer over a barrel, and that must not happen.

There is a lot to do with the transport improvements and the infrastructure work, but the Government are also committed to many other building projects. Building schools for the future was an election pledge that I strongly supported, so that every school that needs such building work will get it over the next 15 years. There is the work on major new hospitals and the modernisation of older ones, such as Whipps Cross University hospital in my constituency. That will be the second nearest hospital to the main Olympic facilities and the nearest to the velodrome, should there be a cycling accident, which I hope there will not be, so that must be modernised, and I am keeping up the pressure for that.

There is also much building associated with regeneration, including the Thames Gateway and Stratford city, and the Government have also set the decent homes target, which is a strong target to build and improve many homes. Therefore, we must really get a grip on the construction and get on with it. The Government should relax the requirement that they have had up to now to build primarily via the public finance initiative, and instead use all appropriate means to finance construction, depending on what offers the best value and what gets the job done quickly.

Quality work is also important, a point that I made in an intervention during the Tuesday's debate on the Crossrail Bill. It is important to work in partnership with the trade unions representing construction workers. I admit that I have a vested interest because I am on the parliamentary team for the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians, but I draw attention to early-day motion 591 in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham), which points out that safe systems of work and dignified terms and conditions, often with a directly employed labour force, is the route to world-class projects being built safely and delivered on time, and the Heathrow project is given as an example.

I agree with the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) that there must not be planning hold-ups. We need a proper and fair planning process, but a prompt one. In some cases, the national interest of facilitating the Olympics may need to be invoked, but that should not be left until the last minute.

I have a letter from Carlo Laurenzi, OBE, chief executive of the London Wildlife Trust, who is concerned about the environmental quality of the games as shown in the Bill. He says:

"To ensure the Government's loudly proclaimed aim of delivering the greenest games ever we're seeking your help to strengthen the bill for environmental and social gains. The All Party London Olympics Bill Research Paper [05/55] includes a whole section on regeneration and planning but this is missing from the Olympic Bill".

He concludes:

"The 2012 bid was built upon a foundation of sustainability but the London Olympics Bill fails to uphold this. We appeal to you to raise this as a mater of urgency."

Well, I have done, and I hope that as the Bill goes through Parliament the Minister will take that on board and we will get the greenest games ever.

Jeremy Corbyn: My hon. Friend has obviously studied the Bill in some detail. Could he help the House by saying whether the normal section 106 arrangements apply, or are they suspended because of the special nature of the planning procedure that is being invoked?

Harry Cohen: I have not studied the Bill in sufficient detail to answer my hon. Friend. I understand that the new Olympic delivery authority will have strong powers, but perhaps the Minister will clarify the specific point raised by my hon. Friend when he replies to the debate or in due course.

I come now to a bit of local politics. Newham is understandably thrusting in getting regeneration for its own area and was a powerful advocate for the successful bid, but its record with its neighbouring boroughs is not ideal. We do not want Waltham Forest—in my case Leyton and Leytonstone—

Lyn Brown: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Harry Cohen: Let me finish my point and I certainly will.

We do not want Leyton and Leytonstone to be Newham's car park, or the route used by masses of through traffic to access the facility. Better co-operation between the planners in the boroughs concerned, at an early stage, is essential. Waltham Forest must not be bounced by having some of the disbenefits forced on it.

Lyn Brown: Does my hon. Friend agree that the five boroughs concerned have done remarkably well in pushing together the benefits of the area that they all hold dear? In fact, the London borough of Newham may have been the driving force in creating the cohesion between them, keeping them together and pressing for the agendas that they all hold dear: inward investment, skills and education, health and opportunity, and opportunities for our children.

Harry Cohen: I agree, and I did pay tribute to Newham as a driving force. Now that we are getting down to the nitty-gritty, we must retain that cohesion.

Meg Hillier: Will my hon. Friend acknowledge the role that Hackney has played as a host borough, particularly in leading the cultural and creative industries?

Harry Cohen: That is a good point, well made. But we want Hackney to do even more. We also do not want any more road routes sprung on us at a late stage, for instance over the environmentally important marshes. We do, however, want public transport to be improved as quickly as possible. Reopening of the Hall farm curve in Waltham Forest would provide a north-south rail link through the borough and, crucially, to Stratford, the main station for the Olympics. That project should move to the top of the agenda.

The Royal National Institute for the Blind makes some interesting points. It says that the Olympic delivery authority should be "subject to the same safeguard in terms of promoting disabled access as local authorities when acting as planning authorities."

Disabled people want to enjoy the spectacle of the Olympics, as well as the Paralympics, and they should be able to do so. The RNIB also says that all buses in London should be subject to a requirement for "visual and audible announcements" for deaf and blind people, including "the many tourists visiting London for the Olympics".

There is no commitment to that so far, and I think that there should be.

As for the costs, a House of Commons Library paper gives a lot of ballpark figures—estimates—but one of them worried me. I am not convinced that £23,125 million for security will be sufficient, especially in view of the threats that we have faced and the bitter experience that we have had. The Government must think again about that estimate.

As I said, Waltham Forest is one of the four Olympic park boroughs, but it is not in a position to be the active contributor that it could be, because for the past few years it has been at the bottom in terms of the allocation of Government grants to London authorities. It has pared down its operation and become more efficient, but it now needs to be able to provide and facilitate more. It needs more resources to do that, and it cannot divert already stretched resources. I urge the Government to take that special factor into account in the next series of local authority funding settlements. Waltham Forest must be given more if it is to be a partner in the Olympic process.

Young people need to enjoy the inspirational and health benefits of high-quality physical activity. A new community sports facility, the SCORE project, is due to open shortly in Leyton. It will prove valuable during the Olympics, but schools have a vital role as well. Children are a captive audience. The Building Schools for the Future project must be brought forward in Leyton and Wanstead. It is currently at the back of the queue, which is not acceptable. In 15 years it will be too late. Waltham Forest is bidding for private finance initiative resources for a new pool and track complex. The borough wants to provide a replacement 25 m pool, track refurbishment and a new sports hall as Olympic training facilities and to reconfigure the surrounding area, including parts of the town hall complex and of Waltham Forest college. I hope that the Minister and his team will consider that bid favourably.

For a long time, the Tory-controlled London borough of Redbridge has failed to get its act together on the development of a swimming pool in the Wanstead area. That situation has existed for many years, and the Olympics provides an opportunity to rectify it. Wanstead is near enough to the Olympic action for a swimming pool to be valuable, if it is built. The London borough of Redbridge should revisit those plans and submit them to the ODA and the Government, who should consider them favourably. Finally, Waltham Forest must play a significant role in developing the local legacy benefits, which will also require resources and expertise.

The Olympics will cost, but it in my opinion they should be well worth it. This is a once-in-a-lifetime event for not only east London, but the whole of the UK, and it is in the national interest that it is nothing other than a success.

4.56 pm

Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): None of us will forget where we were when we heard that London had won the contest to host the 2012 Olympic games. The whole country is conscious that the games can be a tremendous showcase for our capital city and our country. I, too, congratulate the Secretary of State, the Minister for Sport and Tourism, Lord Coe and the team behind the bid. We all remember great Olympic moments of the past such as the titanic struggle between Sebastian Coe, as he was then, and Steve Ovett a couple of decades ago or Kelly Holmes's recent triumph in Athens. I am sure that the 2012 games will bring us more memorable sporting moments, hopefully with British winners.

As has been said, sadly, the moment of celebration when we won the games will for ever be entwined with the terrible events of the next day, when terrorism came to our capital city and an act of hate against the very diversity and plurality that helped us to win the games brought death and grief to London.

We await news of today's events, which show that that moment has not yet passed. We are still hunting those behind the bombings and still engaged in the much longer fight against the ideology that led people to commit terrible crimes against ordinary people who were going about their daily business. Our capital city and our country will not give up in the face of those who have attacked our way of life. We will lift ourselves to reclaim the spirit that won the games and we all hope that we will stage a games that captivates the world and of which our country is proud.

The Bill sets out a structure for managing the planning of the games and the financial arrangements for the huge investment required to make them a success, both of which are vital factors in a successful Olympics. The British people celebrated winning the games and look forward to a wonderful sporting showcase, but they also expect the games to be properly organised and delivered on time, and they expect the costs to be controlled. They are entirely right to take that approach, which is why it is welcome that the Bill sets out proposals for the ODA to manage our approach to the games.

The ODA faces a huge logistical and financial task. It must plan the games in a manner that inspires and maintains enthusiasm while commanding public confidence. It must ensure value for money and that the games result in not only 17 days of fantastic sport, but a legacy of lasting benefit to the whole country.

The ODA has one other essential task, which is to deliver on the Government's intention that the whole country should benefit from hosting the games. Of course the primary benefits will be in London. London is the host city and London will receive the lion's share of the spending involved. We understand that. But the Minister and the Secretary of State will be aware that, to maintain the great spirit of optimism about the games that we witnessed at the announcement, there must be continued efforts to ensure that other parts of Britain benefit.

Hon. Members from many parts of the country have pressed Ministers for their areas to host events or training facilities, each arguing the benefits of their own area. The west midlands, like other regions, will want to host training for competing countries and to play as large a role as possible in the games. There is already a commitment to host football in Birmingham at Villa Park. We have some excellent sporting facilities in the region, and a long tradition of producing wonderful athletes. Any country that comes to the west midlands to prepare for the games will find first-class facilities and a very warm welcome.

There is another dimension to what the west midlands can contribute to the Olympic games. The region is the manufacturing heartland of the UK. It has good access to London. We have world-class companies that excel in their fields and a strong record of innovation in science and technology. In information and communications technology, a recent survey found that more than a third of the sector in the region is growing at more than 20 per cent. per annum. Property and accommodation costs are much lower than in London. The region has led the way in ethnic minority business start-ups and has a highly committed work force that will relish the opportunity to help to deliver the games. Given the enormous amount of construction work that is needed, along with equipment and supplies, the west midlands is well placed to make a tremendous contribution. Of course, that will require investment to ensure the right mix and level of skills, but what we need most of all from Government is the opportunity to make the kind of contribution of which the region is capable.

Today, I spoke to people at CBI West Midlands and our regional development agency, Advantage West Midlands. I am pleased that clause 34 specifically refers to regional development agencies and their role in preparing for the games. In our region, they are already working together with local authorities, educational institutions and the tourism sector to ensure that the region makes the most of the opportunities offered by London hosting the games. Their plan covers three essential elements—facilities for teams to prepare, business procurement and tourism—to ensure that the region extends the warmest possible welcome to the hundreds of thousands of people who will come to Britain in connection with the games. I assure Ministers that I will send them a copy of the plan, and I hope that they and the organisers of the delivery of the games will give it full and proper consideration.

In thinking about how the country can share fully in the games and go beyond the formal hosting of events and provision of training facilities, important as those are, we must also think about how the investment and job opportunities involved in making the games happen can be shared around the country. Although London will host the games, the west midlands can, in many ways, make the games. If the country pulls together to deliver the games, as I am sure that it will, we can create a truly unforgettable event.

No other sporting event has the global reach of the Olympic games. We will recover from the attack on our way of life that took place two weeks ago and triumph over the ideology that led to it. If we manage this project properly, our Olympics can show Britain at its best—a modern, open country, confident in itself, sure of its place in the world and the showcase for a sporting festival in which the whole world can share.

5.3 pm

Meg Hillier (Hackney, South and Shoreditch) (Lab/Co-op): It gives me great pleasure to add my congratulations to the bid team, particularly the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and Tourism, who was a champion of the Olympics before it was popular to be one. Other Members have mentioned the Mayor of London. This shows what we can achieve when we work together.

We all know where we were on 6 July at 12.46 p.m. As I stood at Stratford station, I rejoiced at the news that the Olympics had come to London. It seems unreal to be debating the games actually being in London instead of the mere prospect.

On 7 July, at about 7.30 a.m., a bus left the Olympic zone at Hackney Wick. That number 30 bus with its indicator board clearly displaying the sign Hackney Wick was blown up on its return journey and 13 people died. As we have listened to this debate, a number 26 bus going along Hackney road in my constituency has suffered from an explosion. I hope and pray—all Members will join me in this—that the reports that there have been no casualties are correct.

That reminds us of the contrast. London was bombed and may have been attacked again today because we are a world city. We won the Olympic bid because we are a city of the world and that world is reflected in London and throughout the UK. Hackney is a diverse borough, with all the countries competing in the Olympics represented in Hackney alone, let alone the rest of London and the UK. Since the bombings of 7 July, Hackney's communities have joined forces to show what they can do when they work together, particularly the Muslim Jewish Forum, which has existed for some years in Hackney and brings together different faith groups to face challenges together. It has demonstrated tolerance, a commitment to London and the fact that what unites us is far greater than what divides us.

I am delighted to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen). He was right to remind the House that the Olympics is not simply about Stratford, with respect to my hon. Friend the Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown). Hackney Wick sees the largest amount of sporting activity in London every Sunday. Not many of my colleagues present, but perhaps some of their constituents, will have played Sunday league football on Hackney marshes. The games are often described as the Stratford Olympics, but it is important to remember that four boroughs will host the Olympic park. Hackney is proud to be one of them. Arenas will be built in Hackney, with the basketball centre as a lasting legacy. We will also see redevelopment of its important business centre—plans that local people have been frustrated to see, but have accepted, being put on hold as we bid for the games. We will see important environmental improvements to those football pitches and elsewhere. We will see access to about 5,000 new homes, many of which will be affordable and welcome to my constituents. Critically, for Hackney as a whole, we will see the delivery of the East London line extensions, at last. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I welcome that support.

Very importantly, the Olympics will be the catalyst for further transport improvements. We will see the North London line become a turn-up and go service, with eight trains an hour. Hackney will effectively get its tube thanks to the Olympics, which will connect Hackney better with London. I welcome the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) that we seek a further extension to Highbury and the Victoria line by 2012.

Hon. Members on both sides have mentioned extra council tax. I do not take any council tax increase lightly, but it is a small price to pay for the many benefits that will come to London, particularly to my constituency. We will also see a sporting legacy. Yes, we must see the investment in elite sport that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State outlined in her opening speech, but we need to see physical activity for all. The health impacts will be enormous for east London and the UK. I look forward to seeing more detail from her and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills on how to ensure that sporting opportunity and physical activity penetrate deeper than just to the elite sportsmen and women whom we hope will bring back gold in 2012.

Environmental concerns are at the forefront of many of my constituents' minds, particularly because part of Hackney marshes and Mabley green will become a car park for the duration of the games. That is not something that an hon. Member is likely to stand up and welcome, but the pitches, which I have walked around, are in poor condition and need investment, so I welcome the assurances of better facilities and improvement and replacement of metropolitan open land. Although we lose the facilities temporarily, it is a price worth paying if those improvements come. I put down a marker for my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Minister that I shall be watching like a hawk to ensure that that happens.

I also welcome the new linear park that will be created and the fact that the power lines in east London will be buried. A transformation will occur, with bridges over cleaned-up rivers and waterways and, bizarrely, a link with the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mr. Walker), as he and I will be at either end of the new Lea valley park as it stretches properly into Hackney at last.

The Olympics will also bring important cultural benefits, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State outlined. Hackney benefits from being the borough with the highest density of artists and creative businesses in the country. Many hon. Members have mentioned the relocation of businesses in the area. We must preserve diversity in those relocations. Again, I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North. Hackney is greater than the sum of its parts and the artists and creative businesses contribute enormously to that. It is important to work out a formula that ensures that they can remain and contribute on a continuing basis to the diversity and creative talent of Hackney, and that they are not squeezed out by yuppie or any other sort of development.

I visited the Travellers on Waterden road, who are concerned because they still do not know where they will be relocated. They and I and others locally recognise that they have to move from their site in the Olympic park. I was reassured by a meeting with the London Development Agency yesterday, when it assured me that it is still working with Hackney council to work out a relocation package that will allow the Travellers to continue their lifestyle, as has been guaranteed.

Hackney is fully signed up to the Olympics and it is important to highlight to hon. Members who perhaps do not know it—I want especially to reassure the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May)—that the Olympic boroughs propose to establish a co-ordination unit to work with the Olympic delivery authority and act as a key link with the Olympics organising committee. That is a sensible step, which builds on the collaborative work that has already gone on between the five boroughs.

The co-ordination unit will focus on communications, the essential legacy issues, business support—to ensure that local businesses gain benefits—sorting out the regulatory functions and creating and helping to deliver the vision for culture and creativity that is part of the Olympics. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will support that rational and co-ordinated approach and, in doing so, help to reassure hon. Members who have raised anxieties about the matter.

Legacy is the main reason for my support and that of the people in Hackney for the Olympics. We welcome the physical sporting legacy. The basketball zone is certainly a better legacy than a car park. We look forward to international basketball champions training in Hackney for many years to come. I have mentioned the environmental legacy but we need to highlight it more, especially given that the Government, the Mayor and the Olympic delivery authority will naturally and rightly focus on delivering an Olympic park on time and on budget. We need to ensure that the environmental benefits are connected not only to the development of the Olympic park but to the future of the Lea valley and the Lea valley park.

I am especially concerned about jobs, skills and business opportunities for local businesses and local people. Other hon. Members pointed out that, too often, they can go elsewhere, not to local businesses and people. When I spoke to the LDA's chief executive yesterday, I was reassured that he and his team are recruiting a special business unit to provide support for business skills. That is imperative to ensure that London benefits and is not leapfrogged as other businesses throughout Europe compete for the important work around the Olympic zone.

Justine Greening: The hon. Lady makes an excellent point that is linked to debates that we have held about vocational education. Does she agree that, if ever there were a trigger for focusing the House's attention on expanding our vocational education so that children in our schools today can benefit from the opportunities, it is the Olympics?

Meg Hillier: I am delighted that the hon. Lady is so supportive of the Government's 14-to-19 education agenda, which is being pursued along precisely the lines that she has described. I agree that we need to ensure that children across the UK, but particularly local London children in Putney, Hackney, Islington, Leyton, Wanstead and Newham benefit from the games. We need to ensure that young people in our schools today are in a position not only to be trained for the jobs that will be available during the development of the Olympic park, but to develop skills that will provide them with an opportunity to get good, long-term jobs thereafter.

It is worth highlighting for the benefit of hon. Members who are not connected with east London that the London Development Agency is setting up a business intelligence unit and an Olympic business club, as well as providing business support for businesses in the area and a job brokerage scheme. Hackney council and the other borough councils are anxious to work on that scheme to ensure that local people really benefit.

The packed lunches of 1948 have been mentioned. Perhaps we have moved on from that now. Hackney has been in the lead in setting up a catering and hospitality centre and we are hoping that one of the legacies of the Olympics will be a centre of excellence for food and hospitality. No borough could be more appropriate than Hackney to host such a centre, as it already has restaurants of every nationality and some of the best food in London. We hope that the centre will become a training venue in which people can skill up so as to get the benefit of the jobs available in the food and hospitality industries in this city and internationally.

I want briefly to turn to matters outside Hackney's boundaries. Other hon. Members have come up with suggestions for how we can embrace the popular interest in the 2012 Olympics in the UK. For the special Olympics, which were held in Ireland a little while ago, each town and city adopted a country. Perhaps we could consider such a scheme here. Similar approaches have also been suggested. Each national group that comes to the Olympics is represented in Hackney and, I am sure, in the other four Olympic boroughs. I am sure that the national groups in my borough will be keen to welcome and link up with the national teams from their home countries. London is multinational—that was one of the strengths of our bid—so let us celebrate that and make it a central part of the work that we do between now and 2012.

The games have strong backing. We have heard about the number of people who have registered on the website to volunteer and to support the bid. It is important that communication and the involvement of citizens are continuing themes of the activities of the Olympic organising committee.

Will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State consider a proposal supported by my hon. Friend the Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) and me: the people's games? This is a proposal to develop a mutual organisation in which every citizen is entitled to own a share and thereby become part of a sounding board for the Olympic organising committee. In that way, every citizen in this country could have a real stake in the games. Whether they are from Northern Ireland, east Dunbartonshire or east London, they could become closely involved.

I finish by saying that Hackney is four-square behind the Olympics, but we know that the hard work to ensure that local people and local businesses benefit from them starts here. We are up to that challenge and we look forward to the Olympic games coming to London in 2012.

5.18 pm

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I apologise for not being here at the start of the debate. As I mentioned in an earlier intervention, I was chairing a meeting of the National Strategic Partnership for Volunteering in Sport, which was being held in the House. I just wish we could find a shorter title for the organisation; we are working on it.

A massive contribution will be made to the games by volunteering. Today's debate has quite rightly been dominated by London Members; London will benefit to a great extent from the games. However, the way to engage the entire population across the country is through the distribution of training camps—I shall come back to that later when I talk about Loughborough's contribution—and through volunteering. At least 70,000 volunteers will be required. It is interesting that, of the five candidate cities, only London submitted a volunteer file with its original application.

We have made an enormous contribution in the past through our history of volunteering in sport, but I do not think that has been recognised by some of the other cities. There are stories that there were more British volunteers than Greek ones at the athletics in Athens. People feel that they want to contribute to sport and many do so through volunteering.

I am sure hon. Members know that this is the year of the volunteer, and August is the month of sports volunteering. This morning, we launched the campaign to raise its profile with Tanni Grey-Thompson, a great Paralympian—the Paralympics must be integral to our purpose—who is known not just as a gold medallist across a wide range of sports but as a coach and volunteer. She wants to put back into her sport what she has managed to get out of it over the last few years. That is a demonstration of the commitment from many people across the country.

It is estimated that this country has about 6 million unpaid sports volunteers, which is equivalent to 720,000 full-time jobs. Volunteers are paid nothing not because they are worthless but because they are priceless. Their contribution to sport, both at grassroots and elite levels, has made an enormous difference in this country. I hope that Members can squeeze into their diaries for August, which are probably full already, something related to promoting sport in their constituencies and making sure that people register themselves on the website to volunteer in 2012.

Jeremy Corbyn: Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the big problems has been the sale of playing fields—particularly in urban areas where schools have in the past, though not recently, been encouraged to sell them—and the propensity of local authorities to charge far too much for sports facilities, thereby pricing many people out of sporting activity so that they end up back in front of the television?

Mr. Reed: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. As he knows, I have a great passion for grassroots sport in particular. I still play rugby every Saturday afternoon during the winter, at the playing field of the school that I attended until I was 18. I must admit that on Saturday afternoon we are the only team that uses the pitches, tennis courts, basketball courts and indoor facilities of that school. The costs have increased dramatically over the past few years. In terms of the legacy of the Olympics, we should make it successful across the country. Unless there is a legacy not only at the elite level, about which I want to speak specifically, but at the grassroots level, nobody will feel that there has been enormous benefit.

Great expectations have rightly been raised since the announcement. Everyone wants a training camp in their constituency, and everyone thinks that every 14-year-old they know who is quite good at sport will be in the Olympics. The reality, however, is that we will have a team of only about 200 or 300 athletes. I wish people well, but most of those who will be competing in the Olympics in seven years' time are probably already in development squads. Many people who are very excited about the Olympics will still, like me, be playing on muddy pitches around their constituencies in 20 years' time, and not competing at elite level. It is therefore important that we get the right combination of funding for elite athletes who will go on to win gold medals, to which having the Olympics in London will make an enormous difference, and ensuring that the real legacy is not just 50 m swimming pools but swimming pools across the patch, decent playing fields and decent changing rooms across the country. So my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) makes an important point.

[Mr. Reed]

In relation to the sale of playing fields, there has been a step change, and while we have not reached the point at which we are not selling any off, at least there has been a massive reduction in sales of playing fields. In many cases, where a playing field has been sold, it has been replaced by a better facility, as is the case in my constituency.

In terms of regional development, places such as Loughborough, Sheffield and Bath—I see that the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) is back in his place; we follow each other around all the time—have, as part of the English Institute of Sport, some of the best facilities in the world for athletes. The Chinese team has already been to look around facilities such as ours, and will probably locate themselves at one of our three bases. As other Members have said, however, I am keen on not just Loughborough benefiting, but the whole of Leicestershire and possibly the whole east midlands. We cannot provide all the facilities for the Chinese team, but we could do athletics, netball, basketball and a wide range of other events, and we have a 50 m pool and cricket academy. Others events would have to be farmed out within the region, so a great partnership would be required. Every Member rightly wants something to come to their constituency, and every area with a 25 m pool wants to match itself with a country somewhere in the world, but we should create a clearing house so that the competition is proactive rather than destructive.

Finally, the success of the games will be measured by the number of gold medals that our athletes win. Every nation has always done much better in the medal tables when it has hosted the games than when it has not. The target for what our athletes achieve in Beijing in 2008 is already pretty ambitious, and we hope that they do even better in 2012. As I said, though, the people who will succeed in 2012 might already be in the development programme. I agree with UK Sport and the British Olympic Association that we need stability in the funding that is made available. We want the four-year programme to 2008 to be extended to 2012, and funding to be increased to ensure that our children and youngsters are able to win gold.

By making our young people winners, we will make sure that all of us are winners in 2012.

Harry Cohen: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Reed: No, as I want to allow time for the hon. Member for Putney (Justine Greening) to speak.

The Olympic games represent a golden opportunity for us. Fantastic contributions have been made in the debate, and all hon. Members know what the games will mean to their patch. My final thought is this: we won the 2012 games because the Government, sport and the media were united. I hope that we can keep that united front over the next seven years. If we do, London will be a great host city, and the 2012 games will be the best ever.

5.25 pm

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): I shall begin by thanking the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) for allowing me time to make a brief contribution at the end of the debate. I apologise for not being present for the start, but I want to add my congratulations to the bid team, who did a superb job in winning the games for our capital city and our country.

The Paralympics will be coming to this country as well as the Olympics. Hon. Members have said that sport must be made accessible to all, and that is true of both the Olympics and the Paralympics. We must never forget that there will be a second event when the main event is over, and the organising committees that the Bill establishes must kept that clearly in mind.

Moreover, we must ensure that our public transport enables everyone to reach the Olympics. The key tube stations that people will use must be adapted so that disabled people can get to all the Olympic and Paralympic events.

People in Putney are delighted that London will be holding the Olympic games—especially if the finances are carefully controlled. Many Putney MPs in the past have had an interest in sport. I want to follow in that tradition, although my predecessors have tended to go for football rather than Olympic sports.

The Lawn Tennis Association in Putney is building its national headquarters in Roehampton, and Southfields station will be the main tube stop that people will use as they head for the Wimbledon tennis events. I therefore make a plea that that station should be rendered accessible for disabled people, and for all those using it in both the Olympic and Paralympic fortnights. I lodge a request with the Minister that he seriously consider having a lift put into Southfields station, so that it will be accessible for everyone who wants to use it when the games are on.

Finally, I repeat my congratulations to the bid team on their success in securing the games for London.

5.28 pm

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): The IOC's decision in Singapore to award the 2012 Olympics to London, and today's Second Reading of the Bill, mark the start of a period of remarkable opportunity for this country.

There is the prospect that the games will give our economy a considerable boost. The boost delivered as a result of the Barcelona games was estimated at £11 billion, and the amount is surely likely to be much higher now. For the environment, there is the prospect that we will have the largest new urban park in Europe. For Londoners, there is the prospect of regeneration of the lower Lea valley.

For those still at school—such as Amber and the 30 children from the east end who represented us all so effectively in Singapore—there is the prospect of achieving Olympic success in their own capital city, or of becoming an Olympic volunteer. Most importantly of all for all of us who care about sport, there is the prospect of a sea change in the relationship between sport and Government. In the fortnight since Singapore, I have been struck by just how much this opportunity means to so many different people, but also by how expectations have now been raised in so many different areas, as the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) said only a moment ago.

This is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity and delivering on it will not be easy. However, before I turn to that issue I should like to put on the record—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) did before me—my and my party's appreciation for all the work done by those who brought the games to London. I pay tribute to Lord Coe, Keith Mills and everybody who worked at London 2012 during the bid process. At the celebratory party in Singapore after the vote, I was struck by the many personal and professional sacrifices that so many of their team made to work on the bid. We are all very much in their debt.

I also want to pay tribute to the three main stakeholders. First, I pay tribute to the Government, and particularly to the work done by the Minister for Sport and Tourism and, of course, in her absence, by the Secretary of State, in bringing the games to London. Secondly, I pay tribute to the Mayor—I never thought I would say that at the Dispatch Box—and thirdly to the British Olympic Association, and to the Princess Royal in particular, who has been somewhat left out. I saw her lobbying and working on the country's behalf day in, day out in Singapore, but she has received very little praise for it. To all of them and to the many others who have worked on the bid, we in this House and all those whom we represent owe a considerable vote of thanks.

The Conservative party has always supported the London 2012 bid. As will be signified at Second Reading tonight and, hopefully, as the Bill continues its passage through the House, that support will continue. It will most certainly continue so long as the cross-party consensus that we have established continues to be a genuine two-way—perhaps I should say three-way—process.

Mr. Don Foster: Yes, you should.

Hugh Robertson: I—

Mr. McFadden: The Scottish Nationalists?

Hugh Robertson: That is today's great improvement.

I was enormously grateful for the briefing session provided by the Secretary of State's civil servants before this debate. I hope that that process will continue through a regular series of briefings and consultations, particularly on issues such as the Olympic delivery authority board members nominated by the Secretary of State. Perhaps the Minister can confirm that during his winding-up speech.

We also want to ensure that the spirit of the London bid is upheld in two particular ways. First, London 2012 should be a games for athletes and it should empower the youth of this country through sport. Secondly and most importantly, and as I have already mentioned, the Government must deliver on the wider sports agenda. London 2012 provides a once-in-a-generation opportunity to reform the structure and funding of sport in this country, and it must not be missed.

As so often with debates on sport, today's has been excellent—remarkably so, given the short time between today and publication of the Bill late last Thursday. I congratulate the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) on his maiden speech. It was an extremely confident opening, if I may say so, and his experience of the Manchester games made it very relevant. It was an excellent debut and I welcome him to the House on everyone's behalf. He was joined by his colleague the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson), who gave us the Scottish angle. Her points on tourism and training camps were particularly well made.

On the Government side, we heard from the hon. Member for West Ham (Lyn Brown), who spoke up in support of her borough, and from the hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn), who talked about legacy issues and—rightly—an ethically responsible games. The hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt), who is always a thought-provoking contributor—sadly, he is not in the Chamber at the moment—made a typical contribution. The hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore)—he, too, seems to have slipped away—talked about terrorism and construction. It was good to see him having an outing outside of a Friday.

The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Flello) talked about volunteering, a concept which we will all support. The hon. Member for Crawley (Laura Moffatt) discussed the benefits to her constituents, and very well, too. The hon. Member for Stourbridge (Lynda Waltho)—sadly, I have lost her, too—spoke about swimming baths. It is difficult to comment on her contribution without knowing the facts of the case; I was going to say that if she wanted to explain them to me, I would see what I could do.

As an east-end MP, the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) made some extremely sensible points about cost overrun—a point to which we will return. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-East (Mr. McFadden) talked about the regional aspects of the bid. I wish him well in attracting the benefits to his region. The hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Meg Hillier) is another who spoke up well in support of her constituency, and she reminded us of some timely security concerns. My friend the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed), who is something of a House expert on sport, made some excellent points about the levels of expectation, volunteering and elite sports. I can only say that I entirely agree.

On my own side, we heard excellent contributions from my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait), who spoke of the financial and planning aspects of the bid. Her warnings were well made and relevant. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Richard Ottaway) spoke about the businesses in the lower Lea valley, and I hope that the Government will take note of the issues that he raised, to which we shall return later. My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) voiced well-expressed concerns about ambush marketing, and with her commercial experience she made an informed and valuable contribution. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Pelling) spoke of the role of the London Assembly, and he, too, was quite right. Finally, it was nice to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Justine Greening) talk about the Paralympics, highlighting that area.

Let me turn to my party's position. The detailed provisions of the Bill can be worked on in Committee, but seven key principles govern our approach. The first is accountability to Parliament. The London 2012 Olympic games is a national event, and we want to ensure that the ODA and other Olympic bodies are accountable, through the Secretary of State, to Parliament. The Select Committee on Culture, Media and Sport will clearly have a role, but I hope that the Government will agree to two more things, in particular. First, there should be an annual debate in Government time, ideally at this time of year, once the accounts have been published. Secondly, the ODA should be subject to scrutiny by the National Audit Office and thus, should it wish to, by the Public Accounts Committee. I hope that the Minister will confirm that those ideas are acceptable.

The second principle is partnership working. The powers available to the Mayor of London in this legislation are extensive and therefore, in some ways, controversial. However, if London is to deliver the games on time and to budget, it is vital that the ODA and the Mayor work in partnership with the boroughs and use their reserve powers only as a last resort, and preferably only with the agreement of the Secretary of State. One way to reassure the London boroughs, which have concerns about that, would be to ensure that they were represented on the ODA board. Furthermore, I hope that as the games draw closer they will be encouraged to second staff to the ODA for a reasonable period before, during and after the games. Perhaps the Minister will also address that point when he winds up.

Thirdly, there is concern about cost overruns, a subject raised by several Members on both sides of the House. The memorandum of understanding signed by the Government in 2003 puts the burden of any overspend firmly on the lottery and on Londoners, but previous games have considerably overrun their budget. It will almost certainly not be the fault of Londoners if the cost of the games overruns. One of the key marketing messages throughout the bid process has been that these games are for the whole United Kingdom. I very much hope that the Government will re-examine the 2003 memorandum now that the games have been secured.

Fourthly, there is the issue of businesses in the lower Lea valley. The Minister is aware of our concerns, and I am grateful for his intervention following the Westminster Hall debate a couple of weeks ago. However, it is clearly wrong if existing businesses end up paying for the privilege of hosting the games, and I hope that effort will be put into resolving that issue over the summer so that the Minister can report in Committee that progress has been made.

Fifthly, there is security, which is, sadly, again much on our minds today. Clearly, it will be a key concern as we count down to 2012, and security issues must be incorporated at every stage in the delivery process. Despite the fact that the London 2012 website details the formation of a new Cabinet-level Olympic security committee, there is no direct mention of security issues in the Bill. Perhaps the Minister would confirm the Government's position.

Sixthly, there is the question of the tax take on the Olympic lottery game, and it will not surprise the Minister at all to hear me raise that once again. It is, in my view, simply indefensible for the Government to profit to the tune of an estimated £320 million from a game designed to finance the London 2012 Olympics, particularly when they were so keen to exempt the Live 8 concerts. Given the Minister's constant assurances that the games will not run over budget, that money ought to be used to create a lasting legacy from the 2012 games. Personally—a purely personal view—I favour giving the money to the British Olympic Association to establish scholarship funds at arm's length from Government to help aspiring young Olympians in future. That is the sort of eye-catching initiative that would give the games a worthwhile legacy. I know that the Minister cannot give me any further assurances on the matter tonight, but he ought to be aware that it is a subject that we intend to pursue. I suspect that that will not surprise him.

On the wider sports agenda there is the issue of the reform of the structure and financing of British sport. There is now wide agreement that there should be one clear funding stream for sport. The performance director of UK Sport said only last week following the meeting of the British Olympic Association:

"The management of the investment in sport should be through one body."

I could not agree more.

On the financial side, delivering the Olympics will by any reckoning place the national lottery sports principal funding stream under extreme pressure. I cannot see that there is any chance of delivering the many promises made to sport during the bid process without a step change in Government—let us be honest, by that I mean Exchequer—funding. The Government must take action now to cut some of the unnecessary and overlapping bureaucracy and radically to reform the structure of the financing of sport in this country.

I should like to finish where I started. The London 2012 Olympic games are a unique and remarkable opportunity for this country. We should all record our thanks to everyone who has brought them to us, notably tonight the Secretary of State and the Minister. As Conservatives, we will continue to offer the Government our wholehearted support for this fabulous opportunity as long as the process is accountable to Parliament, as long as partnership not compulsion is the key principle of delivery and as long as there is genuine progress on the wider sport agenda.

Delivering the 2012 Olympics on time and to budget will be a hugely testing undertaking. Seven years is not in all honesty a great deal of time. However, I firmly believe that, if we all remain true to the principles that have guided the bid thus far, Britain can stage a great and remarkable Olympic celebration in 2012.

5.42 pm

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): I start by saying thank you to all hon. Members this afternoon. It has been a successful debate and, to a large extent, it has mirrored the way in which we have taken the nation forward. The nation has been united behind the project of winning the 2012 games. I, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, Seb and all his team have felt proud to lead a nation that was united with a tremendous amount of pride.

Like the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), I did not think that I would be standing here congratulating the Mayor, but I should like to congratulate some others, including the press. Broadly speaking, the press were behind the bid, and that was helpful.

The unity of purpose behind the bid was epitomised when the evaluation team was here. We were all at No. 10 sitting around the Cabinet table just a few weeks before the general election. The leaders of the various political parties were all there with the Prime Minister and they sang off the same song sheet with a unity that even shook the evaluation team of the IOC. It showed clearly how we were all behind the bid. Hostilities broke out five minutes later of course, but for that period we were united. There is only one thing that can do that; it was sport itself that brought the nation together.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Cheadle (Mark Hunter) on his maiden speech. It was a thoughtful speech. He gave us a vivid tour of his constituency. Unfortunately, or fortunately perhaps, I was not involved in the by-election; we were out gathering votes in other areas of the world. The hon. Gentleman said that the north-west, through Manchester's Commonwealth games, had played a significant part in getting the Olympics for us. It was a multi-sport event, and he described the fantastic role played by some of his constituents who were volunteers for those games. That showed the pride of the north-west and it helped us significantly to convince people in the IOC that we can and will continue to stage major sporting events.

The challenge now is to deliver the games with a legacy for London and the whole of the UK, as well as for the Olympic movement. We have made some clear commitments to bring young people back into sport through the Olympic movement. We made those commitments genuinely in relation to this nation and internationally, and we will live up to them.

The right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) said that we had spent a lot of time travelling the world and learning from cities that have staged the Olympics. We did, and I hope that we will learn from any mistakes they may have made. It became clear to us that the process has three stages. The first is winning, and there is no doubt that Barbara Cassani, who set up the company, and Seb Coe, who later led it to victory, brought together the skills that we needed in a partnership to win the games. We now need to deliver one of the biggest construction programmes that this country has seen for many years. The third stage will be the delivery of the games themselves. Each stage requires particular skills, and the two companies have been designed with that in mind. The first is the London organising committee for the Olympic Games and the other is the Olympic delivery authority, which the Bill will set up.

The ODA will be responsible for delivering the construction projects, and people can be confident that no favours will be done when the chairman, chief executive and board are appointed. We are looking for the best in the world and if we have to go internationally to get people to go on that board or join the staff, we will do just that. Seb and Keith Mills will be the chair and deputy chair of LOCOG, and they will seek a chief executive in the near future. They will be looking for the very best.

I assure the House that we are approaching the setting up of those two companies very professionally. We have learned the many lessons from Picketts Lock, the dome and Wembley, so the companies will be set up to deliver those two main functions. The Office of Government Commerce has "destruction tested" the structures we propose, and we will set up a programme management committee to oversee the process and provide an early-warning system. We have spent a lot of time on the structures and on the budgets and financial structures. We were commended by the IOC on that chapter of the bid document, and it said that our structures were robust. It drilled down deeply into that chapter, and that is why we are confident that the structure will hold up.

We took the view that an overview was necessary as an early-warning system. If things start to go wrong, the programme management committee can inform the steering group and the board, which consists of the three stakeholders—the Mayor's office, the British Olympic Association and the Government. It would also inform the two major companies that will manage the project.

On the wider issues of the nation and regions, the committee that has already been set up and functions well under the able chairmanship of Charles Allen will continue its work. I met the committee last week and I was pleased to see the depth of representation, at a senior level, of the regional development agencies, the regional sports board and many others.

I shall not go into detail on all the questions that have been posed in the debate, because I am sure that in Committee and through the many contacts that we will have over the months and years ahead we will be able to explain the process and ensure that we get it right. It is in the interests of the nation to get it right, because it will provide many opportunities way beyond sport. Sport is the vehicle for many other opportunities, including regeneration and tourism. The committee will continue to function and I hope that many Members will be involved as the weeks and months unfold.

There is no doubt that there will be competition for the training camps. In my region of Yorkshire, the regional development agency and the sports boards have already carried out an audit, through the universities, and I should not be surprised if they had not already contacted people in various countries to encourage them to come to the county well before 2012.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend knows, the world-renowned Gateshead international stadium is in my constituency. The Secretary of State explained in her speech that the Bill will include guidelines for the role of RDAs in attracting training camps and, in turn, regeneration. My hon. Friends the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) and for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) and I will be meeting our RDA, One North East, during the recess to get the process under way, but does my right hon. Friend the Minister agree that a fundamental element in the success of training camp bids—especially ours in Gateshead—is the complete and unified support of local communities, as was the case in London, from whose success we all hope to benefit?

Mr. Caborn: Yes. I am sure that all the RDAs will work together and we shall give them every encouragement and assistance, wherever we can do so. The opportunities are there.

We cannot go into the wider issues in this debate, but the talented athlete scholarship schemes, talent identification and the world class performance plan will develop the sustainable structure for sport that many people want.

[Mr. Caborn]

We shall deal with the Mayor's powers in more detail in Committee, but we shall be working with the Mayor and the London Assembly to ensure reasonableness in the operation of those powers. I think that the provisions of the Bill will ensure that the powers are used properly for the purposes for which they were designed. They were necessary to deliver our obligations to the IOC, as was right, but there are enough checks and balance to ensure that they are used reasonably.

Mrs. May: Earlier, I asked about the relationship of the London boroughs and the London Government Association in respect of powers that relate to the rest of the country. Are the Government willing to include those bodies to ensure that the reasonableness is tested by them, too?

Mr. Caborn: Absolutely. We should expect that, even though it is not stated in the Bill. There will be consultation and we believe that it should include all major partners, such as the local authorities and the LGA. As the project has developed, we have seen those partners come together on issues such as planning, and I would never have believed that we could have achieved so much even before we started talking about primary legislation. There has been a fantastic demonstration of support and partnership across local authorities and political parties on planning issues.

Members asked about funding. The figures have already been set out, but there were questions about overrun, which will be dealt with through a memorandum of understanding. Our work on the funding mechanism was helped by our experience of talking to people in other Olympic cities, especially Sydney. I shall never forget the person who said, "Do not underestimate the budget. If you have to go higher, it will be seen as a failure so make sure your calculations are realistic."

Mr. Love: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Caborn: Will my hon. Friend bear with me? There are only a few minutes left for the debate and there are a number of things I want to cover.

There will be a £17 billion investment in transport, which will include the East London line extension and the docklands light railway upgrade. Members will be able to discuss the details in Committee. That played a major part in winning our bid because, as Members know, we did not get the best grades for our answers to the 25 questions a year ago last January.

Security formed part of our submission; it was part of our candidate file. I believe that the IOC was satisfied with what we were saying about home security and I have no doubt that that matter will be further explored in Committee. I can assure hon. Members that we will not leave it untouched. There is no doubting that we have a first-class security and intelligence service in this country. We were there in Sydney and very much so in Athens; our people were leading the security committees there. Security will be one of the major considerations.

On the Olympic delivery authority, I emphasise that it is very important to bring in not just the skilled but the best in the world, and we will search the world to contract those people. We think that they will be attracted because, as has already been said, the national stadium will be more than an Olympic stadium; its design will revolutionise the way that sports facilities are used around the world in years to come. If we can build an 80,000-seater stadium, reduce it to a 20,000 capacity and build it back to a 40,000-seater capacity using designs that we believe are now attainable with existing materials and engineering skills, it will bring a whole new dimension to stadium design. If one looks at the legacy of Sydney, one sees that real difficulties were encountered with its national stadium. We saw what happened in Athens and in Barcelona. We believe that we can introduce a whole new dimension to stadium design. Our proposal to use facilities on a temporary basis and then to move them around the world is an important development, so the challenge to develop such stadiums and associated further facilities, and the opportunity that that presents, is immense.

Many initiatives have already been taken to ensure that the skills base and the opportunity for regeneration do not pass the east end by. More need to be taken and a major responsibility of the ODA company will be to ensure that we can drive that quality regeneration in the most effective way. It will also—it is embedded in the Bill—be one of the greenest Olympic games ever and it will be commended by the IOC.

We believe that all those elements are now in the Bill. We believe that we have got the structure right. We believe that we have put the right checks and balances in place and taken the correct approach to the budget; that will be very significant.

Richard Ottaway: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Caborn: No, but on the question that I am sure the hon. Gentleman wants to raise, I think there has been an incorrect interpretation of the compulsory purchase orders. We want to ensure that there is a fair settlement for all those who will be displaced. I will ensure that the ODA understands that. We want to achieve that settlement. We do not want traders to be put out of business. I have taken a personal interest in this; I will continue to do so, and I hope that all parties will come to the negotiating table to get to get a reasonable and fair settlement. Yes, the balance of powers has now gone to the LDA; I acknowledge that. The LDA has now won that bid, but I hope that we can still have an air of co-operation and transparency, which will bring a fair settlement to all those who will be displaced. I will watch that very carefully and if the hon. Gentleman wants to meet me to discuss it, I will be more than pleased to see him.

I thank all those who were involved in the bid. All of us, from the bidding team right through to those of us who have been involved in this in the Government, have been given a fantastic opportunity to present this nation in the best light. Many thought we could not do it. But the Secretary of State and I never doubted it, even though one or two of our colleagues in the Cabinet did from time to time. [HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."] I will not name them. Could I? Yes, but I will not.

It was great to be out there in Singapore. The only thing I do say is that Jacques Rogge is now going to get a letter from me, from Sheffield, and Seb Coe and I will have to present it to him because I hope he will never leave anybody in suspense again when opening an envelope.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

LONDON OLYMPICS BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6) (Programme motions),

That the following provisions shall apply to the London Olympics Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 20th October 2005.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question agreed to.

LONDON OLYMPICS BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52 (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the London Olympics Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(1) expenditure of a Minister of the Crown in connection with the Act, and

(2) any increase attributable to the Act in sums payable out of money provided by Parliament under another enactment.—[Tony Cunningham.]

Question agreed to.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Ordered,

That the Education (School Organisation Proposals) (England) (Amendment) Regulations 2005, (S.I., 2005, No. 1801), dated 2nd July 2005, be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.—[Tony Cunningham.]

PETITIONS

Policing

6 pm

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I wish to present a petition of some 1,300 residents of Hullbridge in my constituency which calls for a more regular policing presence to combat antisocial behaviour in their area. I record my particular thanks to Mr. Yogesh Patel, the proprietor who runs the Ferry pharmacy in Hullbridge and who kindly hosted the petition to make it easier for residents to sign.

The petition reads:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of residents of Hullbridge in the County of Essex and others,

Declares their concern at the lack of regular policing and problems of anti-social behaviour in their area.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Home Secretary to provide for more frequent police patrols in Hullbridge and for a team of officers to be regularly assigned to protecting the area.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Speed Limits

6.1 pm

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): The petition of readers of the Faversham Times

Declares that current speed limits on the A251 Ashford Road are too high and pose a substantial risk to the health of road users and those living in close proximity to the road. The Petitioners further declare that the present limits of 50 and 60 miles per hour create a situation where villagers, and those involved with Sheldwich Primary School, feel unable to use the road safely.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Transport to take steps to ensure that the speed limits on roads through the villages of North Street, Sheldwich and Badlesmere are reduced to 30 miles per hour and that limits on roads outside these areas are reduced to 40 miles per hour.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Derwent Valley (Open Cast Mining)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coaker.]

6.2 pm

Mr. David Anderson (Blaydon) (Lab): This debate will focus on what I believe to be one of the greatest places on earth, but it would be ill-advised of me not to say a few words about what has happened in London today. The thoughts of the House are with the people and the emergency workers who do such a magnificent job in the city.

I have spent most of my adult life campaigning on behalf of the coal industry and for full employment. I speak today in the very strange circumstance where I will be arguing, to some extent, against both those causes. I do so not because I am not still convinced of the need for this island of ours to stop turning its back on one of it greatest national assets. Neither have I given up, and I never will, on the demand for full employment.

I am the product of a long line of people who dug coal up and down this country and beyond, and I still remember the hard days when my father was out of work. I have no romantic notions of the life of miners. Indeed, one of my lasting memories is of my father telling me that, in the hungry 1930s, he and his fellow miners were "treated like slaves." They were treated that way because the alternative was a life on the dole.

Against that background I shall speak against the proposal to rip open the beautiful Derwent valley in my constituency, Blaydon, and take out a paltry half a million tonnes of coal. The proposal would give us much needed home-produced energy and provide a number of jobs in an area where we are still, sadly, below the average employment rate. But we are not in the hungry 1930s any more. We have moved on—many of us against our will. We have turned a corner in the north-east of England, we look to new opportunities and developments to embrace a new millennium, and we have more respect for our environment than we were ever allowed in the past.

The proposed development will mean three years of inconvenience, traffic chaos, noise and air pollution, visual pollution and serious disruption to the ecology of the area. It will affect our efforts to attract tourism to the north, but particularly to the nearby National Trust property at Gibside, an absolute gem of a place. Gibside is 500 acres of beautiful countryside owned and managed by the National Trust in the shadow of the proposed site. Its grounds include scheduled ancient monuments and listed buildings.

Restoration in recent years has seen the park brought back to a standard laid down over 200 years ago, with the recent restoration of the orangery and the stables to their original state in 1857. For the 100,000 visitors a year who come to Gibside this will mean a chance to see again the splendour of the Palladian chapel, Gothic banqueting house and landmark column celebrating liberty.

In the last seven years visitor numbers at Gibside have risen fourfold, and at the same time permanent staff numbers have risen from three to 15, with 12 seasonal employees and over 50 volunteers. That is the new face of the Derwent valley. Gone are the collieries and the coke works. The restoration of Gibside however is not just about buildings; it is a living thing. A cursory glance through the programme of activity for this year reveals events ranging from brass band concerts to a Georgian Christmas dinner via a bat watch and a performance of Shakespeare's "A Comedy of Errors"—how very fitting.

This superb venue that so many people have worked hard to retain and restore will be overshadowed by activity on the open-cast site, and if, as we suspect, the developers seek an extension of their permits, it could be a shadow that is cast for many many years to come. Gibside combines history, religion, culture, a respect for nature and just pure natural beauty, and it will all be at risk if these plans are not halted.

Gibside is so much more. It is proposed to develop the stable block as a short-term residential facility for young people's projects, for school parties and for further and higher education use. It is a venue for a community project for people coming from the inner cities of Newcastle and Gateshead to engage in the countryside with the National Trust. It is an opportunity to help people into work in areas that they would never have thought about before. Finally, it is used as an orienteering project by over 40 groups from the same inner-city schools and youth clubs.

It is not just the impact on Gibside that worries us in the north; it is also the impact on wildlife. Only two weeks ago we released a second batch of red kites into the wild after they were driven out from the north over 150 years ago. What have we released them to face? Blasts from explosives, dust from excavation and noise from the heavy duty machinery, which typifies open-cast sites. Forty-one of those beautiful birds will be released this year into the valley, and it is not being done here by accident. It is happening here because of the high quality of the landscape, which provides a real mosaic of different but complementary habitats.

It is not just the fate of those beautiful birds that concerns us. In recent years otters have returned to our rivers, which is unheard of. Kingfishers and heron compete side by side in the becks, burns and rivers of our countryside. Tawny owls swoop silently through the night air. Red and fallow deer criss-cross the land, watched furtively by badgers and foxes. Grass snakes, adders and slow worms all form part of the natural habitat alongside great crested newts, which we believe have already suffered from the nearby working at a proposed landfill site.

Those are the main reasons why we are so strongly against these plans. In our part of the world we have seen too much of this activity. As I speak, residents in my community are still challenging the right of multinational companies to dump waste in a landfill site to the north of these proposed workings. Gravel pits, sand quarries, coal mines, coke works—you name it, we have had it. We want to move on. We want to use the fact that we are a site of special scientific interest to attract people to our valley and the surrounding towns and villages. We want a renaissance in the north. It is our time for a moment in the sun. We know that wildlife can exist in the harshest of conditions, but why impose problems when the rewards are so small? In the classic words of soulless economists, we have done the cost-benefit analysis and it simply ain't worth it.

There are concerns also about the impact on the area's water systems. This area, as I will explain later, is honeycombed with old mineworkings, most of which are prone to serious flooding. Excavation on this scale could well disturb the balance of the water table, something about which we are very concerned about in our area. There will be different impacts in different parts of my constituency and those nearby. Some 96 lorry movements per 12-hour day are predicted—one every 7.5 minutes. Those lorries will drive through villages that already struggle to cope with the overspill of traffic from the massively blocked A1, which peaks during the morning and evening rush hours. The response from drivers will be to use rat runs around the local villages to avoid the A692. Unfortunately, those roads will lead cars into more congestion as they work their way through busy villages and past a large comprehensive school. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. There is a disturbance beyond the Bar, which is disrupting the debate.

Mr. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

There is another consideration. Earlier I spoke of the long history of coal mining in our area. In the view of some historians, coal mining on an industrial scale started on the fells in our area before it started anywhere else in the world. Seams of coal near the river Tyne had been exhausted, and others could not be exploited owing to water problems. The coal on the fellside around Whickham was the nearest workable seam that could be readily drained. The market to London was crucial, and the liberalisation of the rules on mining introduced by Elizabeth I paved the way for the development of coal in the area on a scale never before envisaged. Drainage outlets were driven into the fell, from which water still runs. Dams, aqueducts and water wheels were built, which led to the world's first large-scale coalfield development.

Given the importance of coal to the history of our region, not to mention the rest of the country and the world, it could be argued that instead of ripping the area up we should—as we are trying to do—conserve it, develop it and use it to educate future generations. It is part of our history and heritage and should be seen as such, and as a stepping stone to a new future.

There will be claims that my call for rejection of the proposal is rooted in nimbyism. I hold both hands up to that, and I do not apologise for it. Our back yard has been used and abused for centuries; it is full to overflowing. We have had enough. We still suffer from the economic and social impact of that, and we refuse to allow it to go on any longer. Our area has been poisoned, polluted and exploited for far too long. If the country needs coal so badly, let us really go for it: let us redevelop the vast reserves that are left under the North sea, in Yorkshire, in the midlands, in south-west Scotland and in Wales. Let us use our expertise in deep mines, and reclaim our place as a world leader in clean coal technology. We must not let contractors who do not even live in our part of the world come and spoil our area for years to come, just to produce enough coal to burn in three days. We are talking about three years of disruption for three days' worth of coal burn. We do not want it, we do not need it and we are not having it.

The people of the area, which covers a number of constituencies—some of my hon. Friends who are present will be affected—are united in their opposition to the plans. Different communities will be affected in different ways. The one thing that unites the people is their clear view that we have had more than our fair share of hassle and inconvenience from the exploitation of our area, and we want to move on. The people have consistently, and so far successfully, fought open-cast mining in our area. They have fought nine separate applications since 1971, and each time they had to fight all the way to appeal to the Government of the day.

Thankfully, Secretaries of State as diverse as Tony Benn and Nicholas Ridley had the good sense to support the case put by people from across our constituencies. Just in case the fight is not won at the planning stage, the Minister now knows whom he follows.

Let me refer the Minister to comments made in inspectors' reports over the years. A 1976 report said:

"The cumulative effect would result in a bland and featureless landscape".

A 1983 report said:

"The Derwent Valley should be regarded as a NO-GO area for opencasting".

A 1994 report said:

"The visual impact on the landscape is unacceptable".

Perhaps most worrying was the 1995 comment that

"The possibility of further opencasting would be difficult to resist if this proposal goes ahead".

That is the real worry for the people in the Derwent valley. I realise that there is little that the Minister can do at this moment to address our concerns and understand that the process must take place fully and fairly. I have no hesitation in raising the matter today at the end of my first parliamentary term in this place. If those who have the power to stop open-cast mining do not listen to the voice of the people, it may be too late when we return for the next term.

We deserve no less than relief from centuries of abuse. We have played our part in the industrial, social and political development of this nation, and now we want to play our part in the environmental regeneration of one of the most beautiful corners of this country.

I appeal to the Minister not to let us down. If the people who are pursuing this abhorrent case come to his door, I hope that he remembers this debate. The Minister should come and see the changes that we are striving to make and should not consign us to a role as the dustbin of this nation. We have paid our dues over and over again, and we deserve the chance to advance in a new direction. In the north, we know about paying our dues, and whether it involves our unions, our political parties, our faith groups or society as a whole, and people in my part of the world have never been found wanting. We have never been afraid to make our voice heard, and our voice must be heard in challenging these proposals. We want to see a change for the better and our children to grow up in a better world, which we do not want to be spoiled by get-rich-quick asset strippers.

When I left school in 1969 to start on what I believed to be a lifetime as a coal miner, I was lured by advertisements encouraging me to become "one of the men in mining" and to learn how to use the deep-down machine-age shovel. Sadly, the men in mining have almost gone, and the deep-down machine-age shovel has been replaced by a monster 10 times its size, which does not work half a mile underground—it works on top of our hills. It rips apart our land and despoils our country and our environment.

There is nothing positive or necessary about these proposals, which fade into insignificance when they are weighed against the impact on the lives on this generation and future generations in and around the Derwent valley. I urge the Minister not to let us down, to support our desire to build a new way of life in our valley and to give us, our kids and our environment a chance to move on. We deserve no less.

6.17 pm

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) on securing today's debate. My constituency would be affected by that development, and I have received many representations from local people who are opposed to it. I know that the Secretary to the Treasury, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Durham (Hilary Armstrong), has received many representations and has met community groups and others in Burnopfield in her constituency, which would be directly affected. I know that she shares the concerns that have been expressed to her.

Durham is rightly proud of its mining past, and the Durham Miners gala, which took place a few weeks ago, shows our rich history. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon has said, we have moved on through developments such as the turning the tide project on the north-east coast, which has been cleaned up and is now an attractive tourist destination, and the reclamation of former colliery sites across Durham in my constituency and that of the Secretary to the Treasury.

Two weeks ago, I visited the site with my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon and Stephen Hughes, the local MEP. The view across the Derwent valley is breathtaking. It was a clear day, and we could see across the valley, through Newcastle and up to the Cheviots. It is a peaceful and tranquil spot, and it would be a tragedy if it were ripped up and scarred.

My hon. Friend has already mentioned the work of Gateshead council, to which I pay tribute, on making sure that that area of outstanding natural beauty is a tourist attraction. I also pay tribute to Durham county council for promoting tourism within Durham. I sit on the north-east tourism advisory board, and the last thing that County Durham needs is a succession of large holes across the county, which is something that we must consign to the past. The knock-on effects on constituencies such as mine are not only the visible impact, nor the fact that it may give developers opportunities elsewhere across County Durham, but the increased traffic flow from the site that will no doubt find its way through the small communities of North Durham.

The Derwent valley is a peaceful and beautiful part of this country. I fear that if this development goes forward—my hon. Friend has already said that only a small amount of coal would be extracted—it will be a precedent to developing other sites up the Derwent valley. That would be an absolute tragedy. We are a region and a county looking forward, and this development would certainly turn the clock back many years. Communities that have struggled hard over the past 20 years to regenerate themselves do not want that.

The Minister for Energy (Malcolm Wicks): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blaydon (Mr. Anderson) on securing this important debate, not least because it is a high note for him to go out on at the end of his first parliamentary term. He eloquently—indeed, passionately—expressed the concerns of several of his constituents about the potential impact of surface mining in the Derwent valley. Indeed, he described the valley and the area so well and graphically that I am tempted to change my holiday plans, but I will certainly put it in my diary for a visit.

I also listened carefully to my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Jones). North Durham and the county of Durham generally are well represented in the Chamber at the moment, and I am heedful of that.

Let me make it clear that I cannot comment on this particular planning application. I should also emphasise that I am not a planning Minister—at this point, I am rather pleased that I am not—and it would be inappropriate for such a Minister to be here. I am merely the Energy Minister, and my remarks—not about this application, I emphasise again—are intended partly to provide some energy context.

I should like to table a few facts about surface mining in the United Kingdom. In 2000, total UK coal production stood at 30.6 million tonnes. Of that, 17.2 million tonnes was produced by deep mines and 13.4 million tonnes by surface mines; the latter is not an insignificant figure. Annual coal use in electricity generation, which absorbs around 85 per cent. of UK coal production, stood at 46.9 million tonnes. In 2000, UK-produced coal supplied around 55 per cent. of coal-fired electricity feedstock, and more than 40 per cent. of it came from surface mines.

Four years on, in 2004, total UK coal production stood at 24.5 million tonnes—a fall of 20 per cent.—of which 12.5 million tonnes was deep mined and 12 million tonnes was from surface mines. In the same year, coal use in electricity generation reached 50 million tonnes. In 2004, UK-produced coal provided around 45 per cent. of coal-fired electricity feedstock, half of which had been surface mined.

Those figures clearly illustrate the important contribution that surface-mined coal makes to coal-fired electricity generation and hence to total UK energy needs. Energy supply is crucial to our economies, our culture and our local communities. That contribution is under threat. In recent years, surface mine output in Scotland, which has no deep mines, has remained steady at around 7 million tonnes per year. Output in Wales has also remained steady, at around 1.2 million tonnes per year—roughly double its deep-mined output. But output in England has declined sharply from 5 million tonnes in 2000 to 3 million tonnes in 2004. In 2005, it is expected to halve again to around 1.5 million tonnes. In 2006, on the basis of current planning permissions—let me stress that phrase—it is forecast to reach barely 600,000 tonnes. If that proves to be the case, total UK surface mine production in 2006 could be no higher than 9 million tonnes and that at a time when, despite receiving some £170 million of state aid since 2000, deep mine output is also under serious pressure.

Already this year Ellington colliery was closed by catastrophic flooding. It now appears likely that, despite the best efforts of all concerned, Harworth colliery is to be mothballed. Those and previous closures could bring annual UK deep-mined output to less than 11 million tonnes and total UK coal production, which was 24.5 million tonnes last year, to barely 20 million tonnes in 2006.

The Government firmly believe that there is a future role for coal as part of a balanced energy policy, providing that its potential environmental impacts can be managed, and that there can be a continuing role for UK-produced coal in meeting our total coal requirements. The coal-fired generating sector has demonstrated its confidence in that vision by committing to install flue gas desulphurisation equipment at a number of power stations. However, the vision depends on sufficient supply of UK produced coal, which means coal from both deep and surface mines.

The decline in English output is not due to a shortage of workable reserves. The key planning document for English operators is minerals planning guidance 3, generally referred to as MPG3. It permits a presumption against coal extraction, whether open-cast or deep mine, and against colliery spoil disposal, but only if the proposal is not environmentally acceptable or cannot be made so by planning conditions or obligations. If it cannot be made so, it must provide local or community benefits which clearly outweigh the likely impacts to justify the grant of planning permission. My officials continue to work with colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to ensure that MPG3 is properly applied by planning authorities.

The industry has come a long way in recent years. It is subject to stringent controls, especially with regard to site operations, such as hours of work, noise and dust levels, provision of screening mounds and so on. Site restoration requirements may include the recreation of water courses and the replanting of hedgerows and mature trees as well as the careful reinstatement of agriculture land, where appropriate. Where a site has been degraded by previous industrial activity, it may include, for example, untreated waste, abandoned shafts or areas where old underground workings may collapse, causing subsidence or dangerous gas releases. Surface mining will normally remove those hazards and restoration will leave the site in a significantly improved condition. Many developments not only include reinstatement to a previous condition, but also new woodland planting, for example, habitat creation and improved public access. As required under MPG3, such enhancements will normally be taken into account by the planning authority when assessing whether a planning application offers long-term local and community benefits which offset temporary adverse impacts while the site is producing coal.

I repeat that I am not talking about this particular planning application; as Energy Minister, I am trying to create the energy context for these general issues. I hope that with that we can end the debate by once again thanking my hon. Friend for securing this debate and congratulating him on being the penultimate Back-Bench speaker before the recess. I wish you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and all colleagues a creative and fulfilling recess.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty eight minutes past Six o'clock.

NHS Logistics

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Coaker.]

9.30 am

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): I apologise for my nearly late arrival, Mr. Olner, but I have rarely seen such appalling traffic as I encountered on my way here.

I am pleased to have secured this debate about the future of NHS Logistics and the market testing process being carried out as part of the review of NHS arm's length bodies following the Gershon report. I have a constituency interest in that one of the six distribution centres that services the NHS supply chain is based at Somercotes Alfreton in my constituency. The centre, which employs about 400 staff, also serves as the headquarters of NHS Logistics. Labour Members who have NHS Logistics sites in their constituencies or whose constituents work at sites in neighbouring constituencies have been visiting the sites over the past year and more, we have held meetings and written to Ministers and recently tabled a number of parliamentary questions. Not all those Members who have a constituency interest are able to be here today—two are Ministers, so they are barred from participating in the debate, and a couple of others have inescapable commitments—but all are concerned about NHS Logistics.

I start with a quote:

"The NHS Logistics Authority has proved itself to be right at the forefront of the transformation taking place in the health service and it fully deserves this award."

That was the former Health Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid), talking about NHS Logistics when it scooped a top award at the Health Service Journal awards. The award was for improving care through its work on developing an e-technology system and a good computer system. NHS Logistics received a large number of compliments for that work and for saving large sums of money through its systems.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate. Is she aware that last year NHS Logistics beat all comers, including private sector organisations, to win the coveted supply chain of the year award, which is organised by Motor Transport magazine?

Judy Mallaber: Yes, I am. NHS Logistics has won a string of awards. For example, last year it won an IT technology award for which it was praised by Sir Nigel Crisp. I am particularly interested in the IT awards, because we are told that the need for investment in a new computer system is a major reason for bringing the private sector into the NHS supply chain—in the role that is currently fulfilled by NHS Logistics. We hear that such investment can be funded only by the private sector, yet NHS Logistics has won many IT awards as well as awards for its other functions. That is just one of the things that puzzle those of us who have NHS Logistics sites in our constituencies.

We are also puzzled by some of the arguments that have been made for moving the service into the private sector. There is much on which I agree with my right hon. Friend the Minister. It is sensible to review the plethora of arm's length bodies to ensure that they provide value and effective services and work as efficiently as possible. It is also reasonable to keep the NHS supply chain under continuous review to ensure that it runs efficiently and to seek improvements. The evidence from our visits suggests that the supply chain is run efficiently. While safeguarding the security of the supply chain, we should also ensure that maximum resources are available for front-line patient care.

While we would not dispute that we have some common ground with the Minister, I and other hon. Members have sought this debate because there is under way a process of market testing to decide whether the private sector should become involved or whether NHS Logistics should stay as it is, perhaps with adaptations. We want to ensure that that process is carried out properly. We are concerned that it is not taking into account all the necessary factors, and I would like assurances from my right hon. Friend the Minister that nobody involved in the process—whether a civil servant, a member of the Department of Health commercial directorate or a Minister—starts by automatically assuming that the private sector is the best or the only option. I should also like to be told clearly the aim of the process. In what direction are we going? Because I am accountable to my constituents, I need access to full information about how any decision is taken. I want to make sure that the process is transparent, and I seek ministerial assurances on all the issues. That is why my colleagues and I have sought this debate and tabled a number of parliamentary questions.

We started off thinking that the issue was NHS Logistics' efficiency, but when we visited its sites, we were impressed by its efficiency. As has been mentioned, it has won a number of awards and it clearly is efficient in a number of ways. Following a number of efficiency exercises, many jobs were lost at the Alfreton site last year—I know that because one of my good friends lost her job in that review. One of the six NHS Logistics sites—the one in Bridgwater—is already privately run, and that is the site with the lowest satisfaction rate among customers. In addition, the organisation already works with private sector partners—the transport that I saw was provided by TNT. I note that NHS Logistics' on-time delivery performance is running at about 99 per cent. It runs a benchmarking system to test its performance against that of the private sector through Logmark, the UK logistics benchmarking club, and utilises a number of other means. There is not necessarily any doubt about the organisation's efficiency. I think that it is generally accepted that it is efficient, and I ask the Minister to confirm that.

We were then told that the argument had moved on and the question now was whether the organisation could be more effective if a greater proportion of the market were provided for centrally, thus achieving economies of scale and enabling more money to be put into patient care. I am rather dubious about some of the arguments that have been put in that respect and I should like the Minister to ensure that all the arguments are taken into account. When colleagues and I met the Health Minister Lord Warner before the election, he stated that NHS Logistics formed only a small proportion of the supply chain. However, although it has only 20 per cent. of market share by value, it provides 70 per cent. of the market by volume.

It is important not to disrupt the supply chain to health providers. I am told that there are 9,000 suppliers in the sector, of which NHS Logistics is by far the largest. I have also seen the current business plan, which I believe the commercial directorate has approved. NHS Logistics is already expanding into some of the more specialist areas with which it has not previously dealt. It has plans for a 41 per cent. growth target over the next four years, taking it to a market share of 30 per cent. by value, following growth of 35 per cent. in the past four years. Although there may have been a rocky start after the Cabinet Office report, NHS Logistics has gone zooming ahead over the past few years.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): Some queries have been raised about the validity of the Cabinet Office study to which my hon. Friend referred. Would she like to comment on that?

Judy Mallaber: The review was conducted some time ago and it makes interesting reading on the potential for market expansion. The report recognises that we should not expect all NHS supplies to be provided centrally. Sometimes, therefore, it is not necessarily sensible to say that a certain proportion should be provided by NHS Logistics.

In response to some of the questions that I have raised, I would like a clear analysis of the types of item that NHS Logistics does not provide. They are clearly high-value items, because otherwise there would not be such a disparity between value and volume market share. If so, it would probably be difficult to achieve common ground across the health service such that sufficient supplies could be ordered to secure economies of scale. It is easy to consider the gap in the figures and assume that the private sector will have a magic way of securing agreement among those being supplied to ensure that those economies of scale can be gained.

Jonathan Shaw: Further to the question that my hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall) asked about the 1998 Cabinet Office report, does my hon. Friend recognise that parts of it are not really relevant now, given the expansion of NHS resources since 2001? The authors of the report could not have known of the record investment that we were about to make, so their projections are not relevant to today's operations.

Judy Mallaber: I agree, but it is important to have information about those items that are not provided, so that we can consider sensibly whether an assumption that the private sector can come and sweep up the market is dogmatic or realistic. I hope that the Minister will insist on having that detailed information when she considers the matter. I shall be interested to see whether it will be possible to provide me with that information in answer to questions that I have raised.

As I said, NHS Logistics operates effectively and has done a number of benchmarking exercises, using Confederation of British Industry benchmarking, Score Research, which is part of Manchester business school, and Logmark for its operational activities. NHS Logistics has come out well in all those exercises. Have those in the commercial directorate who are considering the issue and who are advising Ministers taken those results seriously or have they assumed that the private sector is bound to be able to operate more efficiently?

One of the reasons why I am particularly concerned to ensure that all the issues are considered seriously is that the dangers of not doing so and of getting things wrong are very great. We must ensure that the supply service is risk free and that it can provide what is needed to all those who are so dependent on it. There is no point in giving the task to an organisation that will not carry it out effectively. We must be absolutely confident that any change in the supply system will not lead to any disruption of supply.

Some of the examples that have been drawn to my attention are particularly worrying. One involves the supply of cleaning equipment. I understand that the Health Protection Agency tells NHS hospitals that they should get supplies from NHS Logistics to ensure proper materials to deal with the MRSA problem. In that context, I would like to knock on the head the News of the World article that was picked up from the website and included in the Library briefing for this debate. No other paper ran the story, in which it was said that there was MRSA at the Normanton site, as confirmed by Chemsol Consultancy. The Health Protection Agency went in and found no evidence to support the story and we are told that Chemsol Consultancy has not been prepared to provide the Department of Health with its samples in other instances so that it can be determined whether it is identifying MRSA or some other, non-problematic, bacteria. The Health Protection Agency found nothing wrong at all.

It is important that cleaning equipment is provided safely and properly. I will just plug a company in my constituency, JohnsonDiversey, which has produced the wonderful Jonmaster system and which won a manufacturing excellence award last week.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The hon. Lady is speaking up powerfully for her constituents. Does she think that anything of an inherent public service ethos is to be found in this process? After all, Tesco has to have extraordinarily reliable, up-to-the-minute delivery systems and so on as well. Could the hon. Lady clarify why she feels that NHS supply is intrinsically a public sector activity?

Judy Mallaber: I would argue that, as the NHS Logistics Authority is running efficiently—when I first started investigating, I was prepared to be told that it was not efficient, but everything that we have seen makes us think that it is—I would want clear reasons for making a change spelled out so that I could explain it to the people who work there. Often, we turn things upside down for no good reason. If the authority is working efficiently, I, as the MP who represents one of its sites, want to be given the full information that justifies any change. That is particularly important because the authority is managing the vaccination programme and the cleaning supplies and is part of the anti-terrorist contingency plans. It would be worrying if that went wrong.

One of my main concerns is that the debate and process should be transparent. At the moment, it can be difficult to get information because we are told that it is all commercial and has to be kept secret. If I make inquiries, I am told that that is not something that I should know about. To me, as a local representative, that is not acceptable. I want a totally transparent process. We have asked parliamentary questions about issues such as identifying the gap between what is provided by NHS Logistics and what could be provided, and about its growth levels. I also want to know whether NHS Logistics can submit a bid, which I understand it has not been allowed to do. If it gets to the next stage—we are now down to three bidders, each of which has an IT component—the question has been raised whether it will need a new IT system. I also want to know and be able to see the commercial case, if it is decided to go on to the invitation-to-negotiate stage.

Jonathan Shaw: Before my hon. Friend concludes, would she comment on the ability of NHS Logistics to expand its capacity? We have been led to believe that the commercial directorate is considering that as an option for future operations. To meet the demands of the NHS, capacity will need to be expanded. The question is whether NHS Logistics can expand its capacity without further recourse to the public purse.

Judy Mallaber: As I understand it, NHS Logistics has dealt with that in its plans. It would be able to expand and it has built into its plans the need for additional warehousing. The original report suggested that it should reduce the number of its distribution centres to six or seven, one of which should be tested privately, which is how the Bridgwater site came into being. However, it has been pointed out to me that these days supply chains tend not to buy warehousing but to lease it. That has been built into NHS Logistics' plan, so it should not be a problem.

I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that all the issues are taken into account and that we, as Members, have full information on why any change is taking place. I have yet to be convinced that change is necessary. If there is a good argument, I will not stand in the way of ensuring that NHS supply is done efficiently and well. There may be alternative ways to improve the authority besides straightforwardly handing it over to one private sector consortium. From the evidence that I have, it seems to operate efficiently.

I also want to see the commercial case so that if it is decided to extend invitations to negotiate, we can see the advantages of any firm being involved. I have an example from the same area, in Alfreton, near the NHS Logistics site. When it was decided to transfer some Benefits Agency services to the ONE service, we had a private sector pilot in my area. The company chosen was Reed, but I was not allowed to have any information on why the service was put out to the private sector. Subsequently, it came back in house and into the public sector again. I do not know why.

The review of NHS Logistics affects hundreds of my constituents and I would like an assurance that the process will be transparent, that all the factors will be taken into account, that our questions will be fully answered and that I will be given a clear, compelling and detailed argument about why any change should take place. I am the one who will have to go back and explain things to my constituents, and my hon. Friends will have to explain to theirs. Will my right hon. Friend the Minister ensure that we have full information throughout the process?

9.51 am

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) on securing—by the skin of her teeth—this important Adjournment debate, which covers a number of constituencies, on arriving right on time and on delivering such an excellent and eloquent dissertation on the reasons why we are here this morning.

NHS Logistics has an operational distribution centre in my constituency, on the Astmoor industrial estate. It employs more than 200 people and is part of an excellent distribution network that serves the NHS well. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Minister will soon be making a visit to NHS Logistics in Runcorn, and I am sure that she will be warmly welcomed whenever that visit may be—her office has not told me yet, but I understand that it will be on Thursday.

NHS Logistics is a very successful business. It is not for profit, it is an NHS operation, it is run by NHS staff, and the interests of NHS staff and patients are at the epicentre of what it does. Figures vary, but I understand that, nationally, NHS Logistics employs more than 1,400 people. It has six distribution centres and 230 vehicles and makes 1,200 deliveries a day to hospitals, clinics and GPs' surgeries. It has a catalogue of 42,000 items, which it delivers to 10,000 points in approximately 600 NHS trusts. As my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley said, its efficiency in delivery is superb. Some 98 per cent. of items are always available, 99 per cent. of the items that are important to the NHS are available and 98 per cent. of deliveries are made within 30 minutes of the delivery time specified by the purchasing NHS trust. That is a fantastic record. Achieving that on a day-to-day basis shows us that, as she has said, this is a superb operation.

The non-pay, non-drugs spending of the English NHS is about £12 billion. NHS Logistics operates in a market that has been estimated at about £3.7 billion. The turnover of NHS Logistics is about £700 million per annum. It has an operating cost of about £70 million. Again, we can see that this is an efficient operation that does not cost the NHS any money to run. It provides the NHS with 75 per cent. of the volume of consumable durables involved at factory gate prices. It is important to make the point that any surplus that it makes is given back to the NHS in rebates. Over the past three years, at least £9 million has been returned to the NHS. The business is growing very fast at the moment: we are talking about a 10 per cent. compound interest rate per annum. That is a phenomenal growth in an already excellent business.

At the core of the business is the fact that it involves a paperless ordering system, through its e-commerce computers, which connects every NHS trust—everybody in the NHS who buys from NHS Logistics—directly to the operation. Online orders are made and, as I said, 98 per cent. of deliveries are made within 30 minutes of the delivery time specified by the NHS Logistics Authority. It is an extremely efficient operation. There have been at least two efficiency studies. You will not be surprised to hear, Mr. Olner, that both conclude that it is an extremely well run and efficient business that provides the NHS with an excellent service.

Given the facts and figures that are on the record, anyone from outside who observed what was going on this morning would rightly ask why we were considering moving a service that serves the NHS well into the private sector or outsourcing it from the NHS. Clearly, the service does its job.

The audit trail starts with the Gershon review. In his 2004 Budget report, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said:

"the pursuit of efficiency also includes reducing bureaucracy, that both cuts headquarters' administration costs and frees up time of front line professionals to respond better to the needs of their customers".

Anybody who works for the NHS Logistics Authority would have thought, listening to the Chancellor, that there was nothing in the Budget that should cause them to worry about their job security or about the prospects for NHS Logistics. The service allows a huge amount to go to front-line services, it is efficient and it provides a service that the NHS wants. It is a front-line NHS service.

However, on 20 May 2005, the then Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid), announced in a press release that the number of arm's length bodies in the NHS were to be reduced by 50 per cent., which would save £500 million and reduce the number of posts by 25 per cent. It is not clear why he chose the figure of 50 per cent. I understand where the saving of £500 million comes from and that, when we reduce the number of arm's length bodies, the number of people on the central payroll will reduce. I have no problem with that argument as long as it is done for the right reasons. My right hon. Friend went on to say:

"I want to see more staff and resources at the frontline delivering better patient care across the country. I want to see improved efficiency, reducing bureaucracy and better value for money."

We keep making the point that that is exactly what NHS Logistics does. It is efficient, there is little bureaucracy and it provides excellent value for money.

The next bit of the audit trail is a statement made by a Department of Health spokesperson in the Derbyshire Times, which was published on 21 October 2004. The spokesperson said of the Department of Health review of arm's lengths bodies that "A key objective of the review is to drive efficiency and best value for the NHS, and for the taxpayer.".

We have no problem in pursuing best value and in getting good value for the taxpayer. The question in our minds is whether what the Government propose will achieve that.

The spokesperson went on to confirm that

"The market testing process is looking at the feasibility of contracting out the consumable supplies and activities of NHS Logistics."

That is almost a return to something that we had in local government—compulsory competitive tendering. A service that is delivered publicly by the NHS is being subjected to a market test to determine whether it can be done better; whether efficiency can be improved and costs reduced.

The statement continues:

"The decision about contracting out will be taken in due course and will be subject to careful evaluation of the responses that the private sector will provide to the market testing currently initiated."

What does that mean? How are we going to evaluate whether the market test has produced either a more efficient delivery of consumer durables in the NHS or delivered those durables more cheaply? Is that the test in this case? Is that the acid test that NHS Logistics must be put to? I hope that the Minister will address that when she responds to the debate.

We are getting closer to the real reasons why we face the market test. It is not about delivering efficiency or about value for money. It is about capturing more of the business of the NHS that does not relate to wages or the drugs bill.

Our noble Friend, the then Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Health, Lord Warner, went further on 13 December 2004. He sent us a publication entitled "Developing the supply chain and procurement services for the NHS to achieve better value".

In that document, he explained the reasons for the market test. He said that "market testing is designed to prove whether or not the most effective supply chain and procurement service for the NHS can be achieved by partnering with the independent sector."

There was no question of contracting out, or of the private sector making comments as to whether the service could be delivered. The question was whether it could be achieved through partnership with the independent sector. The document then states something quite extraordinary:

"In the current environment of diverting all available resources to frontline services, it is not intended that the Department will make any further investment into the NHS Logistics Authority".

That is quite remarkable because the Government do not do that anyway. It is a self-funding business that puts money back into the NHS. Its running costs stand at £70 million, as has already been said, and if it needed to it could clearly expand its operation through its financial ability to draw on funds wherever possible. The Government do not actually fund what goes on within NHS Logistics.

The NHS Logistics Authority could provide the Government with extra money or enable someone in the private sector to deliver this service in one of only two ways: it could reduce staffing costs or increase the cost of the services that it provides. I am not certain that there is much scope left for reducing staffing costs because that exercise has already been carried out. The only way in which anything can be achieved for the private sector is if it takes over the business and increases the cost to the national health service. That would be disastrous for the Department of Health and the NHS because increased costs for consumer durables would be passed on to NHS trusts. It would be a fruitless, pointless and stupid exercise.

Jonathan Shaw: My hon. Friend talks about increased costs to the NHS, but does he agree that if hospital trusts are not satisfied with the charges that NHS Logistics make to their hospitals they will go elsewhere? They have the ability to do that now, and most of them do not choose to do so. The local hospitals that I have spoken to choose NHS Logistics because of its cost and efficiency.

Mr. Hall: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. The simple fact is that NHS Logistics does not have a monopoly of supply in the NHS. The NHS purchases from NHS Logistics because it is the best supplier. If the NHS was not satisfied with the service from NHS Logistics, it would go elsewhere. However, 75 per cent. of the business in consumer durables in the NHS goes to NHS Logistics because it is price efficient, it can guarantee delivery and it provides security in the contract. The trusts are also linked to NHS Logistics through the e-commerce computer. That system saves the Government £100 million a year, and it is a very good one. That is why NHS Logistics is so successful.

Judy Mallaber: Does my hon. Friend know whether a proper study has been carried out of whether those who will have to deal with this new private sector body—if it is created—to purchase additional goods wish to do so, or whether they wish to continue getting goods through NHS Logistics? Is he aware of any proper surveys of the views of those consumers on whether there is any point in handing over to a private sector operation, and on whether it would be any better at expanding the market?

Mr. Hall: That exercise has not been carried out. Had it been done, the satisfaction ratings of NHS Logistics suggest that the 600 NHS trusts in the UK that use its services would send the message loud and clear that they are very satisfied with the service. I defy anyone to improve on the figure of 98 per cent. of deliveries made within 30 minutes of the promised time of delivery. That is a fantastic service to offer the NHS.

It is important that the NHS has that security of supply. If the private sector takes over that part of the business, will a private sector company be able to guarantee that sort of efficiency? What will a private sector company do in relation to the e-commerce system that is now in place? Will it make further investment in information technology at a huge cost? I do not know the answer to that. Has that question been factored into the market test undertaken by the Government? There is a fundamental point about how the delivery system will work. Will it be an e-commerce system, will it be available to all NHS trusts and will the delivery time be guaranteed?

There is another question. If the Government's purpose is to use the NHS Logistics Authority's £700 million business within the NHS as a platform to secure more of the £12 billion non-drugs and non-wages business, what percentage of that business is available? As my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley said, a great deal of that business is capital investment in expensive, high-tech diagnostic machinery, which the manufacturers supply directly to the NHS. I do not think that that aspect of the business would be available to any company in any new set-up.

Jonathan Shaw: Does my hon. Friend agree that it should be possible to open up new markets to the NHS Logistics Authority, not just in the NHS but in the private sector? There are currently constraints on the operation of markets. If we were not to take a dogmatic and ideological view, it would follow that the NHS Logistics Authority should be able to compete along with the private sector. Indeed, we might see the authority expand even more.

Mr. Hall: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. If there were a completely free market, the NHS Logistics Authority might do more business than it does at the moment.

It is important to note that we already have an efficient business that guarantees security of delivery, and that it is not for profit. Any surpluses that it makes are fed back into the national health service, and its e-commerce computer ordering system enables it to save the NHS £100 million a year. If we are to place that business in the private sector, what guarantees are there that the service that it provides to NHS trusts, clinics, doctors and their surgeries will continue, and that there will be no wholesale price rises for consumer durables, 75 per cent. of which the authority provides to the NHS? What security is there?

I shall quote again from the press release issued by my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Health. He said:

> "I want to see more staff and resources at the frontline delivering better patient care across the country. I want to see improved efficiency, reduced bureaucracy and better value for money."

The NHS Logistics Authority does that, and if that is the acid test, we do not have anything to worry about. However, if the Government had a hidden agenda, I should be very concerned, because I should have to return to my constituents on the Astmoor industrial estate to tell them that they have done a fantastic job during the past four years delivering to the national health service the goods that it wants at a price and at a time that it wants, and that they have been absolutely superb, but that the Government have decided, for whatever reason, that the service is to be transferred to the private sector. I should find it difficult to explain that to them, and I want to be sure that any decision-making process leading to that transfer is transparent, that Members of Parliament are consulted about it and that our voices are heard.

10.8 am

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall) in congratulating our hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) not only on securing this debate, but on all the hard work that she has put into the review of the NHS Logistics operation. The NHS Logistics Authority is a vital part of a successful NHS. Its hard-working staff are the backroom people of the NHS, not seen by the public, but the service that they provide is fundamental to our hospitals. NHS Logistics supply some 42,000 items, including blankets, bandages, biros, buckets and bedpans and many others. My hon. Friends and I understand that the Government have a responsibility to cut out waste and slash red tape to maximise the amount of resources going to the front line of our public services. It was a manifesto commitment on which we all stood for election. We all support that proposal.

The arm's-length body review was commissioned by NHS Logistics and its sister organisation the NHS Purchasing and Supply Agency, which are two of the 38 agencies whose number is to be reduced to 20. The Chancellor has said that the proposals for the arm's-length bodies will produce savings of £500 million, and my right hon. Friend the Minister will rightly point out that £500 million could be used to build four new hospitals or employ 20,000 more nurses, 6,250 consultants or even 7,500 GPs. I have not attempted to calculate how many bedpans it would purchase, but I am sure that it would be a lot.

We want to understand clearly what the Government hope to achieve by the end of the process. If they want the very best supplies operation for the NHS and a better-managed operation that is more efficient, that can expand its capacity and that can return resources to the NHS, they will have our support, but we need to understand how they will arrive at their decisions. Are they confident that they can, in advance, compare the private sector with the existing operation and its achievements, which my hon. Friends have described in detail?

Judy Mallaber: Is my hon. Friend surprised that, unless we are mistaken, NHS Logistics appears not to have been invited to put in a direct bid or offer, even though it has plans for major growth over the next few years following substantial growth in recent years?

Jonathan Shaw: That is the question that my hon. Friends and I have placed on the Order Paper. We are asking whether NHS Logistics was invited to tender to run the service. Our aim is to help the Government to compare the operation's costs, efficiencies, savings and, importantly, its quality with those of the private sector. Quality is essential. We have record investment in our NHS, and operation waiting times are being driven down—from 18 months when Labour was elected to six months this year. By 2008, we want people not to have to wait more than 18 weeks from seeing their GP to their operation. For that to happen, all staff in NHS hospitals, including doctors and nurses, need an efficient supply system, so that everything is there when they need it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale said, 98 per cent. of products currently arrive in hospitals on time.

People do not complain when things work well. I spoke to the chief executive of the Medway NHS Trust, which runs one of the hospitals that serves my constituency. I asked whether he had ever heard complaints about his suppliers, the logistics operation. He said, "Never, but I'll tell you one thing—I flippin' well would if there was a problem, because it would cause chaos. The operation runs smoothly. It isn't on the radar of things that I'm concerned about, and I never want it to be." That is an important point.

That does not mean to say that we take a dogmatic approach to the issue. We simply want to know what will be tested and how Ministers will arrive at their decision. When my hon. Friends and I look at the comparisons with the private sector, what we see is that NHS Logistics has been the best. In 2004, it beat all comers, including Woolworths, Nestlé UK and John Lewis Partnership—all private sector companies—when it won the coveted supply chain of the year award organised by Motor Transport magazine. I have in my hand a picture of Barry Mellor, the chief executive officer, receiving the award from a chap who looks remarkably like a former Conservative London mayoral candidate.

Mr. Mike Hall: Will my hon. Friend confirm that NHS Logistics also beat TNT in that competition?

Jonathan Shaw: TNT was obviously some way down the list, because it is not mentioned on the front page. It is not even on the shortlist. The judges recognised NHS Logistics as "the team who has created or developed the most outstanding supply chain in the country. It is the 'best of the best' and is the top prize."

That recognition comes from the industry itself. The judges also gave NHS Logistics a technology award, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley referred, for its e-supply package, which includes an electronic catalogue, ordering and billing. That part of the operation was, they said,

"an exceptional achievement in terms of strategy, implementation and user education—the best bit is it's my money they're saving".

NHS Logistics is saving taxpayers' money through such investment in its technology.

Staff and organisations receive such awards with great pride, and those awards are not achieved by accident. A point that my hon. Friends have not made is that NHS Logistics has taken off in recent years because of good management and the dedication of staff. With that comes good industrial relations with the main union, Unison. NHS Logistics invests in its staff and has a good training programme. The Maidstone site is next to my constituency and has 300 employees, and when I have visited it I have seen that management and staff work very well together. It is what the Labour Government want—a modern partnership in the workplace that invests in staff and improves productivity through investment in training. Many of the staff who work in the sector benefit from an increase in their basic skills and customer care skills. The results are there for all to see. The 98 per cent. achievement of delivery times is no accident and nor is the acknowledgement of NHS Logistics as the "best of the best", nor the fact that more money is being put back into the NHS.

NHS Logistics talks about paying detailed attention to customer care, and says:

"To be successful the customer must be at the centre of everything that we do".

My hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley referred to the comparison between the private sector site at Bridgewater and the other four sites elsewhere in the country, including the one at Maidstone. A recent customer survey showed that Bridgewater was the poorest performer. The Cabinet Office report recommended that the number of sites should be reduced from six to five and that one should be run privately so that comparisons could be made. Everyone should be able to understand the intention and then determine whether the private sector is delivering a better operation.

Judy Mallaber: Is my hon. Friend aware that Exel, which runs the Bridgwater site, and TNT, which he said was beaten by NHS Logistics for an award, are among the last three bidding consortiums? We know about TNT only because—perhaps inadvertently—it told its staff. Does he share my concern that Ministers and those who advise them should not start off with a dogmatic assumption that the private sector can do better, and that they should not fall into the trap that the Conservative party fell into of automatically assuming that NHS Logistics should be privatised? The Conservatives stated that position before the election. We want to avoid dogma, to keep an open mind and to analyse the options correctly.

Jonathan Shaw: My hon. Friend is correct. A worrying feature of the process has been the lack of information about how judgments will be made on whether it is appropriate to privatise NHS Logistics. Leaks are not the way to get information, as they might not be accurate and staff work against a backdrop of concern that undermines confidence.

On comparisons and not being dogmatic, if TNT, Exel or any of the other private sector bidders were the best of the best, the documents that they submit to the Department would refer to such coveted awards. I wonder whether they will mention the fact that they did not even get on the shortlist. I think not.

I conclude my remarks by endorsing those of my hon. Friends. We should not take a dogmatic approach. If we are to be able to speak to constituents who are valued members of the NHS work force—the best of the best across the board—we need to understand how the Government will decide whether it is right to stay with the existing operation, with all its achievements, or to take another route. We look forward to the Minister's response.

10.23 am

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) on securing this debate. She and the hon. Members for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall) and for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw) spoke convincingly of the work done by their constituents who are employed by NHS Logistics. We heard about their excellent performance and the awards that they have won. I do not believe that anyone who heard those three hon. Members speak need have any doubt that NHS Logistics is a highly effective and, as far as one can tell, highly efficient organisation.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the general thrust of what the hon. Member for Amber Valley said about the need for a proper and transparent market-testing process. No one who has spoken would object to the principle of assessing whether what is done at present by NHS Logistics could be done better another way, although I believe that they are all confident about what the answer would be.

In trying to reassure us that the market-testing exercises are properly, not dogmatically, done, could the Minister give us an example of a market-testing exercise undertaken by her Department that did not find that the private sector would be more efficient than the public sector? If she could demonstrate that sometimes the answer is to keep activities in house, that would reassure us that the process is open, and not one that inevitably leads to a private sector solution.

The starting point for this debate and this process is, as the hon. Member for Weaver Vale said, the Gershon process and a bidding war between the Chancellor and the Tories over who could get rid of the most civil servants. I presume, although I am open to correction, that if NHS Logistics were market-tested and someone else were to carry on, the civil service head count would go down by a few thousand.

Judy Mallaber: They are NHS staff who would be affected.

Steve Webb: My point is that the Chancellor has set a goal to reduce the number of public servants—perhaps civil servants is the wrong description—and replace them with private sector employees to achieve an arbitrary goal of shrinking the public sector. The same amount of money would be paid to get the same job done, but the classification would be different; that is the arbitrariness to which the hon. Member for Weaver Vale referred. He said that the plan was to reduce the number of arm's-length bodies by 50 per cent. Where has that magic number come from? What is so special about 50 per cent.? Surely, the right approach would be to ask what needs to be done in the public sector and whether this is the right structure within which to do it, not to start with the answer and work backwards, but that is what this process seems to be about.

The traditional argument for involving the public sector at all is that there is some market failure—something that the private market cannot provide at all or as well, without which there would be some loss to society. At first glance, it is hard to see what that is. On the NHS Logistics Authority customer bulletin in May there were 15 new products, including Columbian coffee, rich roast Arabica coffee, dried cream and latte cream. There was also something about discounts on stationery.

At first sight, it is hard to see why we need a public sector organisation to sell coffee, paper and headed notepaper. What is the public service ethos there; what is the market failure? I cannot see one, except that there may be an issue about the taxpayer getting better value for money out of bulk purchasing. I understand that the Purchasing and Supply Agency does the contracts, but it might be that we taxpayers get more health care out of our NHS budget if coffee, paper and so on are bought cheaper through the massive bulk-buying power of the NHS, which is a huge organisation—the biggest employer outside the red army, or whatever the figure is.

The market failure could be that if we allow all that to be done privately, we will end up with lots of atomised bits of the NHS buying—this is a slightly facetious example—their individual boxes of coffee or whatever, and a higher total bill, and with the taxpayer getting less value for money. The first question to ask is: would we lose that bulk buying power if the NHS Logistics Authority were not doing the supply-chain work? In the past, the Government have separated those things, with a purchasing process that gets the bulk economies of scale, and a separate logistics process that gets things to where they should be. Can we still get the economies of scale that we want if we do not have a public sector Logistics Authority delivering the goods?

Jonathan Shaw: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that bulk purchasing in the NHS has served us well? A recent development has been the bulk purchasing of operations in the private sector for NHS patients, which has provided better value for money.

Steve Webb: I could not disagree more with the hon. Gentleman's final comment, but, in the interests of not spreading disharmony on the thing that he does care about, which is his constituents and the logistics agency, I shall stick with that point. Suffice it to say that that money would have been better spent in the NHS with NHS providers, but we will return to that. I appreciate that there is a paradox here, in that I am trying to stand up for his constituents and he is trying to undermine the NHS, but we will come back to NHS Logistics.

There seems to be no dispute about the fact that NHS Logistics provides an excellent service. The hon. Member for Amber Valley asked the pertinent—almost conservative, perhaps Conservative—question, "If it ain't broke, why fix it?" What is the motivation for the change? Government reviews have concluded that there is scope for efficiency savings. It is not clear why they say so; they just seem to assert it. I hope that the Minister will clarify, given what we have heard about the performance of NHS Logistics, why the Government are convinced that there is flab or fat to be got rid of. I see no symptoms of that. In fact, the phrase that the hon. Member for Chatham and Aylesford quoted a chief executive using was quite pertinent; the issue just was not on the radar. The point he was making was "If it's not broke, don't fix it."

It is very interesting that we have, as it were, a mini market test, if one of the sites is run by the private sector and if, as we are told, it gives lower levels of satisfaction. If the Minister can tell us how that evidence will feed into the market-testing process, that will be helpful. I freely admit that the issue has not registered strongly on my radar until today, but I am concerned to hear from the hon. Member for Amber Valley that she has tried to get information about what is happening and that once again the response has been, "Oh—commercial confidentiality. Can't really say."

At what point will Members of the House stand up and revolt, and say "Hang on. We have a job of scrutiny to do here"? In individual constituency cases we get quite cross about such instances, but perhaps collectively we need to get crosser about the scrutiny of public services. All too often, we want to know what is going on, and are told that we cannot be told the details of the contract, because it is commercially sensitive, and we cannot be told operational details, because they are commercially sensitive, too. Our role in scrutinising what Government and public services do is undermined if we do not get answers to such questions, as the hon. Lady says.

Perhaps I may be heretical for a moment. If the principle is bulk purchase and getting good value for the taxpayer, why must the NHS be ring-fenced? My example of coffee and stationery is slightly facetious, but why do not we link together public purchasers across the public sector? If the NHS has buying clout, presumably it and the Department for Education and Skills put together have even more. Could we get even better value for money by using the bulk purchasing power of the wider public sector more effectively, or are we dealing with a case of departmentalitis that prevents one Department from working with another for collective purchasing? I wonder whether the Minister has talked to ministerial colleagues in other Departments about whether the taxpayer, and the NHS purchaser, could get better value for money by working with other Government Departments as a bulk purchaser.

We seem to be dealing with a paradox. The Government and, to an extent, all the political parties want the NHS to be more devolved—more local and more responsive to local needs and demand. Yet there is a danger that if we fragment and atomise the NHS we shall lose economies of scale from bulk purchasing power. Arguably, using bodies such as the NHS Purchasing and Supply Agency and NHS Logistics to deliver services is a way of maintaining those benefits. It does not matter how devolved the primary care trusts and the rest may be; it will still be possible for them to tap into national purchasing and national logistics, and potentially that is good value for money.

Will the Minister clarify the motivation for what is proposed? I get the sense that it was decided on high—arbitrarily, as far as one can see—to reduce the number of arm's-length bodies. It was asserted that there was scope for efficiency gains, in the face of apparent evidence that we have an impressively efficient organisation that works well. I hope that the Minister can assure us about the transparency of the process, and clarify the motivation. We all want more value for money, but it is not clear that the current process is the first place one would look for it.

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) on securing the debate and on all the hard work that she has done for her constituents. I share the concerns that have been expressed by all speakers so far about the apparent lack of information on, and transparency in, the process. I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity to clarify the issues and answer questions.

There is no doubt that NHS Logistics has been a success story. We have heard of the various awards that have been granted. As we know, demand for the organisation's services has risen year on year and it now accounts for about £730 million, which is a very good figure. Every day its fleet of about 200 vehicles delivers to wards in NHS trusts items from the 42,000 lines kept at its five distribution centres.

Credit for the authority's success lies directly with its management and staff of almost 1,500, many of whom are based at its headquarters and distribution centre at Alfreton in the constituency of the hon. Member for Amber Valley. I think that most hon. Members would agree with the Opposition that those staff face great uncertainty. For a number of reasons, either intentionally or inadvertently, that uncertainty has, to a large extent, been created by the Government.

To a certain extent, the Government have played politics with the authority in the timing of announcements—I shall make that clear in a moment—and in the message itself. That has created uncertainties and a certain lack of transparency. I say this with all due respect to the Minister of State, Department of Health, the right hon. Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy). As she is newly appointed, I know that she would not have been party to the problem, which goes back a few years.

The Department of Health review of arm's-length bodies, which was completed in July 2004, recommended that the authority's functions be outsourced and that the authority should be abolished by 1 April next year. In truth, however, the authority's fate was already under discussion before the review started. In the autumn of 2003, the recommendation of the Department of Health's commercial directorate was that the authority's procurement and supply chain activity would be best developed in the private sector.

Unfortunately, that was decided at about the same time that the then Secretary of State decided to undertake a review of the Department's arm's-length bodies. The recommendations were unnecessarily delayed, so NHS Logistics was included in the review even though its future had already been decided. The Conservatives contend that it was included deliberately to expand the number of arm's-length bodies being considered so as to make the scale of the apparent cuts seem larger. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response.

The inclusion of NHS Logistics to beef up the review was not unique. The Commission for Health Improvement, the National Care Standards Commission and the Retained Organs Commission were also included, despite having been abolished before the review got under way; and the National Radiological Protection Board and the Public Health Laboratory Service were included, despite the Government simultaneously progressing legislation to abolish them. Six of the original 42 arm's-length bodies in the review had already been earmarked for abolition.

To a certain extent, at least, the timing of announcements about NHS Logistics was about playing politics. That may not have been the sole factor, but it has contributed to the confusion and lack of transparency that have characterised the entire process.

Judy Mallaber: I am slightly puzzled. As NHS Logistics is based in my constituency, I would have known about it if the Government were planning to privatise it. However, the Conservative party publicised the fact that it would privatise the service.

Mr. Baron: There should be no puzzlement on the hon. Lady's part. We have made our position clear. There is no reason why NHS Logistics should be excluded from the bidding process. I am trying to point out that the Government have played politics with the timing of announcements, which a number of hon. Members believe has helped to create uncertainty and a lack of transparency. She has admitted that she was not properly consulted, and she has a number of questions to ask of the Minister. I hope that the Minister takes the opportunity to answer them today.

Mr. Mike Hall: I am listening closely. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that the Government decided to privatise NHS Logistics in 2003, or was it simply the recommendation of the commercial director, which the Secretary of State rejected?

Mr. Baron: In the autumn of 2003, the Department of Health's commercial directorate recommended that the authority's procurement supply chain would be best developed in the private sector. Since then, the review body made its recommendation, but there is strong feeling in my party, and outside this place, that the NHS Logistics Authority was included in the review despite the fact that there had been a strong recommendation to privatise the supply chain.

If I may, I would like to move on because I want to give the Minister some time to respond to all our questions. In addition to the issue of timing, there has been an element of uncertainty with regard to the overall message. For example, in July 2004, the Secretary of State explained that

"the NHS Logistics Authority will be abolished".—[Official Report, 22 July 2004; Vol.424, c. 76 WS.]

However, in November of last year, a Health Minister said:

"no decision has been taken about contracting out".—[Official Report, 4 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 397W.]

Putting the timing to one side, I put it to the Minister that the Government have also played politics with their message about the privatisation. It appears that the Government are pursuing the privatisation of the authority by stealth in order to avoid confrontation.

In the same way as the reforms in the new general medical services contract "Agenda for Change" were introduced, the national programme for IT and now the new general dental services contract are being introduced without the full engagement and involvement of all the affected parties. The Government are privatising NHS Logistics without adequate involvement and consultation of its staff or the relevant Members of Parliament. That can only serve to worsen the morale of the authority's staff, who deserve far better from the Government, particularly bearing in mind the successes they have achieved.

Jonathan Shaw: The hon. Gentleman referred to "Agenda for Change" as not having sufficient consultation. It took four years for 17 different trade unions to arrive at an agreement. It was a brilliant consultation. What does the hon. Gentleman mean?

Mr. Baron: The hon. Gentleman calls it a brilliant consultation, but many bodies involved felt that they had not been adequately consulted. I shall give him one example: the Society of Radiographers staged a picket of Parliament to make the point that it had not been adequately consulted. There were exceptions to that consultation and the hon. Gentleman should take them on board.

Bearing in mind that time is running short and as I would like to give the Minister plenty of time to answer a number of key questions, will she please address the following issues? There has been concern in my party about the actual privatisation. NHS Logistics has achieved valuable efficiency improvements in the NHS supply chain. Its strong and successful brand has encouraged NHS trusts and primary care trusts to use its services more and more, which is to be welcomed. That has further strengthened the integration of the various NHS supply chains and realised further efficiency gains.

The Government must ensure that the independent provider eventually chosen provides a service that is as good as, if not better than, that provided by NHS Logistics. Because of a poor Government track record regarding the designing of contracts involving the private sector, such as those related to the computer system for the Child Support Agency and independent involvement in London Underground, such contracts must be properly crafted. If the outsourcing of NHS Logistics is similarly poorly handled, we may see trusts seeking alternative distributors, the fragmentation of the supply chain and the loss of the efficiency gains achieved in the past few years.

We must not sacrifice the valuable emergency role played by NHS Logistics in order to entice private sector providers to bid for the contract. NHS Logistics provides a 24-hour, 365-day-a-year delivery service, which has been invaluable in building up the authority's reputation as well as helping to safeguard patient care. The authority will also be called on to supply health service consumables in the event of any terrorist or other major incident. The capacity for emergency response must be retained when the supply and distribution work for the NHS is put out to tender.

I also ask the Minister to address the fact that in recent years NHS Logistics has taken on an active role in bringing health care closer to the patient. The authority launched the home delivery service in April 2003, which now caters for more than 1,000 patients. That valuable resource should not be sacrificed simply because a private sector provider does not deem it commercially viable.

Finally, I ask the Minister to ensure that all relevant parties are fully consulted on the privatisation, including the relevant Members of Parliament. To help achieve greater transparency, I suggest to the Minister that there is no reason why NHS Logistics should not be allowed to bid for the contract, bearing in mind its excellent track record of recent years. The Minister should give due consideration to that.

I welcome the Government's apparent commitment to reducing the size and scope of the arm's-length bodies, although they have yet to demonstrate that commitment anywhere but on paper. NHS Logistics is a successful distributor. It has driven wider efficiency improvements across the NHS and its staff must be congratulated on that achievement. Although I believe that it can operate better in partnership with the private sector, the partnership must be carefully crafted for the reasons already given. It must be drawn up to ensure that there is no loss of service or reduction in standard as the provider shifts from the public to the private sector. It must be drawn up with the full involvement of the staff and, I would suggest, other relevant individuals, such as MPs, who have done so much to build a successful organisation. The staff in particular deserve to be consulted on its and their future.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): It is a pleasure to be here this morning. I feared that we would miss the opportunity to debate NHS Logistics, so I was delighted when my hon. Friend the Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber) came into the Chamber. I congratulate her and my hon. Friends the Members for Weaver Vale (Mr. Hall) and for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw) on their speeches. I apologise sincerely to my hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale for the shortness of notice about the visit on Thursday; I shall make sure that that is corrected as soon as the debate is concluded.

I welcome the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) to his position. This is the first chance that we have had to cross arms across the Chamber, but I am sure that there will be many more in future. I look forward to that, particularly if we can conduct business in the constructive style to which we have been treated this morning.

Today's debate is about the market testing of the potential outsourcing of the supply chain and consumables procurement service for the NHS, which involves NHS Logistics. Let me quickly run through the process to date. An outline business case was presented to Ministers in spring 2004 and the usual notice was published and released in August that year to engage the private sector in a procurement process.

I do not quarrel with any of the descriptions that hon. Members have given of the detail of the debate about the ALB review except what the hon. Member for Billericay said. I know my right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid), who was Secretary of State for Health at the time in question, extremely well: he is an extremely complex individual, but not as Machiavellian as the hon. Gentleman suggests. I reject his suggestion that the process was manipulated to the extent that he claims.

Following the pre-qualification process six bidders were originally asked to respond to the invitation to submit an outline proposal. The next step would be to issue an invitation to negotiate. I was invited to take that step, but knew that there was anxiety on the matter; it was for that reason that I met Members of Parliament recently. I hope that this debate will contribute to dispelling some, if not all, the anxiety and to counteracting some of the misinformation, or lack of information, about the process.

Three options are under consideration. The first is what we have been debating today—the option to outsource NHS Logistics only. However, there are two other options. One is to integrate NHS Logistics and the NHS Purchasing and Supply Agency into one organisation; that is the recommendation of the arm's-length bodies review. A third option is to market test the whole supply and procurement chain. We are not considering that option now, but it may be useful to describe it to hon. Members.

Mr. Mike Hall: Will my right hon. Friend, for the sake of clarity, confirm that she said that the recommendation of the arm's-length body review is a merger between NHS Logistics and the NHS Purchasing and Supply Agency?

Jane Kennedy: That, as I understand it, is the recommendation and that is what will happen in April next year if the status quo applies.

The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb), in a typically thoughtful and probing contribution, asked whether the Government were taking a dogmatic view of contracting out and whether we had examples of occasions when we had considered the issues and turned back. I cannot give him examples of recent Department-level decisions because I am not aware of any, but there is the option within trusts of considering market testing, and there are organisations, trusts and hospitals that do not contract out some of their services—some have chosen to do so, but others have not. At Guy's and St. Thomas' across the river, for example, cleaning services are not contracted out. Equally, a hospital in my constituency does not contract out its portering service. We are not considering the issue from the dogmatic point of view that private is best. I hope to address that point in the short time available.

I accept that there are concerns about the impact that the proposals could have on staff and on the continuity and standard of service that the NHS currently enjoys. Since it came into being in 2000, the management team at NHS Logistics has grown the business from £500 million to £700 million-plus per year. It is important to place on the record the fact that NHS Logistics offers the NHS an efficient, one-stop shop for consumables and minimises the effort that trusts have to expend on such orders. Trusts benefit from the fact that NHS Logistics takes care of the ordering process, supplier payment, storage and the receipt and delivery of orders. As a result, those that rely on its services do not need to operate on-site stores to hold large quantities of consumables stock and they enjoy a paperless inventory trail.

One of the key points is that nobody has said that NHS Logistics is not a good business. The crucial point, however, is that the NHS is not realising its full potential. The logistics service must expand and develop to meet the needs of a rapidly changing health service and the vision of a public sector that puts people at its heart. I say that not as a piece of political jargon, but because it is crucial that the whole NHS constantly reviews and examines the way in which it does business. My hon. Friends have acknowledged that.

The NHS must become a service that works with patients to support them and their needs—a truly patient-led service. That must be our focus. Operating and managing a consumables procurement supply chain might deflect effort and resources from that critical agenda—the hon. Member for Northavon was prepared to contemplate the possibility that questions can be raised about that point. We should therefore consider partnering with someone for whom such things are their central focus. We have to take every step to ensure that the greatest percentage of the available budget is directed towards creating a patient-led NHS. By not achieving best value for money through our supply chain service, we are undermining our core mandate.

My hon. Friends have said that they will be less anxious if it can be demonstrated that the proposals offer the best value and are in the best interests of the NHS. Why, in the Government's view, are we not achieving best value? We spend about £15 billion a year on non-pay goods and services. Approximately £3.7 billion is spent on consumables, with only £700 million of that going through NHS Logistics, as we discussed earlier. There is considerable opportunity for expansion and to drive efficiency and savings across the NHS. All that will have a significant impact on front-line delivery. We believe that an independent sector organisation could be best placed to achieve such expansion. Far from driving up costs to the NHS, we seek to widen the benefits. We believe, for example, that we could achieve lower product prices through back-office efficiencies, and that we could provide a greater variety of services to meet different trust requirements.

The introduction of new and innovative technologies could also bring enormous benefits to the NHS. I assure hon. Friends and other hon. Members who have taken part in the debate that none of that would be achieved at the expense of the trusts. Trusts would benefit from significant savings, which could be invested in front-line delivery.

Mr. Baron: The Minister used the word "could" in relation to creating greater efficiencies by involving the private sector. Will she explain why early indications are that she will not allow NHS Logistics to bid for the contract? That seems to be the prevailing thinking at the moment, but if it is not, will she say so?

Jane Kennedy: We discussed that when we met hon. Members who represent constituencies that are affected. The truth is that the management could have responded to the advertisement placed in the Official Journal of the European Union. If the management had submitted a bid at that stage, I understand that they would have had to withdraw from the business in order to create a bid that could compete and that would not be based on the unfair advantage of actually running the business at it stands. I know that that is a convoluted process, but that was the advice as I understand it. Service delivery might have suffered if the management had withdrawn from the day-to-day operation of the business. The management would not have been able to inform or influence the process of developing the contracts and considering whether to move to the stage of inviting organisations to bid. That is as much as I want to say about that at the moment, but I have considered the matter.

I was asked about consulting customers. Customers have been consulted. The trusts that use NHS Logistics and PASA say that they value the service and do not want there to be any deterioration in it. We share that aspiration, and are determined that that will not happen. However, they do want changes in the range of services offered. There were common themes in the trusts' comments to those who organised the consultation. First, the organisers were told:

"they need to manage the whole supply chain".

That might be addressed eventually any way, but another comment was that "they are good at what they do but to me they are box shifters".

Finally, one trust said:

"our service is 24/7, NHS Logistics isn't".

[Jane Kennedy]

It is possible that an independent sector partner would be incentivised to increase the volume and business and to achieve better product prices. That would directly benefit the trusts. I assure hon. Members that one of the driving principles behind the market testing is to protect the continuity and standard of service that the NHS currently enjoys. No decision would be taken that would jeopardise that.

I do not have time to touch on the consultation with Unison, but there are two points to make. My hon. Friend the Member for Weaver Vale asked what we were testing. We are testing the ability of the market to deliver the lower total cost of supplying consumables to the NHS. That would be achieved by a growth in volume, which would deliver lower prices, thereby driving prices down further. That is our objective. We would not be cutting staff numbers if the business were growing; on the contrary, staff numbers would increase.

The commercial directorate in charge of the operation deserves great credit for its work. The supply chain excellence programme, under which the process is being run, is proving to be of real benefit to the health service. It is important for the House to note that the directorate has worked with the NHS procurement and supply agency to achieve an annualised saving that is forecast to be more than £140 million. The process may yet achieve even more savings for the NHS.

Fatherhood and the Care of Children

11 am

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): Thank you for calling me, Mr. Olner. I am delighted that the subject of fatherhood and the care of children has been chosen for debate this morning. I welcome the Minister to her place and look forward to hearing her response.

For me, today has been all about fatherhood. I have just had a meeting with the Nappy Alliance, whose chairperson lives in my constituency, and an esteemed company called Bambino Mio, the UK market leader in reusable nappies, which is based in Brixworth in Kettering. I should like to dedicate the debate to my baby son Thomas, who is just over one year old. I am sure that he would be delighted if he knew that he was appearing in parliamentary records so early. Unfortunately, he cannot be here because he is with his mum, Donna, at the village coffee morning. Both of them send their apologies.

The main themes on which I want to touch are the importance of the contact between fathers and early-years children and of increasing parents' active responsibility for their children's behaviour, and the need for us to do four things: to do more to promote the institution of marriage; to get back to the idea that it is important to be able to afford and provide for a family before becoming parents; to tackle the issue of teenage pregnancy; and to make it easier for fathers to engage in fatherhood.

I started my research by going to the House of Commons Library to look up the dictionary definition of fatherhood. Unfortunately, despite the Library's huge resources, although I could find a definition of father, I could not find one of fatherhood. In my view, paternity—the Hollobone definition of which is the act of fathering a child—is very different from fatherhood, the participatory process of caring for and nurturing one's child or children. Fatherhood has demonstrable benefits. My wife said at the weekend that Thomas behaves differently with me than he does with her. Of course there is a very close bond between mother and child, and the relationship between father and child is different. However, the two together have been for centuries—and, I would suggest, will continue to be—the best way to bring up children.

The Equal Opportunities Commission has published magnificent research into the benefits of fatherhood. One of its recent studies suggested that children whose fathers have been actively involved in their lives do demonstrably better, with higher educational achievements, more satisfactory relationships in adult life and less likelihood of getting into trouble with the police. The EOC goes on to say:

> "Early involvement of father with child is associated with continuing involvement with that child through childhood and adolescence."

A report called "What Good Are Dads?", a review of 20 years of research into fatherhood by Charlie Lewis, professor of psychology at Lancaster university, was published in June 2001 by Fathers Direct. The research showed that involvement of fathers with children aged seven to 11 predicts exam success at 16. If fathers are involved before the age of 11, children are less likely to have a criminal record by the age of 21, and pre-school children who spend more time playing with their dads are often more sociable when they enter nursery school.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): My hon. Friend is speaking about the importance of the relationship between fathers and their children. As a new Member, my experience is that the Child Support Agency is the biggest problem in my surgery every week and in my telephone calls every day. It strikes me that in its present form, the organisation is not helping the father, the mother or the child. It seems actually to develop hatred—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. That intervention is a little too long.

Mr. Bone: I apologise, Mr. Olner. Very briefly, will my hon. Friend give his views on the CSA?

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. Indeed, I planned to come on to the CSA later. Perhaps I could mention at this point that among the top three issues that I as a new Member deal with, letters and correspondence with the CSA on behalf of both mothers and fathers in the Kettering constituency rank number two. I very much share my hon. Friend's concern that the CSA seems to be far more involved with fathers who want to contribute to the welfare of their children but sometimes struggle with resources than it is with fathers who do not want to be responsible for the welfare of their children, who often escape the net.

A huge demographic shift has put pressure on fatherhood. I have some interesting statistics about households in the United Kingdom in 2000 which I hope will prove instructive: 18 per cent. were individuals who lived alone without children, 25 per cent. were couples without children, 58 per cent. were households with children, and 10 per cent. of that 58 per cent. were lone parents. It is now the case that 21 per cent. of all children live in lone-parent families—that is up from 7 per cent. in 1972.

Interestingly, the pressure on fatherhood also shows itself in a trend away from marriage. Compared with just 10 per cent. in the late 1970s, 40 per cent. of births are now registered outside marriage. Of those, 78 per cent. are jointly registered by the mother and father living at the same address. It seems that marriage is under more pressure than fatherhood, but there is a link between the two.

Perhaps of most concern is that the trend away from responsible fatherhood is greatest among teenage parents. Ninety per cent. of births to women under the age of 20 take place outside marriage, and 27 per cent. of those births are sole registrations, compared with just 4 per cent. for mothers who are in their late 30s or early 40s. A concern was raised in the 27 June edition of the Evening Telegraph, which is a highly respected local newspaper in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Bone). It stated that one in every 24 girls aged 15 to 17 gets pregnant. It is worrying that the rate is rising in Kettering, going up from 39 in every 1,000 between 1998 and 2000 to just under 50 in every 1,000 between 2001 and 2003.

The concern is that the younger a father is when his baby is born, the less likely he is to remain in contact. Recent research by Bristol university states that if the mother and father are both 17 or under when their child is born, only 2 per cent. of fathers are involved with the child nine months later. As men's ages rose, so did their involvement. The proportions grow to 43 per cent. for men between 18 and 21, and 100 per cent. for men aged 22 or over. The research goes on to say:

"Teenage pregnancy policy makers take note: doing what we can to support the father-child relationship in teen mother families may be of real value and importance to their children."

The facts about dads today are quite startling. More than a third of all male employees have dependent children and 89 per cent. of fathers are in employment. However, few fathers have part-time jobs. Only 4 per cent. of fathers work part-time, compared with 9 per cent. of men without children, whereas some 60 per cent. of mothers with children work part-time, compared with 32 per cent. of women without children.

The Government have tried to address, in a limited way, the issues of fatherhood, but there is far more to be done. I humbly suggest a number of recommendations that I hope that the Minister might wish to consider. The Government need to recognise the importance of fatherhood far more ostentatiously. The fatherhood quality mark has been produced by organisations such as Fathers Direct, which has an excellent website: www.fathersdirect.com. The quality mark is a new tool for improving outcomes for children by recognising organisations that are father-friendly.

I understand that the Law Commission expects to begin a two-year project to consider the law relating to cohabiting couples, starting this month. I suggest that pressure needs to be applied to the Law Commission to encourage it to consider the role of promoting fatherhood in the context of cohabiting couples.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): There is an important issue involved here. The Office for National Statistics did a report on young offenders and it found that in cohabiting households the rate of disorder among juveniles was as high as in single-parent households and three times higher than in married households. The idea that cohabiting produces the same outcome as marriage is not borne out by the facts. The ONS is hardly an offshoot of The Daily Telegraph. It is a totally independent official organisation, and it is important that the lessons from its report are understood.

Mr. Hollobone: I am grateful for that intervention, and I agree with my hon. Friend 100 per cent. He and I would both agree that the institution of marriage has worked extremely well over the centuries and needs to be promoted far more than it is at the moment. Nevertheless, we need to recognise that there will always be some parents who will not get married. Given that there will be parents who are cohabiting, we should not miss the opportunity offered by the Law Commission report to ensure that effective parenting and fatherhood in the context of cohabiting couples is promoted.

Her Majesty's Government should also look again at the non-registration of fathers' details. In this day and age, when we are all concerned about identity, it is unacceptable for a father's details not to be recorded. Fathers need to be made responsible for their children, and if there is some way in which they can evade their responsibilities, that needs to be addressed.

We have mentioned the Child Support Agency. The Government need to take urgent steps to simplify and reform the way in which the CSA goes about getting support to those children who need it, but they also need to recognise fathers who are responsible about their offspring.

The other day I asked the Solicitor-General a written question about parental responsibility for miscreant children. The reply that I received was illuminating:

"Youth courts . . . have the power to impose parental bindovers on the parents of young people who have been convicted of an offence, but these are rarely used.

Breaches of parenting orders and parental bindovers are the only measures available to the CPS to hold parents accountable for the behaviour of their children."—[Official Report, 4 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 14W.]

One of the major concerns in my constituency is that residents want parents to be held accountable for the behaviour of their children. In part, the answer that I received suggests that the mechanisms in place are not being used as effectively as they might be.

I am grateful for the opportunity to start this debate and look forward to the contributions that hon. Members will make. I close with a call for the Government to do more to recognise the importance of fatherhood, but preferably in the context of the stable, long-standing, effective and traditional institution of marriage, which offers the best prospects for bringing up well-adjusted children.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I remind hon. Members to be reasonably brief so that they can all get in. Several people have written asking to catch my eye and I shall endeavour to call as many as I can. However, I am afraid that unless hon. Members are brief, there will be more speakers than time.

11.16 am

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on securing this important debate.

We use the word "crisis" a lot in this place, in our press releases and in our speeches. Last night we were discussing council tax and the crisis affecting certain income groups, and last week we were discussing the crisis affecting NHS dentistry. All are important issues and certainly worthy of parliamentary time, but this morning we have the opportunity to focus on something that I truly believe is a national crisis. However, it is rarely discussed properly, either because of political correctness, which sucks the very heart and value from any debate on social issues, or because it is so easy to fall back on generalisations and caricatures, stigmatising vulnerable groups or harking back to a bygone age.

We in the UK face a social crisis as a result of the absence of fathers from the lives of hundreds of thousands of children. The absence of fathers from family life is surely the most socially consequential family trend of our era. Some 15 per cent. of babies born at the turn of the millennium now live just with their mothers. Of those, nearly half see their fathers at least once a week, but nearly four in 10 have no contact with their fathers at all.

We see that phenomenon all around us in our constituencies, especially in communities centred on social housing developments. We are familiar, I hope, with the complex and interrelated problems of social exclusion that characterise those communities: poverty, low aspirations, educational failure, truancy, crime—the list goes on. Rarely do we hear discussion in this place about the link between family structure and such outcomes for children and young people, however. The evidence is there, but it is staggering how often people involved in family policy refuse to acknowledge it.

The proportion of children being raised by lone parents has increased by a quarter under this Government—there are now more than 3.2 million of them—and we are in danger of becoming the lone-parent capital of Europe. According to EUROSTAT, lone-parent families make up more than 70 per cent. of households with children—more than in any other country in Europe. That is partly because the absolute number of children living in one-parent families is so large, but also because the birth rate among intact couples has fallen. As a result of those twin developments, the percentage of children living in one-parent households is now much higher in Britain than elsewhere.

It is so easy inadvertently to frame the debate in terms that lay the blame at the door of the single mum, but that is absolutely not the purpose of my speech, or of this debate. One of the Conservative party's great errors of the past 20 years was to view social fragmentation through a lens that saw single mums as the principal problem. To a large extent, the problem is also about men, and about men behaving irresponsibly and fathering children. Often, they too have been brought up in lone-parent homes, with no understanding of what real fatherhood is about, and they then replicate the cycle in the lives of their own children.

There has been a lot of research in recent years about the socio-economic changes affecting the male population in post-industrialised countries. My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) has written at great length about those changes, describing what has happened to the marriageable pool of men. Often in communities there are men whom women will happily sleep with, and have children with, but with whom they would never in their wildest dreams set up home.

Many children living in single-parent homes will eventually end up in step-families. Social parenting, as opposed to biological parenting, is an important new phenomenon in family life. It is essentially about stepfatherhood. More and more men are raising other men's children, while in many cases their own children grow up elsewhere. No fewer than 17 per cent. of dads born in 1970 are stepfathers, nearly double the number among men born just 12 years earlier.

The most rapidly growing family type is the step-family. Since most children remain with their mother following divorce or separation, most step-families have a stepfather rather than a stepmother at their head. Not nearly enough research has been undertaken into the pressures on step-families, especially as the Child Support Agency is often lurking in the background of those families' lives, and payments are being made to the previous partners.

There has been a great deal of research about what social fragmentation means for children and society in general. Although many lone parents and step-parents do a superb job raising their families, the children are at much greater risk of abuse, of neglect and of worse social, educational and health outcomes than children who live with both their natural parents.

The decline of the traditional family unit is harmful to children and to wider society. As an example, I dug out a Home Office report on young people and crime from about 10 years ago. It undertook extensive research into the factors that drive young people to criminality. One conclusion stated:

"For both males and females, those who lived with both natural parents were the least likely ever to start to offend, followed by those living with a lone parent."

Those living with one natural and one step-parent were the most likely to start offending.

A few years ago I paid a visit to Cardiff prison, where I met a group of young men in their late teens and had a discussion with them about their lives. All had had chaotic home lives; all had grown up without the presence of a father; all had failed at school, played truant and committed criminal acts; and a few of them had found themselves in a revolving door situation, in prison for the third or fourth time. Several of those young men had already started to father children, thus repeating the pattern.

Family fragmentation matters. One of the most important factors to understand in this debate, although by no means the most important, is the fiscal framework surrounding the family structure. During the election campaign two months ago, I spoke to one young family at their home in Haverfordwest. They had two young children, the mother stayed at home and did not work, and the father had a modestly paid job earning less than £16,000 a year. They told me that their calculations showed that they would be better off if they divorced and the mother raised their children as a single parent. What a staggering conclusion in this day and age: a family can make that judgment and those calculations, and find that they would be better off splitting up and having the mother raise their children alone.

I have seen research undertaken by people such as Jill Kirby at the Centre for Policy Studies, which claims that the tax and benefit system subsidises marriage break-up. It shows that the average couple family in which one partner has a job is only £1 a week better off than the average workless one-parent family, because lone parents get so much extra support from the state. I do not believe that the perverse incentives created by the tax and benefit system go anywhere near far enough to explain the social trends that we are debating, but they are important factors that Ministers need to address.

One point that I want to draw attention to, which is linked to the main issue, is the wider absence of male role models in the lives of young people, particularly in schools. The General Teaching Council for Wales noted two months ago that there were so few male teachers in Wales that many pupils had gone through their primary years without ever being taught by a man. In primary schools, only 16 per cent. of teachers are men. In secondary schools the figure is 40 per cent. I would welcome the Minister's thoughts on why, despite the campaign by the Teacher Training Agency, the overall percentage of male teachers is falling. It was 28 per cent. last year and it is 27 per cent. this year.

What more can be done to address that problem? In other areas of life we see many examples of positive discrimination to rectify gender or racial imbalances. Should Ministers not be taking a more active approach in this area as well?

We in the House are doing the country a huge disservice when we fail to promote marriage, and fail to tell the truth about how the collapse of family life seems to fuel every social problem, including truancy. This is not about a mission for moral rearmament, and it is certainly not about demonising single mums, the vast majority of whom do a fantastic job. It is simply about recognising that children who grow up with their fathers do far better emotionally, educationally, physically, and in every way that we can measure, than children who do not. That conclusion holds true even when differences of race, class and income are taken into account. The simple truth is that fathers are irreplaceable in shaping the competence and character of their children.

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on introducing the debate, which is of great significance. I, too, must declare an interest. I am a father of five children. To follow my hon. Friend's lead, they are Barnaby, Harriet, Dougal, Dorothy and Noah. Perhaps we should all declare a significant interest—we all want children to get off to the best start and there to be a reduction in the antisocial behaviour that we see in our communities. We all have an interest in trying to ensure the presence of a responsible father in our homes.

I have been a solicitor dealing with criminals for the past 11 years. Yesterday, I handed over my files to my replacement, so I spent some time looking back at old files. I thought about the characteristics of criminal clients. Invariably, they are young men, who show irresponsibility. Often they are drug addicts with learning difficulties and are from homes in which there was a single parent. They invariably had little or no contact with a father and no older male role model.

One such client was my first client at Enfield police station. He was a young man who had previously had high expectations—he had hoped to be a weightlifter for England—but had, sadly, been tempted by drugs. His lack of discipline and respect showed itself in what was the first of many criminal offences. Over the years, he became one of the most prolific offenders in Enfield. It was not uncommon for him to commit 100 burglaries in a week. He has now become my last client. He is in Pentonville serving a stretch of three years for robbery.

During the 11 years that I have known him, there have been periods of stability in his life. I will consider the characteristics of that stability. It has been when, as a father of two young children, he has, for brief times it must be said, showed responsibility. He has then been able to reconnect with society. When he took seriously his responsibility as a father, that connection was made. He suddenly woke up to the fact that he had duties and responsibilities in society. That had a profound effect on him not committing offences. Yes, he was no doubt helped by drug treatment and testing orders and by probation supervision, but of most significance, as he would say himself, was when he faced his responsibilities as a father.

It is that challenge that we need to face. The cost to Enfield of those 100 burglaries a week and the cost to his family and to others have been because of that individual and others like him. The big challenge for such people is to reconnect with society and with being fathers, and to take their responsibilities seriously.

It is significant that when I visited that person in the cells at Enfield magistrates court or at Pentonville he was often distraught or in tears. The bravura of being a prolific offender had peeled off and he was just a young child in many ways. The first thing that he would always say was that he wanted his father and that he wanted his father to show some interest in him. That had a profound effect on him, and it is now showing itself across the generations as he is not taking seriously his responsibilities as a father. We must tackle the issue of fatherhood, not only for his benefit but for that of the community.

Statistics have been produced, which I will not seek to repeat. It is shocking that the rate of lone parenthood in this country is more than double that of our European neighbours. Teenage motherhood and teenage pregnancy rates are rocketing. Enfield has one of the highest rates of teenage pregnancy of any London borough. The challenge, which we need to tackle early, must be to ensure that fatherhood has an important role. Young men should appreciate their responsibilities at an early stage.

Fathers who are on the scene and the time that they spend with children are also important matters. One survey researched a number of fathers, who spent on average three minutes a day with their children. We should compare that with the fact that the same research showed that children spent three hours in front of a television. We have serious problems in our society with the time that fathers take with their children and with fathers being absent from the home.

We should perhaps learn some lessons from America, where there has been a debate about family breakdown. I am sure that we can all agree that family breakdown has dire consequences. The debate on welfare to work has been followed by a number of programmes, aimed at getting lone parents back into the work force. The Government are taking that part of the equation seriously. However, we cannot stop there, and we need to accompany that with the role of fathers. That role is vital, and we need to promote it, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering said. The equation is important. There is an imbalance if we rely on getting people back to work and do not properly value the importance of fatherhood.

We need to wake up effectively to the profound financial and social costs of family breakdown. Disintegration can no longer be tolerated by a responsible Government. Firm action is needed and it has to happen now. Welfare policies have sought to create a habit of getting people back into work. At the same time we need policies that will restore the important role of men in family life. That is important and it needs to accompany any welfare-to-work policies.

We need to examine some radical measures, such as joint registration of births, joint interviews for benefits and encouraging the family and father link in housing. In Enfield, we have been particularly keen to consider the family and generational link for housing preferences. Where the state is involved in funding, we need to be creative and maybe even radical to ensure a role for men in family life and in the important decisions. Whenever welfare is handed out, a contract is involved and that needs to be a proper contract that includes fathers.

The vital challenge that we need to take up is to reconnect fathers to families. The debate is not simply about fathers paying their child support and having supervised contact. That is not good enough. We need to go further. We need to promote and value the role of fatherhood, and to harness and encourage voluntary groups and faith-based organisations that promote fatherhood.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering said, we need to be bold and to recognise that generally, although not exclusively, marriage sustains fatherhood. We should promote and reward those groups that promote not only fatherhood, but, explicitly, marriage. We must support trusts that work hard practically to support and encourage stable and long-lasting marriage, because that is in the interests of fatherhood and children. We therefore need to ensure that all our welfare and family policies promote family, fatherhood and marriage. That is in the best interests of us and our children.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I, too, am delighted to speak in the debate. I shall address my remarks primarily to the Minister because I hope that when she replies she will not approach the debate as though this were an issue of party-political infighting. It is far too serious and important for that. I hope also that we will find some common ground, because this issue is vital to the future of our country. Father absence is the biggest domestic issue that we face in the UK today.

A few days ago, one of our leading building societies released some research saying that many people—more women than men—go on to have new, happy lives after divorcing or splitting up, but that research did not show anything about the effect and impact on children. The data on that are overwhelming: it is all too clear that losing a loving, committed parent from their home is hugely detrimental to children's emotional development and many forms of achievement.

I hope that we can move on from some of the constraints that have made this area a difficult subject for us on both sides of the House. We could all say that many, if not most, single parents deserve medals for what they do. I am a father to three children; my wife and I struggle to get through the week and do all the things that we want to do with our children. How parents—mothers or fathers—cope with that huge work load on their own defies belief. They need support and encouragement, and I would not want anything said in this debate to be seen as an attack on them. I hope that we can take that as common ground, and move on to say that it is hugely in our national interests to encourage and value committed, loving and responsible fatherhood. There are ways in which we can do that.

The Government have made the defeat of child poverty one of their key objectives. That is a noble and worthy aim, and I salute the Government for trying to achieve it, but the Minister will know from her time in the Department for Work and Pensions that 45 per cent. of children who live in poverty live in single-parent homes. The latest figures that I have seen show that a quarter of children in the UK live in single-parent homes. That cohort of children contributes disproportionately to the number of children who live in poverty. I hope that the Minister will ask her colleagues in her Department and her former Department to consider how the encouragement of responsible, committed fatherhood could be a real weapon in the Government's armoury with which to defeat child poverty—an issue that is rightly close to their heart.

What can we do? We can reel off statistics, of which we have heard many this morning. I shall not go through them again, as it would be rather depressing to recite them. In far too many debates we agree that there is a problem. We analyse that problem and spend only the last few minutes coming up with things that we could do about it.

I have a number of suggestions for ways in which we can tackle the problem together. First, I shall take us to America and something that was started there in 1994. I am well aware that American society is very different from that in the UK, and that we cannot simply introduce here things that have worked there. Having said that, an organisation called the National Fatherhood Initiative was set up in America in 1994 by Wade Horn, who is currently an assistant secretary in the Department of Health and Human Services in the American Administration. The organisation changed the culture in several ways.

About 10 years ago, it was possible to go into the pubs and bars of America and find young men leaning against a bar stool bragging about how many illegitimate children they had. That was all right; it was an acceptable form of being macho. In the past 10 years, however, the initiative's campaign has managed to make that less socially acceptable. Of course there are still far too many illegitimate children and father-absent families in America, but the cultural tide has turned. The Minister will know that all Governments need that backing—that groundswell of opinion among the electorate as a whole—in order to make progress in this area.

How did the National Fatherhood Initiative do that in America? It used public service advertising, among other things. I urge the Minister to go back to her Department and consider speaking to our embassy in Washington to ascertain whether it would give serious consideration to the American experience and to see whether there is common ground between us and lessons that we can learn about using public service advertising in the United Kingdom to launch a similar initiative. Perhaps the Minister will comment on that suggestion when she replies.

The second major area that I want the Government to consider is that of community family trusts. Again, those organisations sprung from work in America, but were brought to this country, localised and made to work in the UK. There are many of them in the south-west—Bristol has one—but they have also spread out across the country and can be found in places such as York and elsewhere.

The trusts are charitable organisations that receive some Government funding, some local disorder partnership money and other local authority money. Their focus runs all the way through from primary schools, secondary schools and colleges to workplaces, GPs' surgeries, and registry offices, which hold 62 per cent. of all the marriages that take place in the UK. They provide advice to couples both before they get together and, crucially, afterwards; they do, if one likes, provide aftercare services for couples. We know that the key pressure points in relationships are often when children come along and several years later, and the trusts provide practical and easy-to-understand relationship support. The data from America, which academics at the University of Texas have independently analysed, suggest that the trusts have saved about 33,000 marriages and relationships in the areas that they cover. We could make use of them.

I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) attended the earlier part of the debate. He will know that the Conservative party was committed to providing funding for these organisations. It would not take a massive amount of funding, but I seriously believe that the data and evidence from America, which are available for the Minister to examine, show that these voluntary community-based organisations could be a huge help and could change the culture in this country to ensure that we had much greater couple stability, which is how we will get committed fathers to live in their children's homes and to take an active and continuing interest in their children's lives.

We have heard about the importance of fathers realising their financial responsibility from the moment they father a child all the way through that child's life. I am well aware that mothers are allowed not to register the father's name for understandable reasons, such as fear of domestic violence, which, sadly, is all too often a serious problem in this country, but if young men in particular were aware that they would incur a financial penalty throughout their lives that they would not be able to evade, that would make them think seriously before they fathered children and then cleared off, leaving the mother to cope on her own, and the state and the community to pick up the pieces.

A few weeks ago, when there was a certain amount of press attention on the family that had pregnant 12-year-old, 14-year-old and 16-year-old daughters, I was pleased to see that some of that attention was directed not at the significance of the three pregnant young women, but at that of the three people missing from the picture. The thing that struck me about the photograph of the family was: where were the fathers? It was not the three mothers and the three children who were significant; it was the three absent fathers. My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey Heath (Michael Gove) focused on that in a piece that he wrote in The Times, and he was right to do so.

[Andrew Selous]

Having been a Minister in the Department for Work and Pensions, the Minister will know of the concerns about our benefits structure, and the fact that, at times, it appears to give couples financial disincentives to stay together. Single parents incur greater costs for the simple reason that there is only one of them to provide child care. However, I would ask the Minister to go back to colleagues in her old Department and to seek a rigorous audit, perhaps with independent outside help—many independent commentators who are former tax inspectors, and others with no political axe to grind, have concerns in that area. I am sure that it is not the intention of the Minister or her Department that many couples, now referred to as LATs—living apart together—live in separate households in order to receive increased benefits and tax credits. That is not healthy for children and it puts extra pressure on housing space, which is in short supply in many parts of the United Kingdom.

Finally, all the evidence is that fathers actively want to be physically involved with their children—to spend time with them and to perform routine tasks with them week by week—and that is something that mothers would welcome. We have to look more imaginatively at flexible working. That is a difficult thing for MPs to talk about; we are, by definition, extremely bad role models as parents because of the nature of our job and the hours that we work. No doubt that is true of many other people who work long hours. Anything that we can do in that area will be extremely worth while.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): I am genuinely grateful to the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) for having raised the important subject of fatherhood and the father's role in child care. I very much agree with the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) that there is a need for nationwide consensus on the matter.

My approach is a little different from that of the Conservatives. I shall discuss some other mechanisms through which we can support the principles of fatherhood. I shall not list my children's names, but I, too, must declare an interest, albeit a rather limited one in recent weeks. Most hon. Members would agree that our society is witnessing a trend towards a better work-life balance and, in parallel, a desire on the part of fathers to be more involved in the lives of their children. I welcome that trend—the time that young children spend with their parents has increased from perhaps 15 minutes a day in the 1970s to some two hours a day in the 1990s. With my background in primary education, I believe that fathers and male role models generally have much to contribute to a child's development and sense of security.

Although I endorse what the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire said, his statistics are wrong: the Welsh teaching profession is down one male since my election to this place. There is a need to attract more men into primary education and into child care in general. Given the Government's acknowledgement of the need to recruit 160,000 people to work in child care by 2008, can the Minister tell us what plans there are to attract men to work in that sector? The positive role that men can play is another reason why we should attract more men into education, an area traditionally dominated by women. I was often told that, as a man, I would have no problem getting a job in a school, and that proved to be the case, although I must confess that the shortlist was not particularly big.

Today, however, we are exploring the move towards active fatherhood and the mechanisms to bring it about. Some are already in place, but others are non-existent or need to be developed more fully. Notwithstanding what has been said about statistics, the Equal Opportunities Commission has produced optimistic figures suggesting that 80 per cent. of fathers and 85 per cent. of mothers agree that employees should be able to balance their work and family lives. A high number of employers—62 per cent.—also recognise that, signalling their commitment in principle. Most importantly, however, 79 per cent. of men want to spend more time with their children. That is progress, and I welcome it. There is a drift towards parenting as a principle as well as a practice, and towards giving parenting the respect that it deserves.

The influence of parenting is visible in many ways. Given my background in schools, I have no doubt that proper parenting gives rise to the behaviour that we expect in our schools, in adolescence and beyond, and the links between bad parenting and crime are well established. Notwithstanding the fact that the definition of the family in Britain is far wider than it used to be and there is no longer a universal structure, I have no doubt that the male role model is important.

It would be churlish not to applaud parts of the Employment Act 2002, which I am sure the Minister will mention, but there are still issues that make it difficult for men to assume a greater role in their children's lives and therefore in their care. Men are generally the higher earners, and when the father earns more than the mother the family decision that the father will continue to work full-time is inevitable. Generally, it is still the mother who has to alter her working pattern or face the pressure of work and a family career. Continuing to address the gender pay gap will do much to counter the traditional gender roles of father as breadwinner and mother as carer and to promote equality of opportunity in the caring role.

One concern is that employees—both men and women—are unaware of the proactive mechanisms in place to promote family-friendly policies, because these have not been communicated effectively. Such mechanisms include the opportunities for flexitime, a shorter working week and the capacity to work from home. Although the number of flexible working requests that have been declined has fallen, I should like to ask the Minister why only 58 per cent. of parents with children under six are aware of the new flexible arrangements.

I mentioned that the role of either parent may not necessarily be positive, and there are often tugs of war with the child in the middle. In such cases, there should not be a presumption in favour of equal parenting. We are not parents as of right. I prefer a child-centred approach. Where there are challenges in terms of the care role, the child's interests are paramount. I would strive for a blend of parental involvement that recognises the role of fathers and mothers, but best benefits the child.

On access rights, I start from the principle of equality of access, but not necessarily equality of time, because I have seen the ramifications of that all too often in my classroom. It is important that children have opportunities for good-quality contact time with both parents, but we need to pay attention to the potential for mental or physical abuse. We should not underestimate parents' capacity for mental abuse. Decent child care centres are needed, and that is an issue of some concern in the Cardigan women's refuge in my constituency.

Laudably, the Equal Opportunities Commission has called for shared parental leave rights in the second six months of a child's life, whether or not the mother was working before the birth, to give both parents an equal opportunity to bring up the child, rather than simply transferring parental leave to their partner after six months, as the Government suggest. I would be interested to hear the Minister's views on the issue and I hope that it will be considered seriously in the Government review of leave policy in 2006.

Notwithstanding what many hon. Members have said about the changing dynamics of family, which are having an important effect on society, there is recognition that fathers want to play a greater role in their children's lives. That is a step forward.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): I can call Mr. Binley and Mr. Hurd to speak if they are very brief.

11.55 am

Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Olner. I apologise for not letting you know earlier that I wanted to speak and am grateful to you for calling me.

In my maiden speech in the House, I talked about a dear friend of mine who was the Labour agent in Kidderminster when I was the Conservative agent. I said that when we cast aside our political differences, we were surprised by how much we agreed on and how much work we could do together. It is in that spirit that I make my contribution today, because there is much that we can do together. If the Minister sees this as a political attack requiring a political defence, we shall fail, but I am sure that she does not, and that encourages me.

I shall concentrate on the impact of the absence of a permanent male role model, commonly called a father, in family life, particularly the way it affects the education of boys aged 12 to 14. Some 50 per cent. of boys brought up in two-parent families have the chance to achieve meaningful educational qualifications, but, sadly, only 30 per cent. of boys from homes in which one parent—overwhelmingly the mother—has played almost the sole parental role have a chance to achieve the same. That is a massive difference of 40 per cent. If anything shows the import of male role models in parenting, it must be that.

I have discussed the matter with teachers in upper schools in Northampton, and it is clear that boys brought up in homes without a permanent male parent are more likely to reject the benefits of education when aged 12 to 14, seeing it as a waste of time in many respects. Teachers think that, sadly, the interest of such boys is consistently more turned off than that of the majority of young men from homes with a permanent male role model. Equally importantly, such boys are also much more likely to reject authority because, in a way, they see having authority as a male activity. It is not difficult to see how important that is in other aspects of life as they proceed through their lives.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) said that fatherhood is the participating process of nurturing and progressing the life of a child. There is support for that in the 2000 Ofsted report, which said that "there is a disturbing absence of men involved in family learning."

That is the point from which I start: the life chances of a child are created through the learning process, particularly our education process in this country. It is clear from all the evidence that when fathers are involved in their children's learning, those children's exam results and school behaviour improve, they exhibit less criminal behaviour later on, and they have better relationships in their adult lives. I did not say that—

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. On that positive note, I invite the hon. Gentleman to wind up his speech so that his colleague can speak.

Mr. Binley: I apologise, Mr. Olner. I shall do as you suggest.

To conclude, I return to my opening remarks. I said that I hope we can work together. We have heard many creative ideas today. I believe that we should create a culture of change. We should start a crusade by working together. I hope that the Minister will take that on board.

12 noon

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): I am grateful to you, Mr. Olner, for squeezing me in. This important debate goes to the heart of a growing concern in my constituency about the perceived breakdown in the values that once bound the community together—respect for the law, respect for property and respect for each other.

A growing voice has linked that breakdown with the way in which children are being brought up today. It is not just the voice of nostalgia for a golden age of parenthood that probably never existed. I have spoken with senior London policemen who have to deal with the fact that 40 per cent. of street crime in London is committed by 10 to 16-year-olds playing truant. I have spoken with the headmasters of secondary schools who often find parents who obstruct rather than support their efforts to instil more discipline in their schools. A growing body of research summarises the evidence of family breakdown in Britain and its harmful impact on children.

It is striking how out on a limb we are. Britain is the divorce capital of Europe, with 25 per cent. of children living in lone-parent households. That is twice the European average as measured by EUROSTAT, and the trend shows no sign of slowing. The Government's approach has been to respect personal freedom and to help those facing the challenge of bringing up children on their own in conditions of poverty by providing them with support. Those good intentions are to be supported—they are thoroughly respectable—but I would argue that they have unintended but damaging consequences.

[Mr. Nick Hurd]

I would like to pick up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb), which is that the tax and benefits system now discourages low-earning parents from forming two-parent families. That message comes through strongly in research from a wide range of organisations, including Civitas, Care, the Institute for Fiscal Studies, the Joseph Rowntree Foundation and the Centre for Policy Studies. It is the inevitable outcome of a system in which income tax is based on individual assessment, with no allowances for marriage, and benefits are based on a joint assessment; arguably, penalties for marriage are built in to the system.

If that is true, Government policy may be helping to increase the number of children being raised without a father in the home, despite increasingly clear evidence that there is a link between marriage or stable cohabitation and a better outcome for children in terms of health, performance at school and crime. That being so, is it not time to confront the awkward truth that children growing up outside the family unit do not have equality of opportunity? Is it not time to re-examine where the interests of children lie and ask whether it can be in their interests to penalise couples and subsidise lone parents? Faced with the growing tension between the need to respect personal freedom and the desire to give children the best possible chance, I argue that the Government should at least be neutral in the signals that they send via the tax and benefits system.

I was canvassing on an estate in Ruislip during the general election when I was pursued down the street by a young man in a dressing gown. He wanted to tell me that his decision to marry his girlfriend would cost him £400 in lost benefit. He was going to do it anyway, because he thought that it was the right thing to do, but he wanted to know whether it was wrong for the Government to be sending that signal to young people. I said yes, and I would be interested to hear the Minister's response.

12.4 pm

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone); our debate has raised many interesting issues. I stand here with some trepidation, in view of the line-up of hon. Members behind me. I am a mother, and to protect myself from further comments, I can tell the House that I have been married for more than 35 years. I also declare an interest in that I am a trustee of Poole community family trust. I share many of the enthusiasms of the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), and his interest in the topic. Of course, the trust receives Government money.

I was slightly disheartened when I first saw the title of this debate, because I always think that we should put children first, and I thought that the title should be "Children and the Role of Parents". However, many hon. Members have addressed that point. It is clear that childhood, and therefore parenting, are increasingly complex in today's society. We have to understand the needs and rights of parents of both sexes, and of children, in the context of the economic and social environment in which we live.

We are getting it wrong in so many ways. I would like to add just one more statistic: ChildLine reports that 1,500 suicidal children phone its helpline every year, often citing problems of abuse, neglect and low self esteem that build up during childhood. We have a lot to answer for.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) made some particularly interesting contributions about work-life balance. Most people would agree that ideally, caring roles should be shared by women and men, with support from employers. Interestingly, that probably does not mean a 50:50 split, although we hear a lot about 50:50 splits in the debate on child contact. That is a sad reflection on the number of hours that our fathers work—the longest hours in Europe. One in eight fathers work excessively long hours—60 or more a week. That does not give much chance, or time in the day, for the development of fatherhood. Even so, overall, fathers' time spent with their children accounts for one third of total parental care time. On that basis, we have to value the contribution of fatherhood to caring for children.

We have mentioned the need for flexible working time, and we need to be concerned about the lack of opportunity for flexible working practices and the lack of take-up by fathers. When fathers have been actively involved in their children's lives, the children have better outcomes. We have heard about a number of such outcomes today.

Fathers often face the conflict of being both a parent and, frequently, the main breadwinner. What can we do in terms of maternity and paternity leave—paid and unpaid—and flexible working time? We need to applaud the Government for making a move. From April 2003 there has been a fortnight's sort-of paid leave, although there is not very much pay, which is not a great incentive. Indeed, where not enough money is paid, it might even be a disincentive for fathers.

It is clearly an advantage to have the father around during those all-important early years. What more can we do? I look forward to the new measures that the Government will announce shortly. I also agree with some comments about encouraging active fatherhood; I am not sure that I agree with all the ways of encouraging it, but the principle is sound.

I would like to touch briefly on the importance of family support mechanisms. With changing structures in society, support mechanisms have become much more important. Being a parent is probably the most important job that we can ever take on in life, yet most of us have no training whatever. Parental training should not be seen as something to be scorned, but should be available for everybody; it should be seen as the thing to do, rather than as the result of some failure.

To return to relationships, which I care so much about, I am sure that we can do much more pre marriage, pre relationship and post relationship, particularly in schools. We could start at the age of five, and have a curriculum that embraced the importance of relationships. In the other place the other day, Lord Northbourne suggested that "children should be learning from appropriately trained teachers interpersonal skills appropriate to their age—communication skills, emotional literacy, how to form and sustain good relationships with peers and adults and how to discuss and negotiate without anger."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 29 June 2005; Vol. 673, c. 276.]

There is so much scope there. Without being preachy about the situation, we can actually improve the family's chances and the children's life chances within that.

As far as fathers are concerned, I am particularly keen on early bonding. That is happening in some places, and the early and prenatal involvement of fathers is all-important. Once that bond was formed, it would be likely to continue on in life, and perhaps we would not have so many disputes over child contact.

Important scientific evidence is also emerging that without a strong bond with at least one adult, a baby is likely to suffer brain damage, which can lead to all sorts of antisocial behaviour. We need to study the first six months closely; we need to think about the child and both parents. That is critical to later life. I also endorse the point about the male role model in school. My perception is that things are changing. However, for a long time there was a noticeable absence in primary schools, which was significant.

Before I finish, I want to mention the Child Support Agency, with all the mistakes that are made, and the other issues involved, as a clear example of not putting children first. We must also be mindful of domestic violence. We must ensure that women—or men, if that is appropriate—and most of all children, are protected.

Many of us are exhausted from the long hours that we work, and perhaps we do not take enough time out to think about what we do. We need to love and care for our children and value their great achievements. We must appreciate that we bring precious beings into the world, and that they should come first.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): We have had an excellent debate, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on securing it. This is the first time that this subject has been tackled in the Chamber in all my years in the House. It is an enormous subject.

When we talk about fathers in the media and politics, it tends to be in negative terms—what Fathers4Justice and "Superman" may have been getting up to, and problems with the Child Support Agency and errant fathers. However, there are an awful lot of positives, too, and some have been mentioned by my hon. Friends today. Certainly, lack of involvement by fathers has been and is still the cause of enormous social fragmentation, as my hon. Friends the Members for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb), for Northampton, South (Mr. Binley) and for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd) have said.

I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate. I find it extraordinary, particularly given the strong interest that the hon. Members here have shown, that not a single Labour Back Bencher has contributed to a debate on a subject that covers a multitude of matters of direct and key relevance to many of our constituents. That is a cause of great sadness.

Many organisations, particularly in the voluntary sector, are contributing to the debate about how we can be better fathers. Fathers Direct has been mentioned several times, and it produces excellent publications, among which "Working with Fathers: A Guide" is worthy of a mention.

It is worth contemplating some of the changing social patterns that mean that fathers spend more time with their children than they ever used to. Despite some of the assumptions rightly made by the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) about the pressure of work, parents in general now spend four times as long on child care as they did 40 years ago. Interestingly, men now spend eight times as long with their children as they did then. There has been a drastic change between the amount of time that my father would have been expected to spend with me in the early 1960s and the amount of time that I might be expected to spend with my children now. As hon. Members have said, however, Members of Parliament are perhaps not the best role models in the matter of finding quality time for bonding with children.

Things are getting better. Almost eight out of 10 working fathers in a survey revealed that they would be happy to stay at home and look after their baby, while almost nine out of 10 felt as confident as their partner—hopefully their wife, in many cases—about caring for children. In families where women work, fathers now carry out one third of the parental care. "Househusband" is no longer a demeaning term, but a real qualification for many people. In 24 per cent. of families with two parents, the father carried out most of the child care on one of the two days monitored for the time use and child care survey.

There have been changes in employment practices, too. Two in 10 new fathers made work pattern adjustments at the time of the birth, including one in 10 who reduced their working hours and 4 per cent. who took advantage of flexitime. That is a message that needs to go out to employers. Flexibility in work patterns for both parents can lead to better employees. It is in the interests of everybody to help to achieve that. British Telecom is piloting a flexible working scheme from which it is seeing benefits for its work, not just benefits in social conditions for families. So there is a mutual interest.

According to Lisa Harker of Children Now, British fathers have yet to match the level of family involvement of the Aka pygmies, a hunter-gatherer tribe from northern Congo in central Africa. Those fathers are branded the best dads in the world by Fathers Direct. Aka pygmy fathers spend 47 per cent. of their time in close contact with their infants, even letting them suck their nipples. So in this country, we still have a long way to go.

However, cultural changes and developments in Britain in the last half century have produced a generation of fathers who are more eager than ever to play a central role in the daily lives of their children. The Government should be conscious not to put any unnecessary obstacles in the way of fathers who want to engage with their children. Too often, the stereotyping in many Government publications—good publications on Sure Start and the child care work force, for example—still concentrates on women and their role. Not enough is being done to promote the role of fathers.

We also know that there is a distinct lack of men in the child care work force. I do not see enough being done about that problem. My hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire and the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mark Williams) both mentioned it, particularly in the context of teaching. When I go round primary schools, it is rare to see a male teacher—and if I do, it is usually the head. I was at a primary school in my constituency last week and I was absolutely gobsmacked to see a male classroom assistant. He was the first one I have ever seen, and he was doing a fantastic job.

Despite everything that the Government do, I still have concerns. They do many good things, such as promoting the child care work force, extended schools and the greater roles that professionals play—but we must not forget parents. The people who know best about bringing up children are, in 99.9 per cent. of cases, the parents of those children. Please let us not create a professional work force that looks to usurp the role of parents, but create one that complements and works with both parents, wherever possible, so that love, affection and attachment to the child are present in the home 24 hours a day.

We know of the problems when fathers are not properly involved. Children without fathers are more likely to live in poverty and deprivation. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) said that 45 per cent. of children in poverty were in single parent households. Such children have more trouble in school. Forty nine per cent. of prisoners have been excluded from school. Non-father families have a higher risk of health problems, and children in them are at greater risk of suffering physical, emotional and sexual abuse. They are more likely to run away from home, more likely to experience sexual health problems and more likely to become teenage parents. As my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) rightly pointed out, they are also more likely to offend. Of those convicted of an offence by the age of 32, some 59 per cent. are the sons of a convicted parent.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a consequence of this issue? Apart from the personal anguish that it causes, there is a cost to the nation—

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): Order. Can we make interventions short, please?

Mr. Howarth: I was planning to make my intervention short, Mr. Hood.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): I want them to be shorter than that.

Tim Loughton: I think that my hon. Friend was going to talk about the cost of the break-up of those families. It is not just a personal cost, but a financial cost, because the state must step in.

Mr. Howarth: I just wanted to remind my hon. Friend that I produced a report five years ago that pointed out that the cost of family breakdown in this country is £30,000 million—one third of what we spend on education.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): Order. I ask the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) to wind up now, to allow the Minister time to respond to the debate.

Tim Loughton: I certainly will, Mr. Hood. My hon. Friend's report was very fine.

The Government face big challenges, such as the imbalances in maternity and paternity leave and in the work force. Women and girls are invariably the targets for family and children's services. Men need to be included much more. The housing and benefits system so neglects the needs of non-resident parents that many children spend at least part of their week in abject poverty and poor accommodation with fathers whose parental responsibilities are invisible to the welfare system. There is over-reliance on training women, as opposed to men, in child care and we need to promote the merits of good fatherhood, rather than putting barriers up to it. We have heard many good solutions, and I hope that the Government will take them on board.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Hollobone) on securing the debate. It has clearly evoked a lot of interest—particularly, I must admit, in his party. None the less it is a subject that matters to people from all parties, whether they are here today or not. I know from my postbag that it matters a great deal in any constituency. In dealing with their constituency case loads, all Member will recognise the issues and concerns that have been raised today by Opposition Members.

I concur with the point, which was the point of the entire debate, that the contribution of fathers to bringing up their children matters a great deal. There will be no disagreement in any part of the House, or in this Chamber, about that. I had not realised that there were quite so many nappies in Kettering, but one learns something every day. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's interest in this matter comes not only from his own recent fatherhood, which is bound to make one think about such issues very deeply, but from the fact that he has organisations that deal with nappies in his constituency. It is important to tie in the bringing up of children with good environmentally friendly policies—a double whammy—and I am sure that he will learn a lot from the local organisations to which he referred.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of points, which I shall take some time to deal with. Despite the protection that you offered me, Mr. Hood, I do not have enough time left to deal with all the points. If I miss out points that Opposition Members specifically wanted answers to, I will contact them by correspondence after the debate.

A number of themes came through. We can agree about the importance of fatherhood in bringing up children, and we all agree that fathers should be as involved in bringing up their children as mothers are. That is not a controversial thing to say; we know that many fathers do just that. Many hon. Members know that from personal experience and have referred to it in a wide context.

We are not saying that there is a problem with men, or with men who happen to be fathers. We know that many fathers do an excellent job and have well-adjusted children and happy families as a result. As Members of Parliament we tend to come across issues and problems, so perhaps it is natural that we should concentrate on situations where things do not turn out quite so well, but that does not take away the fact that in many instances there are no problems with fathers or families.

The hon. Member for Kettering said that fatherhood was different from paternity, and I understood what he meant. He is right: we need to ensure that young men who become fathers do not see involvement in their children's life as something that they should not aspire to or something that is nothing to do with them. They should see it as part of their responsibility and part of what life is about when one has children. We must ensure that we encourage that, particularly where there are problems.

Opposition Members mentioned particular areas and factors that they felt made matters worse, and the Government can intervene to ensure that we do the best possible job in deprived areas to give children a proper chance in life. We are committed through the local Sure Start programmes to focus on deprived areas to ensure that children there have the best possible start in life. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of that because he has a Sure Start local centre in his constituency, based on the Grange school main site, which I am sure he knows very well. That local programme, which is doing very well, already has a fathers group. It is important that Sure Start does not forget fathers where it is up and running and spending significant resources to tackle issues. It should not assume that it should be dealing only with mothers. The best such programmes already realise that and are active in that regard. When I visit Sure Start local centres, I do not find that they are designed just for mothers.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) and many Opposition Members, some of whom have had experience as teachers and may perhaps been active in teaching until recently, expressed some concern about the lack of male role models. That theme came through in several speeches, and questions were asked about precisely what we are doing to tackle the problem. The hon. Lady said that as far as she was aware, things were getting better. That is right, and we are working with the Teacher Training Agency to try to recruit more male teachers, in primary schools in particular, to provide the role models that hon. Members have been calling for.

The agency provides support services and holds events to encourage men into teaching. I suppose that for many men an overwhelmingly female work force is quite a barrier to venturing into teaching. The issue is not just about the fact that men might not want to be teachers, it is about how welcome they feel when entering an environment overwhelmingly composed of the opposite gender. That is not easy on either side.

We are having some success. Support and advice are available for individuals when applying for training, there are events in schools to attract men to the profession, and there are wider opportunities. We can only keep trying and hoping that we will succeed. We do not consider the increasing emphasis on the professionalisation of the child care work force to be a substitute for good parenting, as the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) feared. It is an important part of our plans to improve the skills and the esteem of the child care work force, so that it will prove more attractive to men, and I hope that that will have a real impact.

Several Opposition Members, including the hon. Members for Kettering and for East Worthing and Shoreham, referred to Fathers Direct. In the Department for Education and Skills we work directly with that organisation. It has a great deal of contact with us, and we involve it in our work. In particular, there was ministerial attendance at its conference in April—although that was before my time in this job. I was interested to hear about the fatherhood quality mark, and I shall have to look into it, because I do not know much about it. I quite like the idea that it can offer something positive. Further, the organisation's chief executive, Duncan Fisher, is on one of our ad hoc groups, advising us on parental support and the development of our strategy for supporting parents.

We see the importance of involving the organisations set up to represent fathers and fatherhood, and we do not try to put them to one side simply because some groups of fathers, to which the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham referred, have undertaken high-profile stunts. It is regrettable that the more positive examples of activism are ignored.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Before the Minister finishes, will she respond to some of the calls from the Opposition for the Government to do much more to promote marriage?

Maria Eagle: The Government have acknowledged, and continue to acknowledge, that in terms of stability and good outcomes, marriage is one of the structures in which children can best be brought up. However, we do not purport to tell people how they should live their lives, and we have to deal with family structures as they are. I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that we shall not promote one type of family structure as opposed to another. We must deal with people and families as we find them, and we must try to ensure that whatever structure children are brought up in, they have the best possible chance in life. In 97 per cent. of cohabiting couples, the father registers the birth of the child with the mother. We should not be prescriptive about precisely what the best structure is.

Mr. Howarth: That is not what you said in your document.

Maria Eagle: We acknowledge, and always have acknowledged, that for bringing up and supporting happy and well-balanced children, the institution of marriage clearly works—

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): Order. It is time for the next debate.

Iraq (Debt)

12.30 pm

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I thank Mr. Speaker for granting me this Adjournment debate on the Paris club arrangements for Iraq's debt. It is a good time for the debate, with the G8 leaders meeting this week, although they will focus on Africa. I support the Government's aid, trade and debt relief programme to make poverty history on that continent, but the United Kingdom and, of course, the United States of America have an even more direct responsibility in Iraq. The sanctions and the war and its aftermath have deeply impoverished that country, and it is still on the way down.

Several of the G8 countries were keen to ply Saddam Hussein with loans to fund his military machine to fight Islamicists in Iran. Until the invasion of Kuwait, they did not mind the weapons being turned on his own people. The UK gave loans for arms sales and, despite all the subsequent events—despite Saddam Hussein being vanquished—has not given up on retrieving that money. Many other states and private creditors who funded him have hung around as vultures in the same way.

I express concern that the G8 leaders will not get to grips with Iraq's economic and debt crisis and will take the opportunity to shirk their responsibilities under the cloak of the Africa agenda. They may also pretend that the Paris club decision of last November has set the framework to meet those responsibilities and put Iraq on a sound footing. It has done no such thing. The headline figure was 80 per cent. debt relief, but that disguised much. First, the debt is hugely overblown by interest and arrears. Secondly, it takes no account of the massive ongoing reparation payments required by the United Nations Compensation Commission. Thirdly, there is debt owed to non-Paris club nations, which show no willingness to write it off. The same is the case with private creditors, to whom a large amount is owed. Put simply, the 80 per cent. does not cover the full $130 billion of Saddam-era debt. Furthermore, the Paris club relief, which will take place only in phases—over which time more interest will accrue—is highly conditional. After all that, Iraq would still be left with a debt and liabilities burden that would take half a century to pay off.

Set against the priority of paying off Saddam's debts is Iraq's enormous social crisis. We are talking about the doubling of child malnutrition and the deterioration of health and education provision and, indeed, of the country's vital infrastructure. The debt hampers—that is too kind a word—any Iraqi Administration's ability to tackle those problems. That adds fuel to the poor security situation and leaves a burning resentment among Iraqis who are ill-treated and robbed of their resources.

My hon. Friend the Minister will gather that I do not consider the Paris club deal agreed by his predecessor to be anything to proclaim. The morning after the debt package was announced, Saad Salih Jabr, the chairman of the Iraqi National Assembly's economic committee said in the Assembly:

"You heard yesterday's news. The world's media is marketing this as the deal of a lifetime. It is not. This is yet another crime committed against the Iraqi people."

He was taking into account the factors that I have mentioned. The Foreign Minister, Hoshyar Zebari, said the reduction should have been higher

"because the Iraqi people are not responsible for the aggressive policies and misuse of funds of the former regime."

Jubilee Iraq, which has campaigned on the issue and to which I pay tribute, stated that the Paris club's offer

"is inadequate on economic grounds alone. Assuming all other creditors agree to the 80 percent, which is far from certain, Iraq would still be shackled with over $25 billion of debt, on top of more than $31 billion in war reparations and new loans from the IMF, World Bank, and others. This compares with Iraq's meagre health budget this year of only $947 million and education budget of $544 million."

The IMF is imposing conditions that are draconian and bullying, and it is neglecting the social consequences. The conditions include privatisation and foreign ownership, the end of food rations and fuel subsidies, and restrictions on salaries and pensions. What a time to do that, when unemployment is so high, malnutrition rising, fuel shortages considerable and many Iraqi families increasingly vulnerable.

But the policy is even worse than that. It takes control over the economic situation away from any democratically elected Iraqi leadership. The Financial Times stated:

"Now from the very first day that the new Iraqi parliament sits it will find virtually every important economic decision predetermined by the coterie of rich countries that runs the IMF."

Naomi Klein, the author of "No Logo", stated in The Big Issue in December last year:

"We don't know what Iraq should look like—that's up to the Iraqi people—but we do know what the preconditions for genuine democracy are: being free of the debt of your dictator and your occupier, being free of laws written by your occupier, being in control over your oil money and resources, and not being run by foreign corporations."

The Paris club has spurned that consideration.

The IMF is due to announce its stand-by agreement for Iraq soon. The agreement is required by the Paris club as a condition for debt relief. It should give details of the economic structural adjustment policies that are required. Can the Minister tell us what it contains and indicate the UK Government's position? For example, did they support the wholesale privatisation package?

The reparations bill, which was not taken into account by the Paris club, is gross. About two thirds of the claims have been settled at $46 billion, of which $19 billion has been paid from the oil for food fund. Five per cent. of Iraq's oil revenue is still used for reparations, even after the end of the oil for food programme. There was the irony of the UN calling for $259 million to meet a shortfall in humanitarian relief while its compensation commission simultaneously announced that it would take a further $600 million from Iraq this year.

Since the fall of Saddam, Iraq has paid more than $2 billion of reparations, much more than it has been able to spend on health care. Not reported in this country was the two-week fast outside the meeting of the United Nations Competitions Commission in Geneva recently to demand an end to unjust payments. One of the fasters, an Irishwoman named Caomihe Butterly, stated:

"We travelled to Geneva to fast, to go without food for 16 days, in the hopes that our small sacrifice would in some manner awaken the conscience of the international community to the economic warfare being waged against the Iraqi people . . . The Iraqi people had no choice when Saddam Hussein's regime invaded Kuwait. He was wrong to do so. It is equally wrong to continue to punish the Iraqi people for the crimes of Saddam Hussein."

I pay tribute to those protestors.

Then there is the odiousness of the debt, which consists of the personal debts of a particular regime, in this case Saddam's. There is legal precedent for debts to be classified in that way. They were contracted without the consent of the people, and the money was not spent in their interests. There was enough criticism of the regime over the years to ensure that all the creditors were well aware of what was being done with the loans that they provided. They bankrolled the regime's bullets, but now refuse to accept the consequences regarding the nature of the debt. Applying the odious debt law would send a clear message to those who would loan to dictators. George Soros has said that "it would send a signal to the financial markets that it's dangerous to deal with oppressive regimes".

The law should apply.

The Minister should not pray in aid the 2003 Madrid conference, at which aid promises for Iraq were made, as an excuse for there not being a full debt write-off. Few of the countries that attended that conference fully honoured their promises. In fact, the US led the backsliding by diverting funds promised for reconstruction to war fighting. All sorts of conditions have been added that have effectively halted allocations.

Another quirk of the Paris club debt relief is the fact that it has been classified in Treasury accounts as overseas development aid. So, there we have it: loans for the sale of guns to the dictator Saddam Hussein end up in UK accounts as development aid. That is quirky indeed.

Let me treat the Minister to four quotes from Americans whom I would not normally quote. The first is John Snow, the US Treasury Secretary, who said that "the people of Iraq shouldn't be saddled with those debts incurred through the regime of the dictator".

Right-wing Republican Richard Perle said:

"If you loan to a dictatorship, don't expect to be repaid if a democracy emerges."

Paul Bremer, the former US supremo in Iraq, said that the debt is a result of

"Saddam's incompetence and aggressive wars", and that mountains of unpayable debt contributed heavily to the instability that paved Hitler's path to power.

Finally, a US commanding General observed that last autumn there were up to 160 attacks a week in Sadr City, which is on the outskirts of Baghdad, but that in early 2005, the number levelled at less than five to zero a week. His point was that the key factor in that change was not winning battles, but cleaning the place up and restoring electricity, sewerage and water. They fought, but when they started delivering services that Iraqis in Sadr City had never had, the terrorist recruiting of 15 and 16-year-olds came up empty. The debt impedes the real way to achieve security.

I have one final quote from a source whom I cannot disclose. In his e-mail to me from Iraq, he said:

"Last week . . . in Baghdad . . . I met a drunken American gentleman at a party who told me his sole job at the moment was to persuade the Iraqis to cut $1 billion of subsidies. He told me, 'If they don't do what I want, The Paris Club will delay debt relief.'"

That is an example of the IMF drunk with the power facilitated by the Paris club nations.

The debt and reparations still to be paid after the Paris club decision are not acceptable because they plunge the Iraqi people into poverty and hardship, because of their effect on Iraqi democracy and freedom, and because they do not give the post-Saddam Administration a clean slate and a clean start. The Minister, the G8 leaders, Paris club members and all creditor nations need to reconsider the Paris club formula. It simply is not good enough by a long way. There needs to be a 100 per cent. write-off of all of Saddam's debt. There should be no more reparations—indeed, there should be a UN resolution, pronto, to ensure that that is the case. There should be no more damaging conditionality of the sort that the IMF wants to impose, and there should be proper funding for reconstruction that involves, benefits and employs Iraqis. I say to the Minister, the Government and the G8 leaders, think again.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Harry Cohen) on securing the debate and on taking us through his objections to the arrangements that have recently been put in place or that are in prospect to help Iraq to rebuild its economy and improve its economic position. He did so in the way that we have come to recognise and expect from him: he was very direct, forceful and clear in his criticisms of the approach taken by the international community and—by direct and indirect implication—of the role played by the United Kingdom Government. I shall try to respond to some of his specific points, not least because some of his assertions are not entirely correct. Then, I shall respond in more general terms and fill him in on the details of the present position and the prospects as I see them.

The Government accept that we have a special responsibility to Iraq, as my hon. Friend argued from the start. In part, that is a product of our historical relationship with that country; in part, it is in recognition of the special circumstances of Iraq's economy at present. My hon. Friend completely dismisses the value of the Paris club agreement, with the 80 per cent. debt write-off at its heart, but that view is not shared by elected representatives in Iraq. That is particularly true of the new Minister of Finance, who has been to the Treasury in the past month to meet my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. In that discussion, Mr. Ali Alawi made it clear that he and the Iraqi Government appreciate the UK's help in putting the Iraqi economy on a sensible footing and the work that we have done on the Paris club agreement. They also recognise that the aid that the UK is putting directly into Iraq is being put to good use. On our part, we welcome our close, continuing dialogue with the Iraqi Government. As my right hon. Friend made clear, we are ready to consider further requests from the Iraqi Government as part of our contribution to their country's reconstruction and economic rehabilitation.

I promised to pick up several of my hon. Friend's points that I felt were not strictly correct. First, no UK export credit guarantees were granted for weapons—there were no credit guarantees for the sale of guns, as he put it. Some guarantees were related to defence expenditure, but not to the purpose that he suggested. Secondly, as a result of the Paris club deal, debt is set to be restructured over 23 years, not 50, and no payments at all will fall due until 2008. Thirdly, as I am sure my hon. Friend appreciates although it did not come through clearly in his remarks, the International Monetary Fund programme to which he referred critically was negotiated with Iraq, not imposed on it. The stand-by agreement, to which he also referred, is in the process of being negotiated. Like other Governments, we must await the outcome of the IMF's negotiations with Iraq to see the SBA's precise content. My hon. Friend raised a couple of points about that, but, in all honesty, I would expect certain conditions and a reduction in fuel subsidies to be part of the stand-by agreement once it is settled with Iraq, for the simple reason that a system of subsidies such as the one for fuel in Iraq creates strong economic incentives for smuggling and corruption. I think that he, like me, would want that to be stamped out.

Harry Cohen: As I understand the point about fuel subsidies, it is the timing that is crucial, because there are extensive fuel subsidies at present and the Iraqi economy cannot get going. However, I want to draw the Minister out on the conditionality in respect of privatisation. Are the Government in favour of the IMF conditionality as part of the Paris club deal that there must be wholesale privatisation of the Iraqi economy?

John Healey: My hon. Friend is slightly overstating his argument, which, as I am sure he would accept, he is occasionally prone to do. Some stand-by agreements include an element of privatisation, but we do not yet know whether that will be an element of the SBA that is negotiated with Iraq through the IMF. We will simply have to wait and see.

My hon. Friend referred to odious debt law, but there is no such thing as established and accepted odious debt legislation. Were we to pursue the odious debt route, rather than doing what we have tried to do with the Iraqi Government—which has been to take a pragmatic, practical approach to quickly securing the debt relief and aid that the country needs—we would be likely to provoke a series of legal challenges that would tie up efforts to help Iraq for a decade or more.

My hon. Friend made a passing, welcome, reference to his strong support for the debt relief and aid programmes that the Government have put in place for Africa. He and I share a sense of pride that the Government have led the international efforts to put in place a comprehensive programme of significant levels of aid and debt relief for the poorest countries, including the recent fresh agreement among G8 finance Ministers.

Iraq is not considered to be one of the world's poorest countries. Nevertheless, as my hon. Friend pointed out, it faces immense social and economic challenges and hardships. Although Iraq's first democratic elections were an historic occasion, with 58 per cent. turnout and almost 8.5 million people voting, the upsurge of violence since the formation of the new Iraqi Government only adds to the challenges. Not only does Iraq face the challenge of establishing a truly inclusive political process, drafting a constitution that reflects its diversity and building security, but it faces a significant reconstruction challenge. Iraq has one of the largest estimated petroleum reserves in the world, but years of economic mismanagement, international sanctions and the recent conflict have hit economic activity hard. My hon. Friend vividly described the impact on Iraq's people. Social development that was once well ahead of the regional average has now well fallen behind to be one of the lowest.

Neither my hon. Friend nor the Government underestimate the challenges that Iraq faces in rebuilding the economy or the challenge that we face in trying to assist. Under Saddam Hussein, mismanagement and embezzlement of Iraq's resources was rife. The oil sector was starved of investment and the regime built up huge debts. Infrastructure, public services and industry were left in a poor state, unemployment was high and 60 per cent. of the population were dependent on food rations. Overall, GDP per capita is estimated to have fallen from more than $3,000 in the early 1980s to about $500 by 2003. It was then, through analysis by the IMF and World Bank, that Iraq's external debt—approximately $120 billion at that time—was judged to be unsustainable. The UK Government have therefore worked hard with the Americans and others to devise what we regard as a fair and sustainable solution to Iraq's debt problems.

We have also been at the forefront of international efforts to rebuild Iraq's economic institutions. In passing, I pay tribute to a number of officials from the Treasury and from HM Revenue and Customs who served for periods in Iraq to help with that rebuilding effort, in some cases putting themselves in danger in the process. Specific economic achievements have included some recovery in oil production, the stabilisation of inflation and the exchange rate, a financial management law, a new currency and an IMF emergency post-conflict assistance package of $436 million. However, by far the most important achievement with the most significant long-term gain was the negotiation of a debt relief deal with the new Iraqi Government. That is the view of the Iraqi Government, albeit not that of my hon. Friend.

The Paris club deal in November 2004 was an agreement to give to Iraq 80 per cent. debt relief, to be delivered in three tranches, linked to Iraq's economic reform. The first 30 per cent. tranche of relief was delivered on 31 December 2004. More than £340 million of Iraq's debt to the UK has already been written off. Part of the Paris club agreement was a moratorium on debt repayments until 2008, and part was a rescheduling of debt over 23 years. The latest reports from Iraq indicate that good progress is being made with other creditors, and even though a number of technical issues have to be resolved we feel that the risk of Iraq's not achieving comparable treatment with its other creditors, which was one of the conditions of the deal, is low.

Once the agreement is fully implemented, Iraq is expected to receive almost $100 billion of debt relief. The US and a few other creditors have offered to give 100 per cent. debt relief; we welcome that generosity, but we have taken a different view. The UK intends to focus its resources on maximising the immediate benefits to the Iraqi people through aid, and we have pledged $544 million in direct aid over three years to March 2006. That money is being put to good use now, as the Iraqi Finance Minister made clear to my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary when they met last month. It is being used to rebuild facilities and to set up new infrastructure and new institutions, particularly in southern Iraq, as well as to provide support to key ministries of the new Government. If the UK offered 100 per cent. bilateral debt relief, some of that aid money would have to be diverted, Iraq would not feel the benefit of further debt relief until 2008 because of the moratorium on payments, and the benefits would be spread over 23 years, rather than concentrated now, when the need is greatest. However, as I said to my hon. Friend, we have an historical relationship with Iraq and therefore stand ready to consider any request for aid or debt relief that the Iraqi Government might make of us.

Despite the difficulties, there is real hope of progress and hope for the future of Iraq. It is not merely a country beset by severe economic difficulties but one with the prospect of and potential for a sound economic future. However, my hon. Friend will recognise that the deep damage done by decades of a repressive regime cannot be rectified in one, two or three years. It will take time to build Iraqi institutions and to improve infrastructure, and for the private sector to flourish. We hope that by 2008, Iraq will be in a position not only to start repaying the remaining debt, but to become the major economy in the region that it once was.

My hon. Friend said that the Paris club debt relief deal was not acceptable to the Iraqi people, but it is acceptable—

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): Order. Time is up.

Digital Switchover

1 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): I am pleased to have secured the debate. I have come to the Chamber hot foot from the Committee that is considering the Identity Cards Bill and understand that we are to have the benefit of your chairmanship there, Mr. Hood, so your chairmanship of our debates this afternoon in Westminster Hall is an unexpected pleasure.

I congratulate the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell) on his recent promotion. I also make it clear to the House that I approach the subject of digital switchover without the benefit, or possibly the hindrance, of any particular technical expertise.

The switchover to digital television is a multilayered subject that brings with it a whole range of technical and regulatory issues, only some of which I intend to touch on today. The Northern Isles, as elsewhere in the United Kingdom, are looking forward to the switchover to digital. Like others, we see it as progress. In recent years, however, because of our geographical remoteness from London, we have been left behind in several other areas of technical progress, particularly in the roll-out of broadband. If the Minister can give us nothing else today, I hope that he will be able to assure us that we will not be left at the coo's tail simply because we are geographically few and far away from London.

As I said, digital switchover is an enormous subject with many angles, but I shall focus today on two important issues: the impact of coverage on my constituents, and help for vulnerable groups.

In 1999, the Government set a target of 99.5 per cent. of homes being able to receive digital terrestrial reception. At the start of June, however, Ofcom announced that 98.5 per cent. of households should be covered by the digital transmitter networks. So there has been some slippage even in that short period. That slippage causes the Scottish highlands and islands communities, and indeed other peripheral parts of the UK, particular concern. A recent piece in The Guardian explained that the coverage had been "a disappointment to those in the Welsh Valleys and Scottish Highlands who hoped the conversion to digital between 2008 and 2012 would mean an end to fuzzy analogue television pictures".

In the same article, Allan Williams of Which? magazine said that the decision means that "some homes may lose TV reception when digital switchover takes place."

He went on to point out that

"Ofcom must make sure that alternative means of reception are in place so no one loses out".

I hope that the Government agree and are already working on such alternatives. Subscribers in many parts of my constituency would dream of having the fuzzy analogue television pictures mentioned in The Guardian article, and we would be concerned if even that provision were to be lost.

[Mr. Alistair Carmichael]

The Minister will be aware that the independent Consumer Expert Group has called for at least 99.5 per cent. of the population in each region, and not just in the UK as a whole, to be able to receive digital at the point of switchover. Will he make clear the Government's position on that proposal? Does he accept that such a small shift in target would give a great deal of comfort and reassurance to people in the highlands and islands?

Communities in my constituency are split into three categories of television reception. First, most people in the main towns and villages have reasonably good analogue reception and have the option of converting to digital by purchasing a freeview set-top box. Secondly, some people can receive analogue reception, but cannot use freeview through the digibox. That is true of many households in many parts of communities such as Yell, Brae and Unst in Shetland, and for some people living in parts of Hoy, Orphir, Longhope, Westray and Evie in Orkney. Finally, there are some communities, in Graemsay in Orkney and Ollaberry in Shetland, in particular, who have no analogue reception at present. They rely on satellites to access the main terrestrial channels. Digital switchover will affect each of those groups differently.

The first group will experience the process pretty much as will most people in the rest of the country, and my main concern in those communities is for the vulnerable groups. The second group, who have analogue reception at present but no set-top box option, causes me some concern. I am concerned about the incentives to prepare for switchover. Given the 98.5 per cent. target, it is highly likely that after switchover some people in my constituency who cannot at present obtain television reception using aerials will be able to do so. Additionally, some people who can use aerials at present to access the main channels will not be able to do so after switchover. I fear that the second group may be larger than the first and that freeview set-top boxes, if I can call them that, will not work in large parts of Orkney and Shetland.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman share my concern for a constituency that is covered by the ITV Border region, which, as I understand it, would be the first to switch over in the region? There is a low level of public awareness about the switchover and about what individuals will have to do to continue to have television reception after it happens.

Mr. Carmichael: I am grateful for that intervention. Yes, I think that Border Television, the company that gave us "Mr and Mrs", is a broadcasting institution that deserves every protection. As to the hon. Gentleman's point about the level of awareness, we should be on a rising curve. If the Government can, by way of public information, put us on that rising curve, we should have no problem in the end. However, we are not there yet. The hon. Gentleman's concerns are legitimate, and he has done us a service in putting down a marker for the future.

The Minister may be aware that his predecessor, the Minister for Sport and Tourism answered a debate on digital switchover on 15 March. His only answer to some of the concerns that I have set out about constituents' predicament post-switchover was that there

"are issues that have to be worked through".—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 15 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 55WH.]

I hope that, four months down the line, some of that work has been done. I should be interested to know where we stand on them today.

When will we be in a position to know who will be able to use digital terrestrial after switchover? Will we simply have to wait for switchover to happen before we know whether or not it is worth while buying a digital box? What will the Government do to assist the 1.5 per cent. of the population who will apparently not be able to access digital terrestrial? Colette Bowe, who chaired the Ofcom consumer panel that considered what measures might be necessary to protect vulnerable groups said last November:

"As a society we ought to damn well make sure that people who currently have access to television continue to have access to it. And if that means that the Treasury ... have to open their pockets, well, so be it. Because that is the way it's got to be."

With slightly more temperate language, I could not have put it better myself. Will the Government ensure that people unable to receive digital terrestrial are given the necessary financial support to receive freesat?

Those in my constituency who have no analogue TV reception were not able to watch ITV or Channels 4 and 5 for part of 2003 after Solus cards, the predecessor scheme, became obsolete. Previously, the BBC had offered services "in the clear" on satellite, but thereafter removed their funding for Solus cards.

If my recollection is right, an Adjournment debate on 21 October 2003, which I attended, was initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid). In reply, the Minister for Sport and Tourism was able to announce that ITV, Channel 4 and Channel 5 had come forward with a replacement card. Those cards cost £20 plus VAT, and he assured the House that they would

"last until Sky does another card swap-out, and for at least two years if the next swap-out is sooner than that."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 21 October 2003; Vol. 411, c. 252WH.]

So far as we can ascertain, the provision continues to be valued by my constituents, but does the Minister have any information on a longer-term solution? Are ITV and others working towards operating "in the clear" on satellite so that people who do not subscribe to Sky can receive the main terrestrial channels? Once digital switchover happens, will the 1.5 per cent. of the population who are unable to get digital terrestrial be treated fairly?

In the time that remains, I want to speak about helping vulnerable groups. Last week, the Minister announced a targeted assistance trial; I believe that it will be run in Bolton. I understand that it will consider the best way to assist vulnerable groups. Will that be the full extent of the trial, or will it be the first of many?

The Minister will be aware that the issues affecting people in Bolton are not necessarily those that affect people in more rural or island communities. Does he accept that there will be a benefit in running further trials to deal with the problems of people living in communities that are less urban than those currently being trialled? Of course, many of the issues would be the same, but I suggest that there will be particular difficulties helping the old or house-bound in places such as the Northern Isles.

The Minister will be aware that take-up of digital among the over-75s is especially low. Only 16 per cent. of households in that category had digital in 2003. When will the Government be in a position to outline what support will be provided to the elderly, disabled and those on low incomes? I am keen to allow the Minister as long as possible to respond to a number of my questions.

I finish with a query that relates more to radio than television. I have received a number of letters from constituents who feel frustrated that they receive repeated adverts promoting digital radio services to which they cannot gain access. In the longer term, do the Government hope to switch over radio services in the same way as television? Does the Minister think it acceptable that, although we pay the same licence fee to TV Licensing, we are effectively barred from some of the services provided by the BBC, which is supposedly a public service broadcaster?

1.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (James Purnell): I congratulate the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on securing this debate. He has been a long-term campaigner on the subject and I thank him for his co-operation in advance of the debate. I shall try to answer as many of the points that he raised as possible.

Access to digital broadcasts is probably one of the most dominant issues in my postbag. The Department receives hundreds of letters every month from members of the public who want freeview and digital terrestrial television but cannot yet receive it. The only answer that we can give them is that they will have to wait until digital switchover. That, in a nutshell, is why the switchover programme is so important; it extends choice and, as the hon. Gentleman says, it will ensure that as many people as possible have access to digital TV.

Digital TV has been a great success and it is already in 62 per cent. of homes. Mobile broadcasting trials are under way and the BBC recently trialled podcasting with its Beethoven experiment. Yet despite nearly two thirds of the country getting digital TV, there are still people who, as the hon. Gentleman highlighted, cannot receive a single television signal or who have to watch poor, ghostly pictures. That is a real problem for his constituents and those of some other hon. Members.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Does the Minister accept that the problems that my hon. Friend Member for Orkney and Shetland described also pertain to rural areas of Wales? The real difficulty is that the 1.5 per cent. of households—roughly 300,000—that have trouble with the signal tend to be grouped in rural areas, so there is a disproportionately high percentage of them in places such as Montgomeryshire and mid-Wales. I hope that he can give us an assurance that the Government are seriously seeking practical solutions to prevent as much as 20 or 30 per cent. of the population in some areas from being left out of the digital switchover.

James Purnell: That is a good point, and I am coming to it. The key issue is that, even now, some people do not have access to analogue signals, not because broadcasters or the Government are unwilling to provide them, but because the cost of reaching that last 1.5 per cent. of the population is exponentially greater than the cost of serving the rest of the population. It costs about as much to extend coverage from 92 to 96 per cent. as it does to reach 92 per cent. coverage, and it costs the same again to go up to 98.5 per cent., so that extra 2.5 per cent. coverage costs the same as 92 per cent. coverage. The last 1.5 per cent. is very difficult to reach. That is why the Government gave the guarantee that we would reach the same proportion of people after the digital switchover as we do now.

It is worth taking a little detour into the issue of the 99.5 per cent. versus the 98.5 per cent. The difference in the figures depends on how we define receiving television. The definition that the Government use is that people should be able to receive a good range of TV channels that are of good quality; that definition takes us to 98.5 per cent. coverage. The remainder can receive some signal, although it is not terribly good and would not be graded as receiving TV by the people in charge of the technical specifications. Our guarantee is therefore that we will reach 98.5 per cent. coverage.

In a world of unlimited funds, one could continue building transmitters to reach more and more people, but the question that we have to face in rolling out digital television is how best to reach people. As we go forward, we need to consider the other technologies that are available. As the hon. Gentleman said, satellite is important, and take-up is higher in areas where people currently have less good analogue reception. Work is also being done on technologies for delivering television over electricity lines, and there is a technology called WiMAX, which is a wireless form of access to television. There is the potential to serve people more efficiently; what we need to do is balance the desirability of universal coverage against the practicability of providing it.

If digital terrestrial will not reach everybody, that highlights the important points that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland made about the practicability of satellite and other options. Let me therefore turn to the issues that he raised, particularly digital satellite.

Mr. Carmichael: Before the Minister moves on from the coverage target, will he make clear his position on meeting regional, rather than UK-wide targets?

James Purnell: I will have to write to the hon. Gentleman about that. We currently have national targets and we will investigate whether it is practicable to have regional targets, but I cannot give him a guarantee at the moment.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, digital satellite is no longer just a pay option. People can now receive the public service channels through satellite in a kind of freesat option offered by Sky. There was real concern when Solus cards stopped being an option, but people can now purchase the kit to provide, in effect, a free satellite option. The hon. Gentleman asked how long such an option could be guaranteed. At present, it is guaranteed for a minimum of two years. Therefore, there is now a reasonable option to get public service channels through satellite, and, post-switchover, that may be the best way for some of his constituents to access those services.

[James Purnell]

The hon. Gentleman wanted to know what progress ITV, for example, is making on providing services in the clear. I understand that ITV has a problem with rights, in that it has rights to broadcast a proportion of its programmes only in the UK. If it were to broadcast on satellite, those programmes would be available outside the UK, and it would either have to take them off or increase the amount that it spends on programmes. We are happy that the BBC has agreed to go in the clear, as that solves part of the problem. I understand that the difference between the BBC and ITV is that the BBC has a much smaller proportion of programmes that are affected by rights, and it gets around the problem by not showing such programmes on satellite. For ITV, at about two hours of programming a week, the problem is more significant. We would encourage any solution, but the best option at present is for people to pursue the freesat option. With a cost that is comparable with the digital terrestrial option and with the two-year guarantee, that option is attractive to a significant number of people.

There are alternatives for people who cannot get digital terrestrial television, but we take seriously the hon. Gentleman's argument that more must be done. Ofcom is working with the broadcasters on specific technological solutions to increase coverage in certain areas. In fact, there are already many ad hoc arrangements—for example, a village got together to buy an aerial to boost the signal. As we go through the digital switchover, we will need to work through what can be done in particular cases, but, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman understands that technical exercise must be led by people who understand the technology rather than by politicians. People will not have only one option available to them. As I said, other solutions are coming through, such as new DSL technologies, including the new ADSL2, and experiments with broadband internet carried through the electricity lines. There will be a patchwork of provision.

I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a guarantee for every household in his constituency, and I am aware that there will be frustration for each constituent who is not able to receive digital TV. However, I am confident that the vast majority—more than at present—will be able to do so. We will provide information in good time on whether people will be able to receive digital pictures. That information will include detailed postcode information, and I hope that there will be some technological means by which people can check before they buy a set-top box whether it would be a good investment. As I said, almost all the hon. Gentleman's constituents will be able to watch BBC and ITV digital programmes in one way or another. The figure may well be more than 98.5 per cent.. Although we cannot give a guarantee for every household, I hope that I have given him some comfort.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): Will the Minister comment on the timetable of the digital switchover? It is of particular importance for Scotland, as the borders area is due to be switched over in 2008 and the rest of Scotland in 2009. In particular, will he discuss what steps he will take regarding affordability—for example, for those households that currently receive analogue but may not have upgraded to digital in three or four years' time?

James Purnell: Those are good points. I shall deal with them later in my speech, if I may.

A final point on analogue signals is that we will have to consider aerials, as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland said. That is important, but we believe that only about 5 per cent. of people need to upgrade their aerial to receive the DTT signal. However, to achieve that we must complete the digital switchover. It is the only way to increase the coverage of DTT. Until we switch off the analogue signals we cannot increase the power of digital signals. We made a firm manifesto commitment that that will happen between 2008 and 2012. The Government are committed to it, and broadcasters and transmission operators are working with manufacturers and retailers. We can give a clear guarantee that it will happen between 2008 and 2012.

In response to the point made by the hon. Member for East Dunbartonshire (Jo Swinson), we shall make an announcement about the timetable shortly. We had, however, given a commitment to let people know what our package for the vulnerable would be. We want to make both commitments clear at the same time, so that is why we are not confirming the timetable right now. We must be able to confirm both commitments in tandem.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland asked whether the trials would include the consideration of rural areas. I can reassure him that they will. The trial already undertaken in Ferryside and Llansteffan took place in an area that had many of the features that he described. Bolton has some rural areas and there are some outlying farms, but we shall continue in the wards that we are considering. We have already undertaken a trial in Wales. I know that conditions are not exactly the same as in his constituency, but there was a genuine parallel and we shall continue to consider the points that emerged as the trials progress.

One encouraging feature of the trial was that once people had experienced digital TV, they were overwhelmingly supportive of it. About 99 per cent. of people voted to keep digital TV, which shows that whatever people's concerns about it, once they experience the extra channels and, for example, the advantage of being able to watch extra tennis matches on the BBC by pressing the red button, they value the services. However, we must continue to communicate the benefits of switchover, and we are working with a new organisation, Switchco, which was created by broadcasters and the supply chain to lead the implementation of switchover, to ensure that everyone gets all the information they need.

Although the vast majority of viewers need only a source of good information to help them through switchover, some people will need more than information, which is the point that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland was making about vulnerable people. Although take-up is about 60 per cent. among the population as a whole, it is only slightly more than 30 per cent. among the over-75s. The elderly may need help to understand what they have to do when they receive a set-top box to install their boxes, to check their aerials, or to use their new equipment, and we acknowledge that a few people might also need financial assistance. As we said in the Green Paper on the future of the BBC, we shall require the BBC to establish and fund schemes for the most vulnerable consumers.

Some people might presume that the vast majority of elderly people need assistance with the technology, but in Ferryside such a presumption turned out to be wrong. It is easy to overestimate the difficulty that older people have using technology. We found that about 20 per cent. of the pilot group needed help and that most of them were able to deal with the issues by using a telephone helpline. In Bolton we are trialling not just the provision of information over the phone, but visits in person. We are considering the most appropriate way to help, whether it is through social workers, charities or other organisations. As the hon. Gentleman mentioned, we shall launch a trial of targeted assistance in Bolton this autumn; we shall use that to work with about 250 to 300 households to identify any further issues on which we need to build.

I have addressed as many of the hon. Gentleman's questions as I can. We cannot give a guarantee for every single one of his constituents, but we can guarantee that we shall continue the current coverage. We believe that more people than now will be able to access the digital public service channels and we shall continue to introduce digital terrestrial services. At the same time, we shall work with the new technologies, so that the coverage achieved through a patchwork of technologies will reduce the problems that his constituents face and result in there being less concern about digital terrestrial services than there has been about analogue transmissions.

Primary Schools (Rossendale)

1.30 pm

Mr. Greg Pope (Hyndburn) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in this debate on the future of primary school provision in Rossendale in Lancashire. I say at the outset that I represent only a small part of the borough of Rossendale, most of which is represented effectively by my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson). I shall confine most of my remarks to how my constituents in Haslingden are affected by Lancashire county council's review of primary provision and, in particular, by the proposal to close St. Mary's Roman Catholic primary school in Haslingden.

Any responsible Government or education authority need to tackle surplus places. I welcome the review of primary provision in Rossendale that Lancashire county council has initiated. We need a review and I welcome the way in which the council is going about it. The review is open and transparent and, although no final decision has been made, the process is a good one. We need to congratulate county councillor Hazel Harding, the leader of the county council, on how the review is being conducted. I also support the objectives of the review. The review document says that a balance must be struck between providing school places within the immediate community and ensuring that schools are large enough to be educationally and economically viable. I support that. The document says that there should be a vision of schools operating at the centre of their immediate or extended communities. St. Mary's in Haslingden is at the heart of its community. Keeping it open dovetails with the vision outlined in that document.

Lancashire enjoys diverse provision—there are probably more faith schools in the Lancashire LEA than in any LEA in the country. I welcome that. We need to cherish and maintain that diversity. In my constituency there are not only community schools, but Roman Catholic schools, Church of England schools and even Methodist schools. I welcome that diversity. The review document says that Lancashire recognises the "need to retain a reasonable pattern of denominational and non-denominational provision wherever possible (even if this means retaining some surplus places) in order to preserve a range of choices for parents."

Preserving that choice for parents is at the heart of what I want to say. I contend that the current proposals, which provide for the closure of St. Mary's Roman Catholic primary school in Haslingden, would deny that parental choice to Catholic parents in my constituency.

The document also refers to the Education Act 2002, which enables small schools to flourish by working in co-operation with other schools or, in some circumstances, by federating with them. It is important that the Government recognise the role that small schools have to play at the heart of communities. I just hope that the Lancashire LEA and, importantly, the Roman Catholic diocese of Salford also accept that role.

None of us would deny that there is a problem with surplus places in primary schools in Rossendale. There are currently about 6,700 primary places in Rossendale, give or take a few. Six years ago, the schools were broadly full, with 6,500 primary pupils and 6,700 places. It is always good to have a small surplus capacity, to provide for new build or for parents to exercise choice or to move. Now, however, there are only 5,500 primary school pupils in the same 6,700 places. The demographic trends show that, with the birth rate and planned building projects in Rossendale, the number of primary school pupils is set to fall to 5,100 by 2010. If we do not do anything, that will leave a vacancy rate of more than 20 per cent., which is unacceptable.

We know that tough decisions will have to be made, but why, in tackling surplus places, is St. Mary's Roman Catholic school in Haslingden the only faith school to be singled out for closure, with no other option open to it in the review document? If it was a failing school in special measures, all reasonable people could understand the logic. That is not the case. It is an improving school that has been turned round. Ofsted has described it as being the sixth most improved primary school in the country. I went to the school last week and can say that it is a happy, succeeding, improving school.

The school is at the heart of the community. Its history is interwoven with that of the town of Haslingden. Following the famine in Ireland in the middle of the 19th century, many Irish people sought a new life in England. They came through Liverpool and formed a diaspora in Lancashire and the north-west of England. Haslingden has a large Irish community, which came seeking food and work in the middle of the 19th century.

The community established St. Mary's church and wanted to establish a school to go with the church. It is worth bearing in mind that that period was only a generation after the Catholic emancipation Acts. There was still a large amount of anti-Catholic sentiment and anti-Irish bigotry. When people learned of the proposal to open a Catholic school, an angry mob descended on what was to become the site of the school. It was dispersed only when a lone figure fired a revolver in the air. That man was Michael Davitt, the founder of the Irish Democratic Land Federation and a renowned Irish nationalist.

The school opened a year later in the summer of 1869. There are not many schools that can claim to have been founded on a single gunshot dispersing an angry mob. We ought to cherish our history.

The review document has some figures about the school that are not entirely accurate. It says that there are 150 places. In reality, there are more like 125, because one of the classes has been converted into an information and communications technology suite. The review document refers to problems with flooding as though that were a perennial problem that would lead one to conclude that the school had no viable future. In fact, nobody can remember the last time that the school flooded. Flooding is a problem that was solved a long time ago.

The school is much loved by the community and the wider community. I have received letters from as far away as Boston, Massachusetts urging that it be kept open. I have been inundated with letters and have petitions running to hundreds, possibly thousands of signatories, urging that the much-loved school be kept open.

I have noticed that pupils do not always love their schools, but I have many letters from pupils saying that they do love the school. One letter said that many pupils are not Catholics but they still come to the school because it has kind teachers. Someone else said:

"How could you even consider closing this lovely school?"

One pupil said:

"My teacher . . . is the coolest teacher here . . . if you end up shutting down St. Mary's . . . her children . . . could end up with a horrible teacher."

That is a fair point. Two pupils wrote to say that if the school were closed, they were "going to go on strike!"

I suspect that that referred to a day when maths was being taught.

St. Mary's really is a school that is at the heart of the community. The point that I make to my hon. Friend the Minister is that closure should not be the first or the only option for schools such as St. Mary's. There are other ways of tackling surplus places. It should be possible to reduce the number of pupils on the roll to tackle surplus places. It should be possible also to look imaginatively at co-operation with other schools.

The review document says that, if St. Mary's closes, there are sufficient places, either at St. Veronica's Roman Catholic primary school in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen or at other schools in the area. Frankly, that would deny the choice of Catholic education to many of my constituents because there are more than 70 Catholic pupils at St. Mary's but there are only 17 places available at St. Veronica's. There are places available at community schools and faith schools of different faiths but that is not the same thing.

I return to what the document says. It talks about preserving a range of choices for parents. If we are not careful, that will be denied. I cannot understand why St. Mary's is the only school earmarked for closure. All the other schools have been given other options and St. Mary's deserves that choice as well.

Who wants the school to close? The parents do not, nor do the teachers, the pupils, the governors, the local councillors, the local MP, the Catholic community in Haslingden, the wider community in Haslingden, and nor even, I suspect, does Lancashire local education authority. I suspect that the only people who have the school earmarked for closure and who have their hearts set on that are, sadly, members of the Roman Catholic diocese of Salford. I cannot imagine why they should want to close a popular school with a large playing field in a residential area with rising property prices. Those considerations have led some to speculate on their motives, which I would not dream of doing.

The school was born out of adversity in the 19th century, and has the chance to flourish in the 21st century. All that it requires is a helping hand and an imaginative reconsideration of the circumstances. That is not to deny that the problem of surplus places in Haslingden, Rossendale and across Lancashire needs to be tackled—of course it does, but I am sure that we can tackle that problem and find a future for this popular, improving and happy school. I hope that the Lancashire education authority and the diocese of Salford will listen, through the debate, not to me but to my constituents and the community I represent, who want to keep the school open.

Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Jimmy Hood (in the Chair): Order. I do not have any information about a request from the hon. Lady to speak in the debate, and I do not have the approval of the hon. Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope), so she is not eligible to speak in the debate.

1.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): I shall be more than happy to take a few interventions from my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Janet Anderson) so that she can make some points.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) on securing the debate and on the way in which he presented his points. He makes a powerful case in advocating some alternative solutions to an issue that he acknowledges needs to be tackled by the local school organisation. committee and local council. There is no doubt that issues arise out of the proposals made, but, as both my hon. Friends will know, the Government's role in this matter is not as active as it would have been before 1998, when Ministers made decisions about the local reorganisation of schools. We no longer have that power, and we think it right that such arrangements should be made locally and that final decisions should be taken locally, although we are committed to continuing the drive to raise education standards throughout the country.

Local authorities undoubtedly need to create a pattern of provision that supports raising the attainment of children, and to make sure that it meets the changing needs and numbers of children in any particular area. The Department's five-year strategy for children and learners, which follows on from our document, "Excellence and Enjoyment: A strategy for primary schools", sets out the extensive success story of primary education, with many schools delivering high-quality education. There have been impressive strides in literacy and numeracy in recent years, as well as teaching having improved in every curriculum subject in primary schools since 1997. Of course, we recognise that we need to do more to provide a high-quality primary education to all pupils. There is still an unacceptable variation in performance between schools, and authorities are encouraged to consider that when determining proposals under a review of provision.

Primary standards for 11-year-olds in Rossendale are improving and are broadly in line with the average for Lancashire schools. In Lancashire as a whole, key stage 1 and 2 results are above the national average. No primary schools in Rossendale have been identified as needing special measures, as having serious weaknesses or as underachieving, although eight have been identified as needing additional local authority support to address educational, personnel or financial issues.

As my hon. Friend set out clearly, Lancashire county council is reviewing primary school places across the Rossendale area, because of surplus places. I have the same figures as he does for the number of surplus places. There is no doubt that that issue needs to be tackled. The review covers 32 primary schools. The surplus place percentage is almost 17.5 per cent., and it will reach 22.8 per cent. by 2010 if nothing is done, so, clearly, something must be done. The authority and the diocesan body state that falling rolls have had a greater impact on Catholic schools than other schools, although there is significant unfilled capacity in all sectors.

On the option put forward in the consultation document, my hon. Friend made the point that there is only one option for his area of Haslingden, and I understand his concerns on that. I have listened to his points and am sure that the local schools organisation committee will do the same and consider some of them, which I am sure he will also make locally in every possible way. The parents and pupils sound to me like quite an active lot, and I am sure that they will make those points as strongly as he has made them during this debate.

Janet Anderson: I thank the Minister for giving way and I apologise, Mr. Hood, for not having indicated that I wanted to say something.

The Minister mentioned that there was only one option for St. Mary's in the review, and she is absolutely right. I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) has said in welcoming the approach of Lancashire county council, which has indicated that it is willing to listen and think again.

A number of schools in my constituency are affected, but for one in particular—Bacup nursery school—there is only one option in the review document, which is closure. I visited the school on Saturday and I know the strength of feeling locally. We would very much like for that school to remain, and replacing it with a nursery class would not improve the provision for local people in Bacup. In fact, it would make it significantly worse. I just place that on the record. Part of the solution to the problem may be some sort of new build throughout the borough of Rossendale, and I wonder whether the Minister would explain what help might be available from Government to assist with that.

Maria Eagle: My hon. Friend has raised a point that I shall come on to during my remarks.

I congratulate the teachers, parents and, most of all, the pupils of St. Mary's for the impressive achievement of being identified by Ofsted as one of the most improving schools in the country. From my constituency experience, I understand how difficult things can be in a school that is improving and has been turned round from a slightly difficult position—albeit not special measures in this instance—only to be faced suddenly with such a threat to its future, after all the effort that has gone into turning it around. All I can say is that I congratulate the school and all connected with it on its achievement. No matter what happens to the local organisation, there is no doubt that it is a significant achievement to be named by Ofsted as one of the most improving primary schools in the country. That is something of which everyone should be very proud.

I understand that one difficulty is that pupil numbers are quite small, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn referred to that. I am told that the number stood at 81 in January and that there are currently 78 pupils. My hon. Friend raised some issues in referring to our 2002 legislation about the way in which small schools might be helped to continue even though the numbers are smaller. That is particularly important in rural areas where schools are centres of the community, and I am sure that all those factors will be taken into account during the current consultation and in the decision-making process thereafter at the level of the schools organisation committee when it considers the points made or whether the proposals should go ahead.

The consultation document was issued in May and open evenings have been held at schools that could be directly affected. I am not sure whether that applies to the nursery, but I am sure that it should. I am sure that it will have had meetings where parents of the children who go there could make those points. I know that there were open evenings at St. Mary's school on 7 June and at St. Veronica's on 6 June. The results of the consultation are to be reported to the cabinet member for education on 13 September, which leaves my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn, and those of his view, the summer in which to campaign. Of course, before making any decisions, those making the decision locally will take into account the views put forward.

Lancashire county council and the Salford diocesan schools commission recognise in their consultation document the important role played by denominational schools. The point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn about the possibility of removing the option of a Catholic primary education from some parents is important, and I am sure that he will stress it to those who are to make these decisions in due course. I understand that a reorganisation of Roman Catholic churches is being undertaken in Rossendale and Ramsbottom, which may result in an amalgamation of the parishes of Haslingden, St. Mary's and St. Veronica's. I do not know what impact that might have on some of the proposals that have come forward, but I am sure that the two things are not unconnected.

My hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen raised a point about a nursery school in her constituency and asked what, if anything, the Government can do to ensure that funds are available to ensure that schools can continue where that is wanted. I am afraid that I will have to write to her on that point. However, she will be well aware of the increasing resources that the Government are putting in to ensure that pupils attain in their current school buildings and to extend and extensively rebuild our school infrastructure throughout the country. I will have to check at the Department to see what might be available for her nursery school, but she will be aware of our 10-year child care strategy and the concept of extended schools, which may well provide some options that could be considered locally to ensure that valued local facilities can not only continue, but be expanded.

Over the next 10 years, there will be a vast expansion in the availability of child care and extended schools in particular areas, which will offer all kinds of additional support services to parents, families and learners of all ages. I am certain that, in conjunction with the local authority, local diocesan schools commissions can come up with helpful plans.

Janet Anderson: The Minister stresses something important. We feel that one of the ways forward for the nursery school in Bacup would be for it to combine with the local Sure Start scheme to provide wrap-around care for all the families in Bacup.

Maria Eagle: I am interested to hear that local people are already ahead of the game. They will have spotted that there are a lot of resources in extending schools to ensure that they provide services for much longer periods during the day to assist parents who are at work by ensuring that they can have proper child care for an extended time. Such expansions are planned throughout the country.

Sure Start has led not only to services in respect of children and early-years education being put together much more coherently, but, in areas in which it is established, to underachievement being tackled effectively. If my hon. Friend already knows of a Sure Start scheme, that is an obvious way in which services can be not only preserved, but improved in future. I undertake to contact her further in that regard, although I am sure that she is aware that I cannot make decisions about school reorganisations. I am certain that those involved at local level will have the best interests of all the communities at heart and will want to ensure that the proposals that they finally come forward with are fully supported by parents and local people.

My hon. Friend will be well aware, as will my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn, that to the extent that there is not an agreement at the end of the process of consultation, there are procedures by which decisions can be taken by the independent schools arbitrator that will ensure that a resolution is reached to allow the reorganisation to go ahead.

I have heard what both my hon. Friends have said. I am certain that the local schools organisation committee, the LEA and the diocesan authorities will read carefully what they have had to say and that parents, pupils and those with an interest in the local area will be involved in the consultation, will make their views known and will put forward alternatives if they feel that they are viable. My hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn had one or two points about that.

At the end of the day local decision making, along with the arbitration that is available if there is no agreement, will ensure that, when it happens, the reorganisation of schools in Rossendale will happen to the benefit of all pupils whether they are at community schools, denominational schools or wherever, and whether they are at nursery or primary level. That is the aim of the way in which schools reorganisation is now carried out. That is best done locally and at the end of the process Rossendale will have a plan for the future that will do right by all the children of the area.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Two o'clock.

[MR. EDWARD O'HARA in the Chair]

Royal West Sussex NHS Trust

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Watson.]

9.30 am

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I am pleased to have secured this debate, but I am angry that it should have been necessary. I have no party political points to make. The NHS has not been right for a long time. Given the limited NHS resources that are available, all I want to do today is to deal with how we can find the best possible health care for the area that is covered by St. Richard's, for my constituents and for those who use the hospital, a high proportion of whom are elderly and live in a rural area.

Before I go any further, I shall map out the scale of the problem, with the hard numbers. In the financial year 2003–04, the hospital went into significant deficit for the first time of £3.5 million. In the past year, 2004–05, that deficit increased to £13.8 million and it is forecast that, in the next financial year, it will increase to £28 million, on an income base of just over £100 million. As a result of this, the Audit Commission has issued a public interest report—a so-called section 8 report.

Those figures sound catastrophic, but the reality is that the lion's share of the deficit is purely a consequence of resource accounting and budgeting—the RAB system that is in use by the NHS. To put the whole matter into perspective, if the deficit were funded as if it were a commercial loan, before RAB cuts, and if a normal rate of interest were being paid, the total deficit would only be a few million pounds. The lion's share of the hospital's funding crisis has far more to do with the labyrinthine nature of NHS RAB than any financial mismanagement in which it might have been involved. During a five-year period in which a business would accumulate £1 of deficit, under RAB a hospital will be accumulating £3 of deficit. That is the scale of the problem caused by RAB.

The second crucial point that needs to be made concerns what people are saying about the hospital. Everyone says that it is a first-rate hospital. That is not only my conclusion, but that of the cohorts of experts, arbitration reviews and the Government's indicators. The catalogue is so long that I shall not do much more than refer to it. We are dealing with a top-class hospital.

The Government's reference cost index suggests that the trust is one of the most efficient in the country. It is currently in the top 15th percentile. As for the hospital's clinical performance, according to independent benchmarking, it has been among the top 40 in the country—out of more than 120 trusts—for each of the past five years. And in clinical outcomes, over the past two years the trust has had either the lowest or the second lowest mortality rate in the south-east, and that is after taking account of a difficult catchment area.

So far I have not mentioned patients. It is not only whether patients stay alive that we must consider, but whether they believe that they are being treated properly. The latest MORI satisfaction index for acute trusts, which is produced each year, shows that the trust has the highest level of patient satisfaction in the south-east. St. Richard's hospital is top out of 26 hospitals in the south-east for patient satisfaction.

Of course, if a hospital is delivering the goods on that scale on each and every one of the Government's indicators, we would expect the staff to be engaged, committed to delivering high-quality care and happy about working there. That is exactly what is happening at St. Richard's. Last year, the NHS's own national staff survey found that it was an extremely happy place in which to work. Furthermore, the senior management were judged to be in the best 20 per cent. for quality of leadership. So that is the judgment of people working in the hospital, assessing their own management.

All of those indicators that I have just described were further reflected in one general measure, which is that the hospital has held the charter mark for excellence for nearly a decade. Even the Healthcare Commission feels obliged to give the hospital two stars out of three, and it withholds the third star only because of the deficit. That takes us straight back to where we started.

No one is disputing the fact that the hospital is first rate; I do not think that the Minister will try to dispute the fact that the hospital is one of the best in the country, or that it is treating more patients every year at a lower cost per patient than almost any other hospital. However, the response of the strategic health authority and the Department of Health has been to restrain its income. They seem not to consider that, as a result, people will either go untreated or be treated at greater expense elsewhere.

Only in the NHS could an institution as successful as this be having its income cut. If it were a private sector institution it would be expanding rapidly and people would be saying, "Let's get this institution to grow as fast as possible. We have found a successful method of delivering what we want to deliver: better health care." The hospital would be the regional success story in health care if it were in the private sector, run according to private sector common-sense norms.

So why is the hospital being treated in this way? There are a number of detailed explanations, and I shall come to those in a moment. First, there is one general explanation that must be dealt with, which I hope the Minister will take on board. I worry that St. Richard's could be the victim of regional health politics. I have spoken to a large number of people about St. Richard's since I became a Member of Parliament, particularly over the last year. I often hear variations on the same theme: St. Richard's is the success story that should not happen. It is a small district general hospital which is outstandingly efficient. On all the planning boards and computer screens, taking into account all the theories and models that the NHS bureaucrats put together, hospitals of 500 or fewer beds are not supposed to be efficient, or to do that well. They are not supposed to be able to deliver cheap, efficient health care in the modern age.

Time and again I have been told—on the quiet—by senior NHS bureaucrats that the long-term future of St. Richard's must be as an outpost of Portsmouth or the Portsmouth hospitals. People say that we may, by all means, keep a campus in Chichester, and that there will need to be an accident and emergency department, but not a general hospital; super-hospitals are the future.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way in his excellent and informed speech. Is not the driving force behind the move towards super-hospitals the Royal College of Physicians more than any politicians? Is it not up to elected politicians and Ministers to resist such pressure from the profession?

Mr. Tyrie: I think that the drivers come from many sources. It is the job of Ministers not to allow such things to be decided entirely by their officials in discussions with various interest groups, but to try to think through the issues from first principles. The York study on economies of scale in hospital care—the most famous study, although it is a relatively old one—suggested that there were no economies of scale above about 200 or 250-bed hospitals. However, in numerous documents and in speeches it has been made clear over many years by Ministers that 500 beds is probably the cut-off point for the minimum size at which an all-singing, all-dancing general hospital can function efficiently. Incidentally, St. Richard's is a 500-bed hospital, so it is right on the cusp that I am describing.

I do hope that the Minister can reassure me today that the Government are fully committed to helping hospitals of the size of St. Richard's to flourish. Patients want that. They do not want super-hospitals; they want to be treated near where they live, if they can be. St. Richard's has proved that it is possible to do that efficiently. My constituents, and those of my hon. Friend who are affected, will be listening to the Minister's response on that point.

All that St. Richard's really needs—I will now get into the detail of how we have developed the huge deficit—is for the Government to implement their own health policy. St. Richard's does not need a handout; it needs reasonable payment for the treatment that it provides. As Ministers know, the hospital is being paid for its work at well below the cost of providing it, as shown by the Government's national tariff rate. If St. Richard's was paid at the national tariff rate, it would never have got into deficit. In fact, it would be in surplus and would be expanding, as common sense suggests that it should. Full implementation of the national tariff would yield an extra £15 million in 2006 and more in subsequent years, more than covering the deficit, even including the extraordinary RAB accounting, which has artificially inflated the financial crisis.

I have had a good look at the issue of the national tariff. The question that I have been wanting to clarify is by how much the hospital is paid under tariff. The short answer is about 20 per cent. In other words, it is getting only about 80 per cent. of what it should get, based on the national tariff. That is a key issue in understanding what has gone wrong with the hospital's finances.

I quite understand why the Government have decided to slow down implementation of the national tariff. It was originally intended to be phased in from April this year. However, a national tariff means winners and losers, and the Government do not yet have a plan for the losers. They do not have a plan for those inefficient hospitals that are receiving above-average tariff and which would have money taken away from them—those hospitals up and down the country that deliver the same treatment or less good treatment for more money than St. Richard's does. Those cuts will be painful and the Government will need to plan for them. I understand that.

I am concerned that St. Richard's, which will be one of the winners, should not be penalised in the meantime. What is more, a penalty is being built into the Government's current method of moving to the national tariff: the so-called payment by results scheme. That is because low-tariff hospitals are permitted increases in tariff in slugs of only 2 per cent. per annum. In St. Richard's case, starting 20 per cent. behind—or, to put it another way, starting from such an efficient base—it is a mathematical impossibility for the hospital ever to get up to the national tariff rate under the Government's payment by results scheme. That must be crazy. At least the Government have said that they will look again at payment by results; thank goodness. Penalise by results would be a better description of the current scheme.

Let us put the tariff point another way, which illustrates it even more clearly. Imagine that St. Richard's was shifted 12 miles due west to the other side of the county border, in Hampshire. The Hampshire and Isle of Wight strategic health authority prices the cost of treatment almost at tariff. If St. Richard's hospital was 12 miles due west it would be in surplus.

There has to be something amiss when a first-rate hospital, which would be a candidate for foundation status in one county, finds itself having to cut its budget under RAB in another. Something is seriously at fault with the internal financial arrangements of the local health economy.

Of course, in Hampshire a deficit is now mounting in the primary care trust instead of the hospital trust. What is their alternative? The only alternative to giving more money to the local health economy is to leave patients untreated. That is my second worry. I have frequently heard senior health bureaucrats talk about the need for "better demand management"; the public should know what that might mean. What it really means is that people would be left untreated. "Better demand management" means less demand: squeezing it out and rationing.

I hope that the Minister will be able to say categorically today that she rejects that approach to solving the problems at St. Richard's and in West Sussex. That approach is tantamount to saying to St. Richard's that, because it is successful, it is attracting too many patients, who are referred by GPs or come through in accident and emergency, and that it has become too well known as a centre of excellence. So it had better close its doors to some patients and force them to be treated elsewhere. I am sure that the Prime Minister did not mean that when he said that we need a health service fit for the 21st century; I am sure that it is not what successive Health Secretaries had in mind when they told us that the main constraint on more health care in Britain was not cash but capacity.

Coming along and moaning to a Minister about the fact that not enough cash is being provided in the health economy and that as a result a very good hospital is in trouble, is not enough. I have tried to think through what reasonable response the Minister might try to make. What has been sitting in her brief overnight?

The Minister could say, for example, that the PCT already receives more than its fair share of the national cake. I have no doubt that she will have a statistic that shows that. That, however, would not take full account of the demands in areas such as Chichester, which has such a large rural and elderly population.

The Minister may have been briefed that the primary care trust has the allocation of its own funding wrong and that it should allocate a higher proportion of its budget to secondary and tertiary, rather than primary, care. She might have a point if she said that. The PCT is spending only 45 per cent. of its budget on secondary and tertiary care, whereas the average for PCTs in Surrey and Sussex as a whole is nearer 50 per cent.

However, before alighting on that as the explanation, the Minister would need to remember the extra and growing amount that needs to be spent on mental health in the area, particularly in view of the history of nearby Graylingwell, which was the county asylum before it closed. Many former patients live in the local community and, understandably, they bring extra costs for the PCT. That is why the mental health element of the PCT's spending is higher than average and it is one of the causes of the fact that only 45 per cent. of its budget—a limited cake—can go to secondary and tertiary care.

Another line that the Minister might have up her sleeve might be to say that some of the hospital-based services should be borne by GPs or provided in the community, closer to where people live. This is the new line that a person gets when they talk to a large number of people in NHS senior management. However, I will wager that if the Minister probes her officials about that policy, she will discover that the savings claimed could turn out to be highly speculative. It is at least arguable that such community-based care could generate as much demand as it diverts, and it is the view of many experts that it will.

The Minister will definitely tell us that after intensive negotiations, the trust, the PCT and the strategic health authority are much nearer a solution. She will be right, at least in the very short run. The hospital has found an extra £5 million of savings and has also offered to raise a further £3.7 million by selling assets owned by the trust. We should all be pleased to hear that the negotiations are going a bit better and that they have moved forward a little. However, I worry about the deal that has been put together.

What will taking £5 million out of that trust really mean? It will mean fewer nurses per patient, but the hospital is already in the lowest quartile nationally in terms of the nurses-per-patient ratio. It will mean shortening the length of stay, but the hospital already has among the shortest stay lengths of any hospital trust for each main type of treatment. Among other things, it may also mean that rehabilitation services need to be cut. That is the real effect of the £5 million of savings. What about the £3.7 million of asset sales? Frankly, the proposed sale of land is nothing more than asset stripping; it is no more than a sticking-plaster solution because one cannot sell assets to pay for current expenditure for long.

Everybody will need to row together to make the current negotiations a success, but we also need to be clear that a few asset sales will not solve the growing health care crisis in West Sussex or Chichester. My constituents need a long-term solution to the problem, and that will require the Government to examine at least four issues. The first, to which I have alluded, is the need to ensure that there is a proper national tariff for the work that hospitals do. Are the Government committed to paying hospital trusts the full national tariff within four years? I hope that the Minister can answer that question. It is the current stated policy, but what is the strength of commitment to it? If a full commitment can be given, and we can get rid of the 2 per cent. cap on payment by results, St. Richard's will be out of the woods in a few years.

That brings me to the second point. We must have a basic principle in the NHS that we will reward success such as that shown by St. Richard's. In theory, the Government have already done that with foundation hospital status. Even if the hospital had foundation status, however, it would still be strapped for cash because of the 2 per cent. cap on payment by results.

The third issue is the capitation formula. The Government must look again at this. It has resulted in the transfer of health resources from the south to the north. The arguments involved are long and I do not intend to go into them in detail, but re-examining the formula is inescapable. The whole health economy of the south is developing similar problems. The recent National Audit Office report on the NHS nationally showed a steady deterioration in the south compared with the north. Not every hospital in the south can be getting things wrong, so something is clearly wrong with the capitation formula. I should be grateful if, today, the Minister would commit the Government to looking again at the formula.

There is a fourth point, which it is essential for the Government to consider if we are to get through this growing crisis: they need to shed some of their nostrums about the way in which health care is provided. The suggestion that St. Richard's is too small to survive as an independent hospital, and the funding treatment that it has received over the past few years, owe more to a communist state planning system than to a modern democracy. It is absurd. When one goes through the way in which the numbers have been calculated, one can scarcely believe that a major institution such as the NHS is being managed in this way in the 21st century. A group of serious, dedicated clinicians, health care professionals and managers are being pushed around as a result of the most extraordinary, byzantine rules.

If the Government really are committed to doing what they say—to letting success flourish in the NHS—they must think out of the box and more imaginatively. Specifically, I hope that the Minister will return to her Department and ask about economies of scale and super-hospitals and whether the Government should be giving much more encouragement to hospitals of 300, 400 and 500 beds, rather than having an idée fixe that a hospital of fewer than 500 beds cannot survive or be efficient in the modern age.

[Mr. Tyrie]

I have spoken to many constituents about this subject, including patients, staff, management and clinicians. They all say much the same thing:

"The hospital provides high-quality care at low prices. It is many levels above most other hospitals. Morale has been high and the hospital has been a very happy place to work. Management has a good working relationship with consultants, the trust and staff, unlike at so many other hospitals. The chief executive leads by example and has the complete confidence of the whole hospital. It is rare to find such high-quality management."

Actually, those are not my views—I have just been quoting a leading clinician, the medical director at St. Richard's hospital.

I have suggested a number of long-term solutions to the Minister. Best of all would be for her to come and see for herself. She should not believe everything that she has heard about the hospital from the regional health authority; she should just go down, take a look and discover for herself the gap between the numbers and reality. As another clinician who does not work at the hospital put it to me:

"You can tell when you walk into a hospital immediately whether the quality of care is good. St. Richard's is where I would most want to be treated."

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. This is a debate of local interest and, according to the Speaker's ruling, contributions from the Opposition Front Bench may be limited to five minutes in order to allow local Members to have full opportunity to speak. If that becomes necessary, the first Opposition contribution will be called at 10.40 am.

9.56 am

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) on securing this important and timely debate. He has an impressive track record on fighting for local hospitals sited in his constituency. He has the backing and support of all of us who represent constituencies in West Sussex because we share his concerns.

St. Richard's hospital is an excellent hospital that is used heavily and frequently by people in my constituency, as Bognor Regis is only six miles away from Chichester. The hospital is well loved and its medical proficiency well respected and understood by people in the Bognor Regis area. The Friends of St. Richard's is a widely supported group that has raised millions of pounds for the hospital in recent years. Volunteers from Bognor Regis can be seen throughout the hospital on any day of the week.

The hospital's reputation is supported by the raw data. As my hon. Friend said, it has a two-star Healthcare Commission rating, with only its financial position preventing it from receiving the top three-star rating. In a sense, the hospital is in a vicious circle because if it had a three-star rating it would have more independence, but it cannot have the third star because of the financial position that the current structure has put it in.

St. Richard's is a hugely efficient hospital and is in the 15th percentile of all NHS trusts. It has also been among the top 40 hospitals for each year from 2001 to 2005 for clinical performance, according to the CHKS Ltd. rating. St. Richard's also has the lowest and second lowest hospital mortality rate in the south-east in the past two years, as my hon. Friend said, as well as the highest patient satisfaction rating in the south-east.

We are talking about a well-loved and highly efficient hospital that is in trouble because of a deficit of £13.8 million last year, which, on an accumulated basis, now totals £20.5 million since 2001–02. St. Richard's hospital performs well on the cost side and is efficient by comparison with other hospitals. The problem must therefore be on the income side. That clearly is a problem, as the hospital is being paid significantly below the NHS tariff for its operations—as my hon. Friend has calculated, about 80 per cent. below the tariff in 2004–05 and 86 per cent. below in 2005–06. That is because payment by results has been only partially implemented, and merely includes elective care for 2005–06.

It is likely that, had full payment by results been implemented, the trust would have been in surplus in 2004–05. The sin that St. Richard's has committed has been to treat too many people. Those who know the area that the hospital serves will know that it has an elderly population, particularly in Bognor Regis, where 25 per cent. are over the age of 65—that is forecast to rise by a further 19 per cent. over the next 10 years. The population also contains a high proportion of the very elderly—those aged over 85—so of course there are severe demands on the hospital. I am glad that St. Richard's treats my constituents when they call on its services. I would be the first at the barricades if it started to turn patients away because it had breached its financial barriers.

Is there not something odd in the way in which the NHS is managed? Somebody sits in Whitehall and calculates what the area covered by Western Sussex primary care trust needs, based on its population, profile and other requirements, and we all sit and hope that that calculation is correct. Then, lo and behold, more patients than predicted by the formula turn up and are treated, so the costs accumulate and a deficit arises, and we all scurry around trying to plug the gap. Surely, if the hospital is efficient, which this one is, and it is engaged only in treatment that is accepted as appropriate for an NHS hospital to carry out, which it is, that should be the end of the matter; the funding should be given.

It might be that GPs are referring to the hospital people with particular medical conditions that in other areas are more usually dealt with without hospital admission. If that can be proved, it needs to be addressed. Perhaps we need more district nurses in the area so that the number of hospital admissions can be reduced. However, if it is not the cause or the whole cause of the problem and it is the case that more patients are becoming ill than the formula predicted, it is wrong for the hospital—or the PCT and the whole health economy of Western Sussex—to cut its level of service to match the funding. Cost cutting is a fine and proper way to deal with inefficiency, but we must not plug this deficit by cutting the level or quality of service to a very elderly population whose lives depend on this good, effective hospital.

The funding gap should not be plugged, either, by cutting other NHS services in the area. I understand that Western Sussex PCT intends to reduce the number of district nurses by 30 per cent., and to move them out of the GP practices, where they currently work, into five regional centres. In an area such as the one that I represent, that is entirely unacceptable. I have had a raft of letters from worried elderly constituents in response to the announcement about the changes for district nurses. One constituent, Miss Duncanson, who lives in Pagham, writes that she is appalled by the proposal by the PCT to reduce the number of district nurses. She goes on to state:

"There are many elderly people who rely on the friendly and efficient District Nurses. You will be aware that it is frightening to have a stranger coming into your home", and that, under the new arrangements proposed by the PCT,

"the patients will not know the Nurses and the Nurses will not know the patients. This proposal confirms the suspicion among the elderly that they come very far down in the priorities of the Care System."

Another constituent from Pagham writes:

"This reduction of cover . . . will undoubtedly lead to a serious dilution in the quality of primary care in the home," and continues:

"These cuts will inevitably lead to a loss in patient carer confidence and the personal trust that has, up to now, been developed"—

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I have been following my hon. Friend's points carefully. He acknowledges that his population of the very elderly is very high, as it is in other parts of West Sussex. The very elderly make the greatest demands on the health service, and if we are unable to look after them in their own homes through visiting nurses, it is likely that they will end up requiring more acute care, in hospitals, at a vastly greater price. The scheme is a false economy.

Mr. Gibb: My hon. Friend is absolutely right; that is the madness of the system. It is likely that a reason for the deficit is that there may have been an excessive number of accident and emergency admissions because there is an elderly population. One of the best ways to reduce the number of admissions is to have more care in the home, but to plug the financial gap, the PCT health economy wants savings across the board and is proposing to cut the number of district nurses by 30 per cent., which, as my hon. Friend said, is likely to lead to more admissions to St. Richard's, exacerbating the problem in the long run.

A constituent from Nyetimber in Bognor Regis writes:

"My elderly mother has needed visits from the district nurses in recent months due to a chronic illness . . . She has been treated with great respect and courtesy by the district nurses attached to the Grove House Surgery, who have performed excellently in reducing the ailment and containing it in the best possible way . . . In my opinion the District Nurses perform a great service to the community . . . The proposed changes to reduce the number of nurses by 30 per cent. shows a lack of foresight and will surely affect the health and morale of the very people who are entrusted to improve the wellbeing of their patient."

My constituent pleads with the Minister, via me, and urges her to think again.

Other constituents have written to me expressing huge concern about the proposal. One states:

"My parents live in Aldwick . . . and both have benefited from their excellent local health services in recent years . . . It is the reason they have decided to spend their remaining years in the Bognor area. I believe that a cross section of the locality would indicate that there are many others of their neighbours in the same situation. Basically this is a prime retirement residential area. To be planning to reduce the number of district nurses by 30 per cent. is little short of criminal. Any 'savings of cost' must be judged against the reduction of the level and quality of the service provided."

The letter concluded:

"What a way for the 'War Generation' to be treated towards the end of their lives."

That is what I hear from a number of constituents on this issue. And we are talking about the war generation because it is an area where the very elderly—people over the age of 85—live. I quote from a letter that exemplifies that point. It states:

"I am 81 years old, my wife is 79 and we have lived in Aldwick for the past 16 years. In recent years we have both had health problems and I have been most grateful for the excellent local health care, with my wife now requiring regular attention from the District Nursing Team. They are our lifeline . . . Please do all you can to oppose this awful plan."

The Minister has now heard first hand the consequences of trying to plug an artificial financial deficit, dealing with a formula drawn up in Whitehall that has proven to be inaccurate in the real-life circumstances of western Sussex.

I do not know how many hours of highly paid accountants' time has been consumed in pouring over the details of the hospital's deficit and in finding savings from the service provided, but I expect that it is excessive. Here we have an efficient hospital that is simply treating more patients than were predicted and for which it is being paid less than it should be. We need to implement payment by results immediately so this problem would be resolved, and so that we do not start cutting vitally needed medical services, which are keeping people alive.

This debate really is a matter of life and death. I trust the Minister will ensure that no decisions are taken that will result in a lower level of service than is currently being provided.

10.9 am

Mr. Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I too congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) on securing the debate and on taking such a close interest in St. Richard's hospital in his constituency.

The hospital also serves a large number of people in my constituency and my constituents share the concern that my hon. Friend succinctly expressed about the hospital's financial position and its future. I underline what he said about the way the hospital is perceived by the local community. According to the objective measures of performance indicators, it is a very efficient hospital, topping the league; also, on the crucial measure of patient satisfaction, The Sunday Times gave it a score of 82 per cent., which is the highest in the south-east. By all measures, this is an extremely good local hospital, and we should start from that position.

[Mr. Nick Herbert]

There are considerable and growing pressures on the hospital because of the nature of the local population, and we need to recognise that. Nearly 25 per cent. of the local population are over 65, and the number of over-65s is forecast to increase by nearly a fifth in the next decade. This is an area where the population has grown at twice the national rate for nearly a century. Controversial proposals to increase the number of houses in the area are being driven through, so the population pressures will increase. Furthermore, the area gets a large number of visitors because it is very popular with tourists. Chichester, my town of Arundel and the south downs receive a large number of visitors, adding to the pressures on the hospital. That underlines the need for a continuing local hospital to serve the needs of the growing and elderly population.

I should therefore like to question a view that I believe may be prevalent among senior NHS management, to which my hon. Friend alluded—that too many people in the area are being sent to hospital. In the first place, that view does not recognise the situation, the demographics, the growing pressures that the hospital will face and the continuing need for the hospital. Secondly, even if it were true that too many people were being sent to hospital, that certainly does not provide any kind of solution to the financial situation of the trust. If that was part of the problem, and I am not sure that I would accept that—I would like to know whether that is the Government's view—it would seem to suggest that there was no need for trust provision on such a scale, and that would concern me. I will come to that in a minute.

We have to recognise that the problem affects the whole health economy. In meetings with the chairman of the trust, I was encouraged to hear that he is working closely with the chairman of the PCT. We have to recognise that a solution for one of the bodies may produce problems for the other. Therefore it is necessary to recognise that there is an underlying deficit in the whole health economy. Once one recognises that, it is possible to view the short-term measures that the trust has been required to undertake with a certain amount of cynicism. Things like asset disposal and sale and leaseback schemes can only be short-term fixes for an underlying deficit and, in themselves, are very disruptive and problematic.

I agree with my hon. Friend's points about the RAB scheme. It is worth pointing out, as did the public interest report published last month, that under the RAB scheme, if the underlying deficit is not addressed, then because of the need under NHS accounting rules to roll forward deficits and meet them by penalising the amount of grant that the hospital receives, by the end of 2007–08—only a few years away—the accumulated deficit will be £142 million, a sum considerably in excess of the trust's income. That demonstrates the absurdity of the RAB rules and the need to address the structural, underlying deficit that affects the entire local economy, not only the trust.

The real problem, as my hon. Friends have clearly put it, is that activity is not being matched by income and that the trust is paid below tariff. The results are perverse, which is a great pity. All too often in the public sector, good, efficient local institutions do their job and increase activity, and are penalised for it rather than rewarded. We cannot have a system that produces such results.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester made a very good point about the tariff, and drew attention to the fact that if the hospital was simply relocated a few miles to the west and if it paid the same tariff as a neighbouring trust, these deficit problems would simply not exist on the same scale.

That point can also be made in another way. In its contribution to the strategic review, the trust has been forced to consider whether some sort of arrangement or even merger with Portsmouth would be a viable option. The trust pointed out that that would not produce the solution that was hoped for, because unless the tariff situation was dealt with, it would increase costs because the local PCT would have to send patients to Portsmouth trust, which has higher costs than Chichester. That demonstrates the absurdity of the tariff situation.

I view with particularly grave concern any suggestion that there might be a gradual transfer of activity to Portsmouth and away from St. Richard's. My constituents live to the east and north-east of St. Richard's and are currently served by the hospital. They would be furthest away from Portsmouth, and I am very aware, from debates happening on the east side of my constituency some 40 miles away, of the problems caused by a stealthy determination to downgrade local facilities in favour of placing them in a different hospital some miles away from a rural area. That has happened at the Princess Royal hospital in Haywards Heath, whose accident and emergency facilities are being downgraded in favour of sending people to the Royal Sussex hospital in Brighton.

Consultants are up in arms about these proposals, as are local people, who fear, with some justification, that there is an agenda to regionalise NHS provision. People in rural areas have grave concerns about that. They want local hospitals to continue to exist, particularly in rural areas with a population of elderly people who find it difficult to travel.

As well as addressing the deficit, I hope that the Minister will take on board the fact that the national, and certainly the local, mood is for the preservation of good local facilities, and that behind-the-scenes moves to rationalise facilities are very damaging to the entire political process, particularly when local people are not properly consulted or consulted in a way that does not meet with their approval.

There is also an urgency to the situation confronting St. Richard's. It is very unsatisfactory that the trust should be forced to take part in a series of crisis meetings with the strategic health authority and then be in an acute cash-strapped position. The public interest report last month described that position as extremely serious. At one point, payments were frozen to creditors, which is unacceptable, particularly when those creditors could be in the private sector. At another point, the trust was forced to freeze purchase orders, which could have had an effect on service delivery if essential supplies, such as food and drugs, were unavailable.

One of the ways in which the trust has dealt with its cash position is by renegotiating its payment schedule with the contractors who built the Chichester treatment centre. That may have been a sensible short-term measure to ameliorate its position, and I am sure that it was, but the irony is that it increases costs for the trust in the longer term. It is a good example of a measure being forced on the trust that does not deal with its short-term problem.

The trust has little local control over national costs. Generally, national health service managers who are confronted by problems of the kind in question have little control over their costs, which constrains their ability to deal with structural problems like the one that I mentioned. The public interest report pointed out that a substantial portion of the current deficit—about £3.2 million, which is about 25 per cent.—relates to national developments. It did not specify what they were. What can the trust do about them?

That matter points to a wider problem, which I hope that the Minister will take on board, if she does not respond to it immediately—the extent to which the large spending increases in the national health service are being absorbed in higher costs. The King's Fund—an independent health body, as the Minister knows—estimated at the time of the general election that 73 per cent. of NHS spending increases are being absorbed in higher costs.

The NHS overall faces year-on-year spending increases that are leading to stored up spending costs. The think tank of which I used to be director, Reform, has estimated that by 2010 the NHS will have to find an extra £10 billion just to stand still, because of meeting those stored up cost commitments: the new primary care contract, more staff, new IT and more expensive drugs.

Mr. Tyrie: I have already had a good innings, so I shall try to be brief. My hon. Friend is right to mention the £3.2 million extra costs from central initiatives. Is he also aware that funding was provided to the tune of £17 million for the Chichester treatment centre, which was recently opened, but that the running of it has not been funded? The running costs of about £4.2 million have come the trust's way, but the hospital is not getting the money. That is another extra, unexpected burden.

Mr. Herbert: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point. I was going to discuss the Chichester treatment centre. He is right about that.

The treatment centre is a good example of the trust doing what the Government would like it to do. The existence of the new treatment centre, which is just coming on stream, is a good example of one of the perceived successes of Government policy on health care. When a hospital trust is doing as the Government want and performing a good service for the community, whose demands will only increase, it is unfortunate that we should allow a structural deficit to go unaddressed and force the trust into a position in which it must take improbable and short-term measures.

I hope, on behalf of my constituents, who value the hospital greatly, that the Minister will be able to deal with the great concerns about the situation affecting this good trust.

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): I congratulate the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) on securing the debate, which has been informative and illuminating. It has cast light on many issues that the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust faces, and it has raised wider questions about the financial management of NHS trusts, which I hope that the Minister will deal with later this morning—issues of financial management, the implications of payment by results, resource allocation and the funding formula.

We have heard today how the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust, like many other hospital trusts, now has a record deficit. We have heard that the recent PricewaterhouseCoopers report, published in June, reported an accumulated deficit of £20.5 million in 2004–05. Because current accounting rules dictate that any deficit recorded in one year must be recovered the next, the forecast deficit for 2005–06 will be £30 million, and £51 million by the end of that year. That represents over 60 per cent. of the trust's annual income.

In its current circumstances, the trust looks in danger of becoming trapped in a downward spiral of financial difficulties, but it is not the only NHS trust reporting such problems. In 2002–03, seven NHS trusts reported deficits; by 2003–04, that had grown to 12 trusts. In both years, the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS Trust's Trelisk hospital, which serves me and my constituents, was sadly represented in those figures, despite providing excellent care and efficiency in every other respect. There is a concern that not only is the number of trusts reporting deficits rising, but the size of those deficits is growing. That is worrying, not just because of the north-south divide that was reported by other hon. Members, but because it is a rural-urban divide. Cornwall is a lot further south, but there is a rural-urban divide issue. Real consideration must be made of what the actual health care needs in rural areas are, not only in terms of age, but in terms of the provision of health care services in many different ways. I would appreciate the Minister's comments on what she may be able to do about such problems.

This morning's discussions touched only briefly on what the contributory factors to those deficits may be, and we have heard a lot about the problems of St. Richard's. I should like to speak briefly about some other areas that have contributed to the problems that other trusts reporting deficits have experienced. One of the first areas is the lack of financial understanding of many board members of hospital trusts. That has been highlighted by the conclusions of the National Audit Office and the Audit Commission's report on financial management, which was published a few weeks ago. It stated that in many cases,

"the Boards and Chief Executives failed to understand fully their body's financial position and ensure that action is being taken to remedy any problems."

The report also asked for recognition of the fact that boards often do not have the financial skills to drive forward improvements in their financial position. Although that may not be the case with the NHS trusts about which we have heard today, it is certainly the case with many other trusts that are reporting deficits.

The report also made a series of recommendations for executive and non-executive board members as well as for management, and I hope that the Minister will confirm that the Department will accept those recommendations and ensure that they are taken up by the NHS trust boards. Many of the recommendations make eminent sense, and it seems amazing that they are not already being taken on. They include ensuring that the position given by the financial reports is understood by all the board members, and that non-recurrent income is clearly identified.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): I am listening very carefully to the hon. Lady, but I must advise her that she must confine her remarks to the subject of the debate, which is funding for the Royal West Sussex NHS trust.

Julia Goldsworthy: Thank you, Mr. O'Hara. I hope that more will be done to help to ensure that board members understand and can predict their financial situation. The resource accounting and budgeting may not help them to do that. The concern is not simply about financial mismanagement, but about whether that represents good value for money for the taxpayer, and about the impact that recovering those deficits will have on the quality of care that patients receive. That concern has been highlighted.

The Royal West Sussex NHS Trust has made the difficult decision to cut an operating theatre and two wards to help to recover some of its deficits. Some of the other deficit recovery mechanisms have already been discussed this morning. The cuts may help to recover costs, but I am not clear how such measures will do anything but impact negatively on the quality of care that patients receive. The hon. Members for Chichester and for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Herbert) gave further examples. Given that the trust has met all its key targets apart from that of financial management, it is difficult to see how it can resolve the problem without having an impact on patient care.

I have already referred briefly to the fact that something has to be done with the funding formula. Again, that reflects my experiences with the Royal Cornwall Hospitals NHS Trust, which lost a star rating not because of the level of patient care or the efficiency and hard work of the staff but because of financial management problems. There is a widespread concern among Members who represent rural areas that the existing funding formula does not accurately represent need, and I hope that it will be reviewed.

I have one last question for the Minister. Financial difficulties prevent the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust from switching to foundation trust status, which would give it greater financial independence. However, I wonder whether financial independence automatically means greater financial stability. The Healthcare Commission's review of NHS foundation trusts, published yesterday, found that four foundation trusts have a projected financial deficit and that changes such as payment by results remain major risks. Although payment by results may help the West Sussex trust recover from its financial difficulties, for many others it will cause huge difficulties.

Given that the Government intend all NHS trusts ultimately to achieve foundation status, and given that some of those foundation trusts already face financial difficulties, will the Minister allow those trusts and hospitals to go bust if they encounter the sort of financial difficulties faced by St. Richard's? That is the logical extension of market-based reforms in the NHS, but the question has not yet been answered. Is it the Minister's view that continual changes such as payment by results are increasing those risks—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. I remind the hon. Lady once again not to stray too far from the specific subject of the debate.

Julia Goldsworthy: I would appreciate hearing the Minister's views; her answers are important not only for the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust but more widely. Once again, I congratulate the hon. Member for Chichester on securing the debate.

10.32 am

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) and my other hon. Friends who have spoken. I am responding with two hats, Mr. O'Hara—as the Opposition health spokesman and as a West Sussex Member whose constituency is covered by the neighbouring trust.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester particularly because he has form; he is well known for taking up the cause of local health establishments. Indeed, I remember a debate held in this Chamber some years ago on the King Edward VII hospital at Midhurst, and it is due in no small part to my hon. Friend's efforts that that hospital has survived. He is now rightly taking up the cause of another centre of excellence in his constituency that benefits many thousands of people in West Sussex and Hampshire. I record my warm congratulations to him on that.

I know the trust well, as I said, it is one of my neighbouring trusts. It has problems because of its size; as my hon. Friend said, it serves 212,000 people in the local community in West Sussex and in Hampshire. However, it is a particularly elderly population—I hasten to add that it is not quite as elderly as the population of Worthing—with about 25 per cent. being over 65. As we heard, a higher proportion are over 85, with all the additional costs on health care that that involves. The trust serves a large rural area that is difficult to manage.

The hospital has been hit particularly badly by its financial deficits, despite having an excellent reputation. My hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Herbert) pointed out that, at the current rate of growth, the deficit will be £142 million some years ahead. The accumulative deficit is forecast to be about £51 million in 2005–06. That is a large percentage of the trust's income. However, the report that the trust gave to the board earlier in the financial year warned of the risk that the trust would not break even in the year 2004–05. There is a heck of a difference between not breaking even and forecasting a deficit in the past year of about £14 million. I wonder how those projections could have been so askew.

The hospital is, by all accounts, excellent. It was awarded two stars by the Healthcare Commission, the reference costs are 90 per cent. of the national average, putting it in the best—15th—percentile, and the trust has been in the CHKS Ltd. top 40 UK hospitals for clinical performance for each of the five years. The hospital is consistently good, with excellent clinical outcomes, excellent patient satisfaction, excellent staff satisfaction—it is in the top 20 per cent. for quality of senior management leadership according to the NHS national staff survey—and it has held a whole hospital charter mark for excellence in public service for three successive year terms since 1996.

The hospital is doing its job rather well in terms of the quality of its health care and its reputation among its customers and staff, and is financially efficient. It has a highly respected chief executive who would be prized at any other trust in the country. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester said, the hospital is largely doing what the Government want it to.

The real problem with the finances is the artificiality of the way in which accounting is done. My hon. Friend told us about resource accounting problems, and we have heard that the tariff system has been partially implemented for elective care only, which has yielded just over £1 million in extra income for the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust, whereas full implementation was expected to raise an extra £10 million in this financial year, and to reach £16 million in additional income by 2008–09, which would turn the deficit into surplus. Will the Minister explain why the brakes were applied in the tariff procedure applied to the trust?

Despite lengthy negotiations with the Western Sussex primary care trust and having sought strategic health authority arbitration over the past two years, the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust is paid significantly below the tariff—the assessment is 80 per cent. of the tariff in 2004–05. That explains why the trust can be efficient yet in deficit. The key issue is that of local price. The trust is clearly efficient, but is paid significantly below the national average.

The increase in trust activity is another issue. As was pointed out in the PricewaterhouseCoopers public interest report, the increase in trust activity has not been matched by an increase in income. The report also says:

"Boards are under . . . competing . . . pressures to achieve clinical targets set by the Department of Health and to achieve financial balance."

That is the problem that we face.

Where does the trust go from here? My hon. Friend told us that it has come up with total savings targets of £5.1 million for the coming financial year, including a cost reduction programme of £1.2 million. The trust is working closely with the local PCT; together they have identified 10 streams of service redesign, which are projected to yield savings of £9 million across the local economy over three years. It has really pulled out all the stops, but the trust has indicated that the current level of savings of £5.1 million is the maximum that could be achieved this year, and that the board does not feel able, on the grounds of governance, to agree to a business plan that cannot realistically be delivered. I am sure that that is what the Government would want it to do. We do not want trust boards to cut costs for the sake of meeting artificial targets that could seriously imperil the quality and level of health care offered by the trusts. That is what the board appears, rightly, to want to avoid.

How does the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust balance its financial position? As we have heard from my hon. Friends the Members for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) and for Arundel and South Downs, it could be forced to take a number of cost-cutting measures. However, the hospital already has a low nursing ratio, so would that mean even shorter stays in a hospital that is already efficient in its throughput of patients? That, in turn, would mean pressure on rehabilitation services. As I mentioned, there are already severe pressures on the PCT in dealing with an increasingly elderly population, and it would be a false economy not to continue its current work. The situation would come full circle as those people would end up back in hospital, with all the financial and personal misery that that would cause.

What will the hospital do? Will it reduce the number of operations? The sticking-plaster effect of the sale of assets is purely a short-term solution. Will it have a recruitment freeze? That would lead in the short term only to a reduction in the work that it could carry out. Will it have to cut the information technology budget, and what is the future of the £4.2 million running costs of the treatment centre?

As has been said, many of the measures that have contributed to a financial deficit are out of the hospital trust's hands: targets to reduce waiting times; a shortage of skilled staff; the new GP contract; "Agenda for Change"; the new consultant contract; the measures against MRSA; the European working time directive; implementation of electronic patient records; payment by results; and quality and outcome frameworks. All of these measures, rightly or wrongly, were imposed by the Government, and the hospital trust must comply with them. That is the problem.

My final point is about scapegoating—who is being blamed for the problems. We have already seen the resignation of the trust's chairman, which in part was down to the defence of the chief executive, on whom pressure was put to resign. However, he has an excellent reputation, and the chairman fell on her sword in his place. That is happening all over the place. In the same strategic health authority—Surrey and Sussex—we lost the chairman, the chief executive and three non-executive directors, who left the trust board in May in the light of a £30 million deficit. The chairman of the Bradford Teaching Hospitals foundation trust was sacked, and the Royal Wolverhampton Hospitals NHS Trust non-executive board was ordered to stand down. The story goes on and on. There is a real fear that people in both executive and non-executive roles are being scapegoated throughout the country, but particularly in the Surrey and Sussex strategic health authority area, where we seem to have had a disproportionate number of dismissals in the past couple of years.

That problem has been pointed out in the Health Service Journal, not least by the person responsible for the Monitor report and the head of the NHS Appointments Commission. The latter has acknowledged that under current arrangements non-executives can be left vulnerable:

"The huge number of committees is disastrous. It removes things from the board's agenda and means the board cannot get a grip on what's going on."

The journal article continues:

"A similar point is made by Jan Filochowski, NHS Fellow at the Judge Institute of Management at Cambridge University. He has seen more than his fair share of struggling NHS organisations in his role as a management troubleshooter . . . He says: 'In my experience of going round the country, I find that boards, chairs and non-executives are sometimes afraid of being challenging enough or do not know how to be challenging enough in order to unearth problems and deal with them.'

[Tim Loughton]

There is a balance to be struck between supportiveness and scrutiny. 'Boards need to have both.'"

My point is that there are serious financial pressures, and in many cases, as with the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust, those pressures are on hospitals that are delivering what the Government want and doing a good job.

I finish with some questions for the Minister. What help will be forthcoming from the Government? Her Department has said that it is prepared to consider sympathetically the financial plight of some indebted trusts. We are looking not for bail-outs but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester has said, for the trusts that are doing a good job to be paid what they are due. What is the full extent of the problem? Reports have suggested that deficits of hospital trusts amount to at least £1 billion and that they are getting worse. Where has the money gone? Are the Government really prepared to let an excellent hospital and hospital trust like St. Richard's go to the wall simply by doing their bidding and by having to work within a very artificial financial situation?

10.45 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) on securing today's debate on funding for the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust. I also thank the hon. Members for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) and for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Herbert) and the Opposition Front-Bench speakers, the hon. Members for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) and for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton), for their contributions.

There have been some thoughtful contributions today, reflecting the complexity of issues in terms of the demands on the health service. Every day it seems that there is a discovery—a new drug or a new way of helping people. In my primary role as the Public Health Minister I am interested in what we can do at the prevention end of health services to reduce the number of people who need treatment for cancer or coronary heart disease, which are our two major killers. Excellent work is going on in our hospitals, but there is also recognition by those working in the NHS that we could do more to reduce the number of patients presenting in the first place. That demonstrates the complexity of the health service and how it is run.

Local needs vary around the country. For example, I represent Don Valley in Doncaster in South Yorkshire, which may differ greatly on a number of health indices from Surrey and Sussex, although there will be some commonalities in other areas. It was for those reasons that we felt that we could not micro-manage hospitals and services from the centre and that it was right and proper, while having a national framework, to ensure that decisions about health service needs were made at a more local level.

A number of concerns have been expressed today about St. Richard's and its financial situation. I agree that the trust and other local NHS organisations in Surrey and Sussex are facing significant financial challenges, but I am assured that people are trying to address them. There is no easy solution in some of these areas. I will try to respond to the specifics today and if I do not cover everything in the time that I have left I will write to hon. Members.

First, as has been pointed out, performance at the trust has been consistently good, and I pay tribute to all the staff who are dedicated to the process of delivering good quality services. The trust has achieved and continues to achieve the national standards set out in the NHS plan. Published figures for May 2005 show that no patients are waiting more than nine months for in-patient treatment. Published figures for March 2005 show that no patients are waiting more than 17 weeks for out-patient treatment. Latest published figures for accident and emergency waits show that 98.8 per cent. of patients spent less than four hours in the accident and emergency department, and the trust qualified for all incentive payments. One hundred per cent. of urgent referrals for suspected cancer were seen by a specialist within two weeks.

Given those results and that efficiency, it has been asked why the trust finds itself in this difficult financial situation. Again, that demonstrates the complexities of running hospitals. It is not beyond our comprehension that, even while there are efficiencies and good clinical service, there can still be underlying problems of financial management. That is one issue that the discussions between the strategic health authority, the primary care trusts and the hospital are covering. Under the payment by results regime, the trust has a reference cost index of 90, as the hon. Member for Chichester said. That is indicative of costs efficiency and there is no doubt that under payment by results, over the next few years the hospital will benefit.

Mr. Tyrie: Could the Minister say categorically when the hospital will be able to benefit from obtaining the full national tariff under payment by results?

Caroline Flint: The roll-out is expected over the next three to four years, so I cannot give a specific answer about that hospital, but we have identified a problem in the system that has meant that hospitals such as St. Richard's have not been receiving the payment that they deserve, and that is why we have introduced the new system. I hope that the hon. Gentleman can understand that it is a national system whose roll-out must be handled carefully. However, payment by results is not the only answer to the problems faced by the trust in trying to overcome its forecast deficit of £33,843,000 for 2005–06. We know through the independent review that in October 2004 the trust reported a forecast deficit of just over £9 million. That was a significant increase on the figure in the report of the previous month. I think that the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham asked how the figures could change so substantially within a month.

In October 2004, the SHA board agreed to commission an independent review to advise the SHA, among others, on whether the trust had a viable and robust plan to deliver financial balance in the current financial year and on a long-term sustainable basis. The review found that the trust had not taken decisive action early enough and had relied on the availability of non-recurrent funding and the prospect of a lasting solution. In addition, the financial recovery plans and contingency plans were not considered deliverable. The independent review was presented to the trust and in December it accepted all the recommendations, including the recommendations to consider a more focused approach to recovery planning and to examine critically all the areas for cost savings advocated in the SHA's "improving financial health" guidance. So the hospital has acknowledged that it is not just a question of how payment by results will help it in future and that it has to consider the problems of financial management overall.

In March the trust's auditors, PricewaterhouseCoopers, wrote to the trust board expressing concern about the financial standing of the trust and issued a public interest report. The report advised that arrangements should be put in place to support the trust's cash position while it recovers, that the trust needs to put in place a cash management strategy that enables it to return to normal supply and payment practices, that that should be done in partnership with the Western Sussex PCT and the SHA and that the Department of Health should be involved if necessary to ensure that the needs of the local health economy are addressed. It is a complex situation.

Mr. Tyrie: By far the most important single sentence in the PWC report to which the Minister refers is the one that states that an increase in the trust's activity level

"has not been matched by a similar increase in income."

The Minister has said that the hospital has not been receiving the payment that it deserves for its treatments, but at the same time she seems to be suggesting that even if it had been, it would still have a financial problem. All the people who have considered this matter extremely carefully have concluded that that is not the case. If the hospital were properly paid for the treatment that it was providing, there would not be a deficit at St. Richard's; there would be a surplus. That is the nub of the problem.

Caroline Flint: I am not convinced that that is the only part of the problem. There are other areas of deficiency in which the hospital has to address how it runs the organisation and how it can improve. For example, there have been difficulties and work has been done on reducing the length of stays in emergency admissions. A number of other issues are included in the discussions with the SHA and the Department of Health on improving the way in which the hospital's finances and services are managed. The issue is about much more than just how payment by result will help to ease the situation.

Rationing was mentioned earlier in the debate. The local NHS must ensure that it uses its resources to commission appropriate levels of service. Over the next two years, PCT income will increase by some 17 per cent. PCTs can commission for required levels of activity and service, but there must be local discussion about what services and activity the commissioning trust wants.

Mr. Gibb: But how will issues such as the length of stay in hospitals be dealt with if the number of district nurses is simultaneously cut by 30 per cent.?

Caroline Flint: I note the hon. Gentleman's point about district nurses. I do not have full details about that situation, but PCTs, SHAs and trusts have responsibility for assessing capacity and work force requirements for the services that they are to deliver. In doing that, they must consider the issues surrounding services in the community and in the hospitals. There must be some synergy in determining when people leave hospital and the services that would be needed in the community to shorten a hospital stay, if that is appropriate, but I cannot comment in detail on the case mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

As I said, the local NHS must ensure that it uses its resources to commission appropriate levels of service. Although the Royal West Sussex NHS Trust is efficient in several areas and is rated highly, there is an understanding that more needs to be done in respect of its overall financial accountability. Every year, it has failed to break even or to recover its position, so the debt problem has accumulated. I give the example of a neighbouring trust, the Worthing and Southlands Hospitals NHS Trust, which is in circumstances similar to those of the Royal West Sussex. It has a relatively low reference cost. It is funded at a similar tariff, yet it broke even in the financial year 2004–05. I am not saying that every trust's situation is exactly the same, but we must look more deeply into why another trust in similar circumstances seems to be doing better in certain areas.

Mr. Tyrie: The Minister said that we need to look more deeply, but she has failed to provide anything of substance when she does that. As far as I can tell, the only thing that she has come up with so far is the suggestion that, despite the fact that the hospital is more efficient than almost any other and despite the fact that it does extremely well on almost every indicator, it needs to shorten the length of stay in hospital. However, it already has among the shortest stay lengths of any hospital trust.

Caroline Flint: That was just one example. The fact is that the hospital has failed to deliver robust recovery plans—that is part of the discussions at present. [Interruption.] It is one of the reasons why the public interest report was published and why the SHA and others are working very hard with the trust to deal with the situation and to resolve some of its problems. I am sure that the SHA would be happy to speak with hon. Members in more detail, should they require it, about some of the other issues around recovering the situation—it is not just a straightforward matter of cutting services. Improving services and making them more efficient is not always about more money; it may be about making better use of resources.

In the time left, I wish to say something about super-hospitals. As I have said before, we have no plans to dictate on super-hospitals. It is for local commissioners to decide, in the interest of their local communities, what services are needed. The fact is that more money has gone into the NHS under this Government than ever before. PCTs will receive large increases during the next two years. Financial management accountability is absolutely right and proper, and that means that we must analyse clearly the small number of organisations that are going into deficit.

On-course Betting

11 am

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green) (Con): The Minister may find, as I did, that this issue is immensely complicated; but he will know that on-course bookmaking on an approved race course is rendered legal by reason of the provisions of section 1(5)(a) of the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963. As well as responsibility for the administration and conduct of on-course betting rings, the National Joint Pitch Council—NJPC—has a stated aim of encouraging the continuing development of on-course betting markets for the benefit of racegoers, bookmakers, race courses and, through a strong starting price, off-course punters.

Prior to 1998, most in the industry recognised that there was some need to modify the structure of on-course betting. That is why it was recommended by the Horserace Betting Levy Board review committee and agreed by all interested parties that the seniority system used by the old regime to determine pitch positions be maintained in principle, but amended to provide greater flexibility. A system of transferring seniority by auction was then introduced by the expiry date of 7 October 1998. The old regime lists of bookmakers at each racecourse were to be merged into a new methodology for determining the various pitch positions. The NJPC was meant to design this methodology, which had at its heart the existing seniority of bookmakers.

I am concerned, however, because what I have seen and what I have heard from several people suggests that the NJPC utterly failed to implement the methodology fairly, impartially and reasonably.

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): I thank the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) for giving way, and I should like to support his raising of the issue by highlighting the case of my constituents Donald and Garry Morrill, who have been adversely affected by the changes introduced by the NJPC. At their home racecourse of Brighton, they had a seniority position of No. 6 in 1998; however, after the changes, they were allocated position No. 14. Such changes have been reflected at race courses throughout Britain, and it has caused my constituents a great deal of financial hardship.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The hon. Lady will find that we have become one family, because one member of that family lives in my constituency. We may be looking across the Chamber at each other, but perhaps we have just joined hands. I hope that in doing so I do not ruin her future career.

I became concerned about this matter, because the more I looked into it, the more I realised that the process had been skewed at the outset. I rarely apply for Westminster Hall debates or for Adjournment debates in the House unless I think that a genuine injustice is taking place, and I really believe that that is the case.

I have become interested in the matter, much like the hon. Member for Hove (Ms Barlow), because my constituent John Morrill, from the same family, and all his other relations to whom she referred, have all been involved historically in the industry. Their livelihoods have been damaged as a result of the NJPC's failure to do as it was meant to. However, the Morrill family are not alone. Many more have suffered as well, but they have been unable for various reasons to take up the issue. Part of the problem is that when bookmakers have challenged the process, the NJPC and the Horserace Betting Levy Board have failed to provide any clarity or define why there were discrepancies and why the methodology was not evenly applied to national, consistent criteria, as agreed by all parties.

My constituents and those of the hon. Lady trade under the name H. Murrel and Taffy, and between them they have many years' experience of trading as on-course bookmakers. In 1963, Mr. Don Morrill was granted a bookmaker's permit under the provisions of the 1963 Act. The family business of bookmakers has been conducted by John Morrill's family, Don Morrill's family and now Garry's family since 1929, when their grandfather started the business in his own right. The business has strong family links.

A seniority listing means everything to a bookmaker, so the start date when they commenced trading is crucial. It is vital, and I say to the Minister that until one gets one's head around that point, it is difficult to understand these matters. My constituents and those of the hon. Lady, like all other bookmakers, guard their start dates as most of us would guard our birth certificates. Ultimately, they are the only asset that a bookmaker has.

At the heart of the present failure lies a discrepancy. Although the NJPC agreed that it would incorporate the existing seniority lists from the different bookmakers' protection associations, it has admitted—in part and rather grudgingly—that it did not do that as per the agreement. After it contrived the methodology, it now seems to be blaming everyone else for why that did not take place. For example, I have a letter that was sent by the then chief executive of the NJPC on 6 November 2001 to a constituent of mine. The letter states: "The Southern BPA lists"—the seniority lists—

"were not complete and as such continuity of the information on dates was not available. However, this had no effect on the determination of the Bookmakers List."

That is utter nonsense. As I understand it, he is backed up by Mr. Brack—I want to come back to this—who states quite a lot that there is no connection between the bodies and talks about their being independent, yet the words used almost seem like they were drafted by the same person.

In a statement in 2004, Mr. Brack said: "The affiliated associations"—I have referred to them already—

"for the Southern ... and Welsh ... areas were unable or unwilling to supply their own lists."

One would think that the process could not be undertaken if they did not supply their lists, yet my constituent wrote to those same groups and received a letter stating that

"at a meeting held at Brighton racecourse, Richard Marriott (NJPC) did congratulate the Southern BPA in supplying the allocation, seniority and waiting lists to the NJPC in a prompt and efficient manner, as witnessed by Mr. A. H. Styles."

Another letter went on to say that

"the seniority lists of the southern BPA were in order at the time the NJPC took over in October" of the same year.

Let us take the version from the levy board and the NJPC and compare it with yet another document, which is a letter that was written almost at the same time, in 2001. It was from the same person, Mr. Reams, who was the chief executive who made the previous statement, and was written to a Mr. Overton, who was involved in the industry. Mr. Reams answered a question from Mr. Overton by stating:

"I can confirm that the methodology used to determine commensurate seniority was based on commencement dates in the ring either of you personally or you as an inheritor."

That completely knocks the first view on the head. How can there be any seniority if apparently the lists were never received and if they were not in order? Yet, somehow, in that letter, Mr. Reams is able to assure the individual concerned of his seniority. That is utter nonsense.

My constituent and others have been involved in this dispute with the NJPC for nearly six years and are no closer to an agreement. Even a cursory glance at this process suggests that the NJPC is engaged in a protracted attempt to grind down my constituent and the hon. Lady's constituents in the hope that they have a limit to their resources that is less than that of the NJPC.

Perhaps there is a need to explain why this argument over seniority matters so much. I will attempt to do that. From October 1998, the NJPC introduced a new system of seniority whereby the seniority positions held by bookmakers became seniority positions on what is essentially a picking list. That resulted in a modification to the seniority system in that those on the bookmakers' list for a ring became entitled, in order of number on the picking list, to choose their pitch in order of seniority, instead of simply being allocated the next highest numbered pitch available after allocation to more senior bookmakers in the ring.

The 1998 rules also enabled and permitted trading in seniority positions so that a seniority position now had a realisable capital value—I want to return to that later. For my constituent and others, we are talking about something that is significantly less than was the case with the equivalent positions that they held in 1998—the hon. Lady has alluded to this—because they have been given an improper allocation pick from which to choose a pitch. The position of the pitch is all-important. It helps to determine market price and the access of would-be punters.

The relationship between the NJPC and the levy board is well worth considering. I advise the Minister to think carefully about this. We hear constant assurances that they are separated. I know that the levy board is due to be wound up, but I do not think that that has a bearing on the matter because the history of this is part of the injustice. I am concerned about the peculiar nature of the relationship.

The NJPC derives its powers from the certificate of approval granted to racecourses by the levy board. Recently Mr Brack, chief executive of the levy board, said in an interesting statement that it is not "part of the HBLB's role to ensure or guarantee the correctness of each and every decision of the NJPC."

He goes on to say:

"The NJPC is an independent body whose presence, role and continued effectiveness the HBLB insists upon as part of its approval for racecourse betting."

That is interesting, but if it is so independent, how is it that the levy board has the final say on the rules governing the operation of the NJPC? If it is so independent, how is it that the levy board also contributed about £50,000 towards the costs incurred by the NJPC in dealing with Office of Fair Trading investigation?

The NJPC is part of the levy board's pension fund, and when I examined its accounts I was staggered to find it is in deficit by £29 million. How is it that the levy board, which is involved with the NJPC, has decided to sort out, resolve and pay off that deficit with no reference to the fact that the NJPC is a partner and should also make some contribution? It is also a matter of some concern that this money should be used for that purpose in the first place. That is the most peculiar independence I have ever heard of. It is certainly is not the definition of the independence applied to a nation state, and it does not apply here. Those bodies are not independent: they are one and the san...

I am concerned that the NJPC, under that guise, has gone on to create further confusion because it has said that it is not contractually bound or obliged to the bookmakers. Oh really? I thought that was what it was set up for in the first place. Every day, as I understand it, if a licensed bookmaker wishes to operate from the ring, they have to sign the official badge box list and attendance register and pay £11 to the NJPC. One might ask, "What for?" I would like to read what is written on that list that must be signed every day, and on the badge that the racecourse supplies:

"The issue of a betting badge is conditional upon the Bookmaker, his Authorised Representatives and employers agreeing to be bound by the provisions of the National Pitch Rules and the Rules of Racing."

It also states that the rules are

"promulgated by the National Joint Pitch Council".

On the badge from the racecourse it states categorically that the racecourse that is, the rules of the NJPC. If it has no obligation or contractual obligation, what is the money for? Why are the bookmakers forced to sign some sort of contract, and what is the point of it all? One might ask what the point of the NJPC is in the first place if it discharges all of its responsibilities by a series of denials.

"reserves the right at its discretion to expel anyone who fails to comply with the above"—

I turn to another area of real concern about the operation of the NJPC. There seem to be many concerns about the way in which some of the earlier—perhaps even current—transactions and sales of pitches were conducted. That leads me to concerns about the possibility of fraud. As we know, the NJPC retained a monopoly on the sale of pitch auctions: from 1998 to December 1999 it had a sales hammer turnover of £22 million which earned it a commission at 12 per cent.—before it was forced to reduce it—of £2 million in that year. However, I am concerned about how those matters were accounted for, which has led to suggestions of insider trading.

I shall draw the attention of the Minister to some documents that I have. When the NJPC conducted its business the rules were very clear. It was not supposed to deal with people who did not have a bookmaker's licence. However, I have a letter from the NJPC to a

[Mr. Duncan Smith]

Mr. Nickels and an invoice that shows that the sale of what was essentially a bookmaking business took place to a Mr. Hyman. The NJPC confirms that:the sale of what was essentially a bookmaking business took place to a Mr. Hyman. The NJPC confirms that. It states:

"Mr. Hyman's first permit was registered with Basildon Magistrates Court on 13 July 1999."

The sale took place in December 1998—one year before that. So, the NJPC broke its own rules. It also broke its rules because it is supposed to sell not to an individual but to a registered company, which did not happen in this case. Furthermore, I have seen documents relating to much of the same process that show that the amount that the business was sold for did not go through the books properly. We are talking about a private sale—not the sale of a company—for £25,000, yet the invoice received from the NJPC, which includes its commission, demonstrates that the business was sold for a lower price.

I do not have reams of evidence, but I suggest that there are real problems and issues concerning what took place in the early years. There is a general undercurrent of feeling that if such things were happening in the City of London, we would not tolerate them. We would have looked into the problem. It would be referred to as insider dealing, which is not acceptable. However, because it is affecting racing, nobody really cares.

My last concern, which I want to explain to the Minister clearly, is about the way in which the new process for selling pitches opens the door to abuse, without proper checks and balances in the form of an organisation that we have respect for and believe has responsibility. I do not believe that the organisation has responsibility. Criminal money, possibly from outside the country, may be used. We hear stories abounding about Russian money and about others intent on perverting processes for their own ends. There is lots of money available. We have seen money travelling in a way that was not seen previously.

If an organisation gets control of certain pitches by the rails, it can begin to control the starting price. Controlling the starting price can lead to a skewing of what is, essentially, a marketplace. There are no checks and balances in which I have confidence. I have confidence in the organisation that is meant to be looking after the issue, but what I have read so far demonstrates that it is an organisation in which we can have little or no respect or trust. That is what my concern is about. Opening the door to large sums of money and possible future control without real checks and balances could be an absolute disaster.

The view of punters is much the same. They believe that the reduction in the number of those doing business in the ring leads to lack of real competition. The OFT agrees with that. Michael Singer, the former chairman of the National Association for the Protection of Punters, has said that "choice is now very limited for punters. They cannot bet small amounts easily anymore, which is a shame. The big boys take over and the long established bookies get pushed aside".

There is no other course but for a proper investigation of what is going on. The running and control of betting should be of serious concern to us. The concerns are that the industry is not under control. I understand why the NJPC is doing its level best to draw a veil over its early operations. It knows that once those operations are opened up to scrutiny, many bookmakers will apply to have their damaged careers rectified by the NJPC. It is blocking that.

The concerns about possible criminal involvement in the sale and purchase of pitches will grow. We need to do something about it now. Newspapers—the News of the World and others—are full of such stories. That is why I say to the Minister that an inquiry is required. The running of an important industry cannot continue without proper checks and balances. Were this any other important industry in Britain, that point would be accepted.

More particularly, those in my constituency, the constituents of the hon. Member for Hove and others demand natural justice. If the House stands for anything, it is to ensure that people such as those constituents, who are not big individuals in the business world, cannot be crushed by others and have their access to justice swept aside by those who refuse to give them proper redress. Those responsible for the issue are also responsible for decency, fairness and ensuring that the industry deals with such cases in a proper and reasonable manner. My constituents, those of the hon. Lady and many others demand that they get a proper hearing. I believe that we, and the people of Britain who take an interest in the matter, have the right to demand that an inquiry should take place before things get out of hand.

11.20 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy): In initiating this debate the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) has usefully drawn attention to a subject that is of tremendous interest to his constituents and to the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Ms Barlow), who made an intervention earlier. Some serious allegations have been made, and it is right and proper that I use the 10 minutes available to me to address them.

The issue is sensitive, and it would be inappropriate for me, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, to comment on the particular allegations that he made, particularly because those allegations are currently before the courts. There is a strict rule in the House that Ministers do not refer to matters that are currently before the courts.

I could not agree more with the right hon. Gentleman, however, that on-course bookmakers must, like all other sectors of the gambling industry, be properly regulated. In particular, I agree that it is essential that gambling should be crime-free, and carried out in a fair and open way. Those were the key objectives of the Gambling Act 2005, on which there was cross-party consensus. The Act will, for the first time, bring bookmakers within the jurisdiction of a new national regulator, the Gambling Commission. I want to return to that point but, given what the right hon. Gentleman has said, it would be useful for me to start my response by outlining the history of the establishment of the National Joint Pitch Council, the involvement of the Horserace Betting Levy Board and the Government's association with those bodies.

As the right hon. Gentleman will know, the levy board is a non-departmental public body established by the Betting, Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963. Its main functions are to collect payments from bookmakers and to use them for the three statutory purposes set out in the 1963 Act: the improvement of breeds of horses; the advancement and encouragement of veterinary science or veterinary education; and the improvement of horse racing. Since 1972, the board has also had the responsibility for issuing certificates of approval to race courses, and providing for the location of betting rings for on-course bookmakers at those race courses.

At that time, the National Association of Bookmakers had responsibility for the administration of betting rings, under agreement with the Racecourse Association. However, in 1997, after seven years of disputes, that agreement was terminated by the Racecourse Association. In order to ensure that the betting rings were properly administered, the levy board instigated a review. Following an extensive consultation with all parties, it recommended that a new administrative body, to be known as the National Joint Pitch Council, should be established. It is a condition of the levy board's certificates of approval that race courses observe the national pitch rules that the board has endorsed. There are extensive rules on the conduct of those races—I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has studied them.

It is important to say that the NJPC is not a public body. Its functions are essentially administrative, and relate to the conduct of bookmakers on the race course. In a sense, it replaced an old perceived evil of the system being dead men's shoes—that is someone has something for life, passes on and someone else comes in. It was an administrative commercial arrangement between bookmakers on the race course. The NJPC introduced modernisation into betting.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield) (Lab): I appreciate the Minister's explanation of matters, but I do not agree. I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith). He made a marvellous introductory speech. The changes were less about new administrative rules and more about race courses selling pitches to the highest bidder. The fear that was expressed about the opportunity for people to move into racing to launder money is a real threat. Indeed, some one-day pitches were sold for enormous sums, such as £50,000, £60,000 or £70,000. My hon. Friend the Minister cannot slip aside such matters by saying that such practice was the result of new administrative measures. That was not the truth; it was about getting large sums to race courses.

Mr. Lammy: Such a practice was clearly used to change the old arrangement, which was dead men's shoes. It established an auction and is a commercial administrative arrangement. Of course, it is important to bear in mind that all bookmakers are licensed by magistrates throughout the country. The right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green will know that, whenever there is a commercial arrangement, there is money behind that arrangement.

The right hon. Gentleman made serious allegations about the nature of the money. Of course, the Government are concerned about money laundering and bad money, but there has been an Office of Fair Trading inquiry. As for the particular case referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, two court cases have been lost or dismissed. In that sense, it is important that the Government deal with matters on the basis of the material that is available to us. He suggested that the introduction of the open auction of on-course betting pitches has allowed potential fraud or crime to infiltrate the market. He further implied that the NJPC is complicit in that infiltration.

It is important, as the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) indicated by, to say that the auctions are open auctions for pitches that have been implemented by the NJPC at the request of the levy board to ensure greater freedom and transparency.

Mr. Duncan Smith: The auctions are not all open auctions. There are now private sales. The document to which I referred earlier covered unofficial private sales that no one has checked. It is that failure to keep a proper check and balance to which I draw attention.

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful that the right hon. Gentleman made clear the nature of the matter that he has introduced today. I took the opportunity to study the existing auction rules. They are extensive and they are available. I also contacted the levy board and asked whether the matter had been raised by the right hon. Gentleman in the past year with its chairman, Robert Hughes, former chief executive of the Local Government Association, and its deputy chair, Sir John Robb. There has been no such relationship in the past year, but the rules stand as they are; they are there to be interpreted.

The right hon. Gentleman will know that the Government have brought forward legislation and have said that they want to regulate gambling with the Gambling Commission, which will take over from the Gaming Board. An allegation of fraud or corruption must rightly be considered by the courts, the police and others and, to date, that has not led to a prosecution or conviction. When rules exist, individuals will choose to challenge them to say that they are unfair.

Neighbourhood Policing (West Mercia)

2.30 pm

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): As this is a debate of local interest and a number of hon. Members wish to make a contribution, it is likely that, in accordance with Mr. Speaker's ruling, the Front-Bench Opposition spokespersons will be limited to five minutes each.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): I am grateful that so many colleagues are present today to debate neighbourhood policing in West Mercia, particularly when they could be in Trafalgar square celebrating with what seemed to be a lot of other people. I welcome the opportunity to have this debate. Policing was an issue on the doorsteps of pretty much every local housing estate and local community that I visited during the recent election campaign. It is good so soon after it to have the opportunity to talk about policing, primarily in west Worcester, but focusing on South Worcestershire division and, importantly, Worcester city itself.

I shall begin by outlining a few facts about West Mercia constabulary. The Minister will be aware of them, but it is useful to put into context what I want to say about neighbourhood policing. West Mercia is the largest land-locked force: it covers an area of 7,429 sq km. It is the fourth largest police area in England and Wales, with a population of just over 1.1 million people. There are the equivalent of 483 people to every police officer in West Mercia, compared with an average for English non-metropolitan forces of 461, so just to reach the average, West Mercia would need an extra 100 police officers.

The constabulary works with 13 crime and disorder partnerships, two two-tier county authorities and two unitary authorities. It covers 652 parishes and 298 council wards, and it holds the Investors in People standard and the charter mark. It has 2,422 police officers, 1,657 staff, 300 special constables and 83 community support officers. The net budget of West Mercia is £172.8 million, and it has a cost base of some 95 per cent. of the average police force per head of population. It is one of the least well-resourced authorities in the country. Its spend of £141.97 per head compares with £151 for the average shire force. It would need an extra £9 million to become average in terms of its funding.

Having said that, West Mercia has consistently met, indeed exceeded, its 2 per cent. efficiency targets for each of the last five years. Since 1999–2000 it has produced £19.8 million in efficiency savings. It is a low-spend police force, but there is real concern on the doorstep about the balance of funding for the police between Government grant, on the one hand, and local council tax. Government grant, at £92.24 per head, compares with £107.16 for the average shire force, whereas the local council tax precept for a band D property is £143.17, compared with £83.68 for neighbouring authorities.

Having outlined the issues about resources, I wish to focus on performance. West Mercia has improved tremendously during the last 12 months. Recorded crime is down by 11 per cent.; the sanctioned detection rate is up by 5.4 per cent.; domestic burglary is down by 19 per cent. in volume and the detection rate has gone up by 6 per cent.; for vehicle crime, there has been a 10 per cent. reduction in volume and a 4 per cent. increase in detection; and for violent crime, a 15 per cent. reduction in volume and a 4 per cent. increase in detection. I shall repeat that figure, Mr. O'Hara, because it cropped up a lot during the election campaign: violent crime has gone down in West Mercia by 15 per cent. Perhaps next time accurate statistics will be used in local election material in the West Mercia area.

The constabulary has developed four tracks of policing: responsive policing; targeted policing; local policing; and partnership policing. In doing so, it has laid effective foundations for neighbourhood policing, especially in establishing the role of local beat managers and realigning boundaries with those of local partners. West Mercia did that at a time when many other police services were structured almost entirely around a demand-led, reactive police model.

West Mercia's chief constable, Paul West, has identified four local neighbourhood policing principles, which support and complement those that the Home Office is developing nationally. They form the basis of the minimum standard of service that he would like to ensure is delivered to all local communities in the force area. First, members of the public should be provided with up-to-date and easily accessible information concerning their local beat police officer, including details of the geographic area for which they are responsible, their name and contact details.

Secondly, local beat officers should work as part of a team and be able to draw on generalist colleagues to provide cover when they are unavailable and on specialist support to deal with more complex problems. The team should also include at least one community support officer available to provide high-profile foot patrol deployment in response to local need.

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing the debate. Does he agree that community support officers have been invaluable in recent years in West Mercia? We have a scheme in Telford whereby a number of community support officers are allocated to key wards that require regeneration and they often patrol in partnership with police officers so that they have all the powers at their disposal. That increases the number of visible uniformed officers in communities when they are needed and in the right places.

Mr. Foster: I absolutely agree with my hon. Friend—community support officers are vital. Later in my speech I will talk about a CSO on my patch to demonstrate the high visibility nature of his police work as well as the active community work that goes on, which is often unsung and helps to build up trust in the police force.

The third part of the neighbourhood policing model laid out by Paul West is that local policing teams should be led by nominated supervisors and should have well-established and formal links with other public and voluntary sector agencies that also provide daily services, such as the local authority, the housing association and social services.

The fourth element of the model is that schools, both primary and secondary, should be considered integral features of local communities and be served by local officers and local policing teams. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Schools is unable to be here today, but when I asked her about neighbourhood policing in West Mercia, she told me about PC Dave Wilkins from Redditch, who is heavily committed to the community that he serves. His work extends from surgeries to work with schools, which includes doing assemblies, issuing newsletters and raising issues such as fireworks in the autumn, or parking and antisocial behaviour. Outside those general duties he meets local residents to try to resolve minor difficulties and disputes—the sort that we often get involved with as Members of Parliament.

PC Wilkins is often on the beat, but he also spends a lot of time developing and organising community events such as the annual Redditch fun run, a community theatre group or even local environmental projects. His work means that he touches a lot of people's lives but, crucially, his contacts are not always about crime. His community knowledge, his contacts and his early intervention in problems are actually vital in his work to tackle crime and the fear of crime. My right hon. Friend said that Redditch is lucky to have officers like him.

To colleagues, supervisors and, more important, the public in Worcester, Giuseppe—Joe—Facciano, a CSO from the Barbourne beat, is a round peg in a round hole. He willingly goes the extra mile. Joe cares passionately about his beat and is genuinely upset by damage, litter and antisocial behaviour. In his professional time and his own time he contributes to community well-being. His ready rapport with elderly residents, a group who often feel vulnerable in today's world, helps enormously and, along with his accordion playing at community events, is an example of the voluntary commitment that he makes to the people of Barbourne.

Beat manager Paul Green says that the drop in crime since Joe's arrival is not coincidental. Joe's relationship with local people is impossible to quantify accurately, but it raises the community's perception of the importance and value of community support officers and perhaps refutes some of the scepticism that can be seen in the claim that CSOs are a poor substitute for "the real thing".

The South Worcester division of West Mercia was restructured in 2000, to create local policing units that are coterminous with the local government boundaries, at parish, town, ward and district level, in order to accommodate the requirements of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 for police to reduce crime and disorder by working in partnership with people in the districts. The arrangement was completed when West Mercia restructured the basic command unit in Worcestershire to bring all of Malvern hills into the south Worcester division in 2003. That division is headed by chief superintendent Simon Adams.

There are three district commands within south Worcestershire, each commanded by an inspector, who is the point of contact for the local council. The concept of beat management is established across the community, with the principle that every member of the community can identify with a named constable in the area in which he or she lives, works or attends school. That constable's remit is essentially about problem solving and facilitating partnership solutions. The area of a beat manager's responsibility is arranged around parish, town or wall boundaries and the size of the area is determined by the work load and the geography.

In rural areas of the division, parishes are typically clustered into a single area, whereas Warndon parish in my constituency is served by two officers because of its sheer size and the amount of work involved.

David Wright: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important, wherever possible, that we get officers out of motor vehicles and back on to the streets? For example, in Madeley we have an excellent project in which police use bicycles to get around the town. Obviously, that cannot be done in large rural areas, where there will always be a need for motor vehicles. However, in smaller towns and villages, and in urban areas, we need to encourage police officers and community support officers to make sure that they are not in motor vehicles, but are seen on the street, using bicycles and Shanks's pony.

Mr. Foster: I do not disagree with my hon. Friend. I suspect that a new town such as his has modern estates with many paths and alleyways that cars cannot get through, but to which people who want to cause trouble have ready access, and where the most suitable ways of chasing criminals are on a bike and on foot.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on having brought this debate to Westminster Hall. Does he agree that, while the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright) is correct that police officers need to get out of their cars more, they need to get out of them and on to the streets, not into council offices, which seem to attract endless meetings? Clearly, there is an argument for working together to reduce crime in all our communities, but there seems to be an epidemic of meetings. Finally, in this brief intervention—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Gentleman has made his point well.

Mr. Foster: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, and I am glad that it was brief. In my experience, the result of some of the meetings that police officers attend, working in partnership with local community leaders, is to stop crime right at the beginning. That has got to be better than having a responsive police force. It is far better to prevent things at source than to wait for them to happen and then chase criminals on foot, by bike or in a car. However, I accept the general thrust that police have to be more visible out and about in their local communities.

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): The hon. Gentleman was generous and correct enough to name a number of beat officers in Worcester city who do a first-rate job. He rather skipped over the divisional commander, Simon Adams, and the individual inspectors of the command units in south Worcestershire. Does he agree that one of the reasons why neighbourhood policing is working so well in the area that we both represent in Parliament is that the individuals concerned, Simon Adams and, in my case, Steve Brooker, are reaching out to the community and making themselves accessible to organisations and individuals? They deserve to be praised.

Mr. Foster: Towards the end of my speech, I was going to give huge plaudits to Chief Superintendent

[Mr. Foster]

Adams, who is in charge of the whole division. Certainly, the inspectors at district level are fundamental to the leadership in the police force. In each district the team of managers is supervised by a dedicated sergeant, whose remit is to support the inspector for the patch in crime and disorder reduction, and the beat managers are supported by community support officers, special constables, district council wardens, outreach workers and neighbourhood watch. They are all part of the local policing team. On top of that, police officers patrol the hot spots and areas that the local policing team sometimes cannot get to. We have to acknowledge that beat managers also have the support of specialist units, including the antisocial behaviour team, crime prevention officers, school officers, intelligence analysts and the county council's joined-up information system, all of which helps to target police resources where they are needed and particularly in local communities.

Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that probably one of the nastiest and toughest jobs that the specialist officers and, indeed, all police officers have to do is to deal with people who have been injured or killed in road traffic accidents and their families? Does he further agree that a great tragedy is taking place on the A49, particularly at Ashton, where there has been another accident in the same black spot and again the Highways Agency has failed to act?

2.45 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

3 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Foster: I was just about to respond to the hon. Gentleman. Ashton is a small village about 5 miles north of Leominster. The A49 has some quite severe turns there and it has a known accident record. I hope that the Highways Agency has taken note of what he said and will do something that will satisfy the hon. Gentleman and the residents of Ashton.

Beat managers have been tasked in south Worcestershire, through the national intelligence model process, to assist in other areas of policing, such as gathering intelligence and assisting in managing potentially dangerous offenders and those identified as prolific or persistent offenders. The south Worcestershire crime and disorder reduction partnership was formed from a merger of the three district partnerships.

The resulting single partnership works better with other bodies such as the health service and the fire service. The key role that is now played by youth outreach workers in tackling antisocial behaviour, which was first piloted in Worcester, has now been deployed across the whole of the south Worcestershire division. Key rural safety initiatives have been set up under West Mercia constabulary. I am sure that hon. Members who know more about rural policing matters may mention them too.

I should like to spend some time talking about the antisocial behaviour strategy in south Worcestershire, particular Worcester, because it is key to what local communities understand by neighbourhood policing. It is how the low level crimes and disorder that go on in their local communities are tackled.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): The hon. Gentleman mentioned the antisocial behaviour unit. Does he have any comment on the alleged remarks of Ms Louise Casey, whom we heard on our radios this morning complaining about the relationship between the Home Office and No. 10 and expressing her personal views about antisocial behaviour. They are views that I suspect he and the Minister would not share.

Mr. Foster: I have not heard the full details of the recording that was made of Louise Casey's speech, but in my dealings with her I have been nothing but impressed with her as an individual and with the ability and life that she brings to her job in the antisocial behaviour unit, as she did in the homelessness unit before that.

Initially the antisocial behaviour strategy in south Worcestershire was led by the police, but it is now firmly established as a partnership approach to dealing with behaviour. It is based on the principle of social inclusion, achieved through diversion and behavioural change before enforcement so that longer-term benefits can be won for the community and the individuals themselves. The division has also maximised opportunities provided by legislation so that they can reduce the demand that antisocial behaviour places on the responding nature of the police service.

The process to deal with antisocial behaviour goes through four levels. At level 1 there would be a letter to the offender and their parents. At level 2 there would be a personal visit to the offender and the parents by the beat manager and perhaps an outreach worker. Level 3 would be a multi-agency meeting to discuss and address the issues with the offender and their parents, a plan of action, restorative justice and perhaps even mediation. Level 4 would be the application for the antisocial behaviour order.

The results for 2005 have been most encouraging. The antisocial behaviour team received 1,906 referrals at level 1. Of those, 328 went to level 2, 57 to level 3 and 26 to level 4. Having been successfully dealt with at level 1, 81 per cent. of offenders did not come to police notice again. That also means that there will be a reduction in demand for further police time. Only 1 per cent.—26—were the subject of an ASBO application. That has to be a good sign in terms of how antisocial behaviour is dealt with in local neighbourhoods.

The use of legislation has been paramount to south Worcestershire in trying to problem-solve. We believe that we are the first in our area to implement a dispersal section 30 order under the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003. Warndon villages were subject to the order to provide the local community with immediate relief from a long-term problem. Last year, 34 notices were issued under section 59 of the Police Reform Act 2002 to tackle the boy racer syndrome in our area.

The antisocial behaviour team is led by Sergeant Chris Allen and served by Constable Tina Dodd, MBE, a police staff investigator, an analyst, clerical support, an employee on secondment from the county council, and council outreach youth workers. Interestingly, the chief constable has now directed West Mercia constabulary to implement that approach throughout the force, so what started in Worcester was implemented in south Worcestershire and will be implemented everywhere else in the force. Importantly, the process is now being used to shape the division's response to providing a process to manage the prevent tier of the prevent and deter strand of the PPO scheme.

The Elgar project is a joint project between the division and the local probation service to enhance support to offenders serving drug treatment and testing orders. Support is being provided by a police staff employee, a retired detective called Rocky Hudson. The project has been evaluated, and is seen to be more successful than DTTOs without support. Anecdotal evidence also suggests that the scheme has contributed to a reduction in vehicle crime in the area.

The division is also involved in planning for real projects in local communities, which is another important interaction. It has introduced an unmarked vehicle fitted with an automatic number plate recognition device, which was bought under the devolved financial management regime at West Mercia.

The division also engages with the voluntary sector. There is a counter service at Broadway, Evesham community contact centre is open, and the police are in negotiation at Upton upon Severn to allow the community access to a wide range of local services, including the police, all at one centre.

Peter Luff: The hon. Gentleman just referred to the Evesham community contact centre. It is worth putting on record what a phenomenal success that innovation has been. I have stood behind the counter at the centre and seen the way in which police staff interact with district council and county council staff and provide a completely seamless service, performing sometimes unpleasant duties, such as recording incidents, getting people to fill in forms and pay fines, and sometimes providing advice. It really is a first-rate initiative that deserves to be rolled out throughout West Mercia.

Mr. Foster: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman went into detail about the Evesham community contact centre, because I was hoping that colleagues who had those facilities in their patch would make the point for the record that south Worcestershire division is a leading light in taking forward the constabulary and the rest of the police force in general.

Class A drug dealing is of particular concern to neighbourhoods and communities in Worcester and elsewhere in south Worcestershire. The division has made particular efforts to focus on street dealing of class A drugs, and has co-ordinated that activity with the work of the county substance misuse team. Chief Superintendent Adams is a member of the board, whose aim is to disrupt the distribution and supply of drugs, and to increase the number of people who receive treatment.

In Worcester city, most police time is spent on the Warndon area, which is typically the area in greatest need. The police team aims to support the city council in its responsibilities under the new Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act 2005. New provisions in Worcester city include youth shelters in open spaces in Old Warndon and Warndon villages, surgeries held by community support officers, the shopwatch scheme, retail club and pub radio, and the city centre policing team, which works with partners from the retail forum and the city council to monitor CCTV, among other things. Two section 30 orders are in force in the city of Worcester. One covers the St. Peters estate and Tesco, and the other covers County hall.

The division also gets involved in community focus groups. My right hon. Friend the Minister will associate those with big conversation events that I have held. Those events have been held without publicity and involve local people, but the police and community support officers have come along and, importantly, action has followed, so that elements of antisocial behaviour around the Co-op on the Ronkswood estate have been dealt with to everyone's satisfaction.

The city police force has been involved in the dragon project, which targets young offenders who have been convicted of vehicle crime, with a view to achieving rehabilitation through training and vehicle maintenance programmes. The beat management team has been involved in the streets ahead project in Dines green in the west part of Worcester.

What has all that meant? We Members of Parliament want to focus on police performance and the effect on crime in certain areas, so I shall give the Chamber some detail about performance on crime in south Worcestershire and Worcester city. Comparing 2003–04 with 2004–05, South Worcestershire division has seen a 15 per cent. reduction in all crimes—that is 3,531 fewer offences—and Worcester city a 16 per cent. reduction. In South Worcestershire, there has been a 15 per cent. reduction for burglary and an 18 per cent. reduction in vehicle crime, for which there has been a 22 per cent. reduction in Worcester city. In violent crime, there have been reductions of 9 per cent. in south Worcestershire division and 10 per cent. in Worcester city. According to British crime survey comparators, the division has already achieved its three-year stretch target of a 16 per cent. reduction in all crime. It has seen a reduction of 19 per cent., and Worcester city one of 23 per cent.

On crime detection, data is available only for the south Worcestershire division, but the sanction detection rate for all crime is up by 7.7 per cent. to 31.1 per cent., which puts it in the basic command unit family position of second out of 15. Detection rates are up by 2.2 per cent. for burglary, giving a BCU family position of sixth out of 15; up by 21.3 per cent. for violent crime, giving a family position of third; up by 8.5 per cent. for vehicle crime, giving a family position of first; and up by 40.6 per cent. for racially aggravated crime, again giving the family position of first.

That brings me to the issue of race and race relations. The National Front threatened to conduct a march in Worcester city last Saturday, so Chief Superintendent Adams set up an independent advisory group that included key members of the local ethnic minority community to discuss police responses to various scenarios. The group was involved with the police's decisions and was happy. In the end, there was no march and no disorder, but members of the local community felt that they had been listened to and that their voices had been heard. That is essential if we are to deal with the sensitive issue of marches by far-right extremist groups such as the National Front.

I have some things to ask of the Minister and the Government on behalf of West Mercia. Will the Minister take a closer look at the police grant formula to reduce the variation between police forces? What action has she taken to tackle the problem of police pension funding to avoid instability in the system, particularly for those involved in the budgetary process? Will she assure me that the rural sparsity grant will continue and will be index-linked in future to protect its real-term value?

Will the Minister increase the resources available to forces such as West Mercia, which have a low cost base, to afford systems to support the identification of signal crimes and disorder? They will require new capital and revenue investment. Will she allocate extra community support officers to West Mercia? The police have set a target of at least one CSO for every local beat manager. There are 114 local beat managers and 83 CSOs, so we want a minimum increase of 31 CSOs.

The Home Office antisocial behaviour unit should fund research into visible policing—I welcome that being done in Worcester—and what is meant by that term. When we speak to people on their doorsteps, they say, "We never see a person on the beat," but if they are at work in the day and locked away in their houses at night, they will never see bobbies on the beat. So, the unit should fund a project to find out what people mean by visible policing: is it actually seeing police, or is it having some other form of contact with them?

Will the Minister consider what further back-office roles could be undertaken by non-police officers to free up officers to be active in their local communities and neighbourhoods? Given the success of local initiatives, will the Home Office seek to devolve further responsibilities to BCUs and beat commanders? If so, what will they be and when will that happen?

Finally, I pay tribute to the chief constable, Paul West, and the chief superintendent, Simon Adams, for their superb work. It is groundbreaking and inspired leadership in local neighbourhoods that makes a big difference, and I hope that through my contribution and others the people in West Mercia will be more confident about the local policing that they receive.

3.15 pm

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I thank the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) for securing the debate.

I represent The Wrekin in Shropshire and I have travelled far and wide throughout my large constituency in the past three years. The message that I pick up from the people I meet is that they want neighbourhood and community policing. That has many manifestations, but the greatest demand is for regular officers on the beat. There are different ways of delivering local neighbourhood policing, such as through police specials, parish officers—which have been used successfully in Moreton-on-Lugg in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin)—and community support officers.

However, although community support officers are welcome and doing a good job, many people are still concerned, first, that we do not have enough of them; secondly, that they do not work enough hours—many knock off at 10 o'clock, when many of the troubles in our market towns are just beginning and many do not work weekends, when there are a lot of problems around the leisure facilities in those towns—and, thirdly and most important, they do not have the power of arrest. I know from speaking to people in Leegomery in my constituency that many people—not just young people; young people are not the only ones involved in antisocial behaviour and crime—know more about the powers of community support officers than some Members of Parliament. They are very switched on to their human rights—more than to their responsibilities. I welcome community support officers, but, through you, Mr. O'Hara, I ask, "Please, Minister, can we have some more, and can we ensure that CSOs are not used as a back-door way of replacing regular officers with real powers of arrest?"

That leads me on to the important role of police specials. They have the power of arrest and a lot of the people involved in antisocial behaviour and crime know that. West Mercia police has been involved in the national campaign run by the Home Office to recruit more police specials. Will the Minister tell us whether the advertising has been regional and local? I have seen only national advertising, and when I recently met a senior police officer I was not furnished with the facts in response to my question about whether we had recruited from local advertising. We need local people who have expressed an interest in being a police special in their local community rather than in other places.

Peter Luff: Has my hon. Friend seen worrying figures that suggest a sharp reduction in the number of special constables serving in West Mercia? There were 280 last year, down from a high point of 613 in 1996. That sharp reduction has caused great concern.

Mark Pritchard: Yes, it is of great concern, particularly in Albrighton and Shifnal in my constituency, where we have seen a halving of the number of police specials. Many people are asking how they are supposed to have a relationship with the police if they are remote, and I believe that the more remote the local police are, or are seen to be, the harder it is for them to have a role in community policing. There needs to be a process of reciprocation. That helps the police in the form of human intelligence and gathering information on what is happening in the community, and it helps the community by allowing the police to show that they are interested, engaged and involved in a day-to-day dialogue with their communities.

Parish officers perhaps have a role. As part of the new model pioneered by West Mercia, parish councils can pay for parish officers. I am quite relaxed about that, unless those officers replace the ones that we already have or we pay twice for the same thing. Local parish councils that do not have the budget or the manpower should not have to say that the only way to deliver the neighbourhood policing suggested by the hon. Member for Worcester and to protect the streets from antisocial behaviour is to pay for it again by having a parish officer. That proposition would not be acceptable to taxpayers in my constituency, who take the view that they have already paid for policing.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): Pontesbury parish council in my constituency has been told by West Mercia that if it wants a parish community support officer, it will have to pay for one. That is unacceptable to the council, which feels that the cost would massively increase the parish precept for the village, which simply cannot afford it. It is simply not acceptable for rural communities to be discriminated against in that way.

Mark Pritchard: My hon. Friend makes the point very well. There is great concern that, although the new role of parish officer provides an opportunity, it should not replace that of regular officers, police specials or community support officers or be a way of paying for the same thing twice.

Funding has rightly been raised as an issue, and all colleagues in the House from West Mercia know that the region has the third worst funded police service in England and Wales. The problem continues year after year, and year after year we hear platitudes from the Government, but we want action from the Government. Perhaps I can put forward a proposition today. At a recent meeting with senior police officers, they suggested that we consider using the proceeds from crime. Why are proceeds from crime sent to the Treasury, where a lot of them are creamed off, before the remainder is redistributed to forces such as West Mercia police? Why cannot individual police forces keep the money that they retrieve through their hard work from people involved in criminal activity whom they capture? That would incentivise local police officers and detectives, and it would be fair and equitable. The Government say that they support performance-related pay and performance by results—that is their claim at least. I think that rewarding hard-working police forces by allowing them to keep the money that they retrieve through their excellent detection work might be a good example of that.

I shall make just a couple more points, because others hon. Members want to speak. One relates to the important role of youth work. The hon. Member for Worcester rightly highlighted the innovative work carried out by West Mercia police, on which the force should be complimented. It is rolling out youth outreach workers in south Worcestershire, and we want to see more of that, because many constituents ask me, "What about youth work?" Some weeks ago, at Prime Minister's Question Time, the Prime Minister referred to youth work, and I hope that the Government will consider the issue nationally, as well as in West Mercia and my constituency. A lot of funding is being put into ASBOs and dispersal orders, but those are ways of reacting to a problem rather than dealing with its root cause. Although, as I said, not everything is to do with young people or with boredom, there is definitely an argument for saying that we should invest as much in dealing with the causes of problems as we do in dealing with the effects. I hope that the Minister will comment on that.

The displacement of problems is an ongoing issue. Dispersal orders appeared to deal with a problem in Shifnal and Leegomery in my constituency, but the solution proved to be temporary; in fact, the problem had been displaced to other parts of the community, and subsequently it came back. I shall be interested to hear what the Minister has to say about that.

The British police police by consent; their relationship with the community is the most important relationship—perhaps more important than the relationship with Members of Parliament and Government. That is why the Association of Chief Police Officers, which is reviewing the funding matrix of community policing, must bear in mind the important role of the police in policing key community events, such as Shifnal carnival, which has been going since the 13th century. The police have said for the last few years, "We do not have the money, you will have to pay for the policing yourselves," so volunteers from the community have had to police the carnival. That caused great concern in Shifnal. People ask, "Why is our precept going up every year? Why is our national taxation going up every year? Why are the police getting more and more money, yet they are no longer policing the most important community event in the area?" I hope that the Minister will give an undertaking that senior officers and chief constables will be encouraged to look through the calendar of events and say, "Although budgets are tight and there are scarce resources, there is a strong argument for policing key community events in order to be a good corporate citizen."

I conclude by saying that, yes, West Mercia needs to be better funded, but it also has a continuing role to spend its budget better. The answer is not one or the other, but a mixture of both.

3.27 pm

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): I congratulate the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on securing the debate. I also thank him because it gives me a rather unusual chance not to attack the Minister, but to welcome the suggestions and plans that have been made.

The complaints that I receive from constituents—I am sure that it is the same for other hon. Members—are not about major crime but about the minor problems that bother ordinary people. For example, a little old lady of 84 has a greenhouse at the bottom of her garden which, more than once a year for the past four years, has been smashed by bricks lobbed over from an estate behind her property. She is now frightened to go into her greenhouse, but all she gets is a crime number.

A couple who live next door to a slightly notorious pub, which I will not name, have a sad story to tell. Every night at chucking-out time, and later when the local nightclub closes, young people who are rather the worse for wear prance over the top of cars, so much so that people try not to park their cars outside the pub and club. My constituents set up a camera to take pictures of the car—not their own—that the young people usually pranced over, but that night they pranced over the couple's own car, so they were not able to photograph the incident.

There is great dissatisfaction with the call centre in my area. Serious vandalism in a recently constructed play area was blamed on the delay caused by having to contact the call centre, which meant that the response was too late. I welcome neighbourhood policing and I congratulate the North Worcestershire basic command unit on being selected as the pathfinder for a pilot trial of the proposal. Chief Superintendent Suzette Davenport has recently moved on, but Chief Superintendent Mark Howard is following her splendid example. I will not mention all the beat managers, but like every other MP, I have a raft of superb beat managers in my constituency. The hon. Member for Worcester read out the local pathfinder principles, and the first one is crucial. It is that "Members of the public should be provided with up-to-date and easily accessible information concerning their local beat police officer, including details of the . . . area . . . their name and details of how to contact them".

[Dr. Richard Taylor]

No longer is it necessary to go to the call centre about something that happens locally. It is possible to call the beat manager, who, it is to be hoped, will be reasonably close, and someone will be dispatched to help.

That gives me an opportunity to praise some things that are happening in Wyre Forest. A few months ago one could drive around various beauty spots and find derelict and burnt-out cars; there is now an initiative to get rid of those quickly, and it is working. There is now a police base at one of the schools in a most deprived part of Wyre Forest—and we have one of the most deprived areas in the county. That is neighbourhood policing in the best way.

The subject of special constables matter has been raised by the hon. Members for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) and for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff). At a recent specials weekend, I met some of the specials from my constituency, whom I know well in their other occupations. They are very disappointed about the local reduction in the number of specials. I wrote to the Minister, and, although I do not mean particularly to get at her, the response was an example of how figures can be made to show what one wants. Figures for 1996 to 2004 already quoted in the debate show a reduction in the number of specials from 613 to 280, but the Minister quoted the figures for 2004, showing an increase from 231 to 269. I am delighted about that increase, but overall a serious loss has taken place in the past few years.

The reasons for the decline are not hard to find. Specials, rightly, now require extensive training, which must happen at weekends and in the evenings and which is, of course, unpaid. The increase in the number of community support officers, who are paid, leads to a certain resentment. Very few constabularies have enough funds to remunerate the specials at all. Many of the specials like their voluntary status, but I gather that some constabularies give honorariums of between £900 and £1,500 a year.

That brings me to the subject of funding. West Mercia police force is under-funded. The briefing paper that we were given states:

"West Mercia Constabulary recognises that its resources are limited and that it cannot deliver Neighbourhood Policing on its own."

A generous grant is being made for the pathfinder studies. One can only hope that if they are successful, the money will be forthcoming to spread them. I believe that the aim is that they should be county-wide, if not country-wide, by 2008. I hope that that will happen.

I am sufficiently elderly to have been brought up during the war, when there was desperate food rationing. Families were allowed half a pig, so they had to decide with whom to share it. With whom did we share? The local bobby. I remember the days when there was a local bobby whom people knew and could contact. What is happening now is a huge step forward.

3.34 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on landing yet another debate on West Mercia. The previous debate was on 12 October. I cannot resist pointing out that on that occasion I was the only Conservative Member representing Shropshire, but today we are four. It is now lonely on the Labour Back Benches for my near neighbour, the hon. Member for Telford (David Wright). Perhaps the Minister contributed to that, as she visited The Wrekin the day before the election.

I turn to neighbourhood policing. I shall give two examples. The first may sound a little like Beatrix Potter and Peter Rabbit. In the village of St. Martin's a few years ago, a community police officer was embedded in Stan's, the local supermarket. He has an office there and a police car is parked outside. He is a proper community presence and he knows the village. My anecdote shows his value to the community. A break-in took place one afternoon, so he went to the house, where he noticed some large footprints in a newly hoed part of the garden. He thought he had a pretty fair idea who might have committed the break-in. He went to that gentleman's house and found some muddy boots. He took them to the house where the break-in took place and found that the boots fitted the footprints. It may sound trite, as if it were a Beatrix Potter story, but it shows the value of having a real police officer on the ground—above all, one with powers of arrest, because he then arrested the guy.

I compare that with Shawbury, another village in my constituency of a similar size. It has a wonderful new village hall, costing several hundred thousand pounds, that was partially paid for with lottery funds. I have received correspondence from two constituents, Mr. John Chadwick from Wem, who goes there to play bridge, and Mr. Tony Herbert from High Hatton near Shawbury, about the appallingly bad behaviour that has resulted in several thousands of pounds worth of damage to the village hall. Why? It happens because there is no policeman in Shawbury. The local inspector has to cover an area of about 720 square miles. In fairness, West Mercia has done its best—it has sent some community support officers there—and I have not received any letters recently.

The lesson is that St. Martin's has a police constable with powers of arrest and Shawbury does not. That is a graphic contrast. What concerns me is that, because of the way the grants have been slanted, the Government are deliberately forcing police authorities to take on only community support officers. The briefing from West Mercia said that 66 per cent. of CSOs are funded from specific central grants, so although they are welcome—anything is better than nothing—I am concerned that the Government are deliberately attempting to push police authorities into taking on more CSOs. It is interesting to talk to the inspectors who employ them. They tell me that they sometimes prefer CSOs because it allows them time to go out on to the streets, and that, if they are given police constables, the resulting torrent of paperwork and regulation ties them to their desks.

We constantly hear about the Government's attempts to reduce the burden of paperwork. The Minister should hear what was said by two senior police officers in my patch who know what is going on. The first says,

"Paperwork is an absolute nightmare. It is being controlled by bodies who are outside the police."

The other says,

"The Government always shout about reducing paperwork but all they do is produce more not less."

They were referring to the encounter forms. Whenever a policeman bumps into someone and interviews them, he is tied down for 10 minutes with paperwork.

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears) indicated dissent.

Mr. Paterson: It is no good the Minister shaking her head. I am speaking about telephone calls that I received this week from real police officers on my patch.

Secondly, there is the nonsense of shadow charging introduced by the Crown Prosecution Service, under which a whole file has to be drawn up before it is decided whether a charge should go ahead. Instead of talking about paperwork, the Minister should come to North Shropshire. I give her an open invitation. I am sure that she will be welcomed at The Wrekin, Shrewsbury, Atcham and Ludlow. She should come to see the police in action. It is ludicrous that, although the public know the value of having a police constable with the power of arrest, senior officers are saying, "Hang on, if we have them we cannot use them properly because they will be bogged down with paperwork."

Another example of ludicrous regulation is that which resulted in the closure of cells. I had a major disagreement on the subject with the outgoing chief constable. I am delighted that Chief Constable West takes a much more open view. It is ridiculous that the cells were shut in Oswestry and Market Drayton, with the result that low-tech cases, such as people who are taken in electively—those who go in with their solicitor—or who are just drunk have to go in a police van, accompanied by one or sometimes two policemen, from Oswestry to Shrewsbury. Shrewsbury is frequently full, so they then go to Telford, and if Telford is full, they go to Worcester. In one ludicrous case, they went to Kidderminster and two police officers were taken out of action.

I am delighted that the new chief constable has taken a more open-minded view of the matter. There have been 337 cases processed in Oswestry police station this year, and 55 so far in Market Drayton. Both local inspectors would like to have full use of those cells. If those 337 journeys were not made, one or two police constables could then be on the beat in Oswestry and Market Drayton. The situation is absurd. The Minister could take action to ensure that those cells were opened up. It is partly a question of the regulations that insist on staffing levels in the cells.

I hate the way in which these debates always descend into a rant about money, but it is impossible not to comment, as the hon. Member for Worcester did, on the unfairness of the current system. It is all wrong that West Mercia has been penalised for being one of the most efficient police authorities from the very beginning. It was one of the first authorities to switch jobs from police constables to civilians. However, when the formula started, it nailed West Mercia like a steel trap, and it is stuck.

It is wrong that £92.24 per head is the Government grant in West Mercia. Down the bottom of the hill where I live, where the North Wales police area starts, it is £117.48. In another rural force, it is £103.88. If the area cost adjustment were applied as it is in Cheshire, Warwickshire or the West Midlands police forces, it would be worth another £1.7 million. The grant per head in Cheshire, another neighbouring force and a rural force, is £108.76. In another neighbouring force, Dyfed Powys, it is £105.09. Compare that with West Mercia, where it is £92.24. I am not asking for a single penny more. I am asking for a fair formula and recognition of the issue by the Minister.

Peter Luff: My hon. Friend has understandably not mentioned the urban force near us—West Midlands police force—which has a grant per head of £155.01. It benefits from all kinds of extra money, including the area cost adjustment. The strange thing is that huge numbers of its officers live in my constituency in Worcestershire and commute to the West Midlands police authority area. That destroys entirely the argument for the area cost adjustment that we receive.

Mr. Paterson: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. I shall wind up briefly so that he has the chance to expand on it. In a letter to me last year, the Minister said:

"I recognise that formula changes implemented in 2003–04 did shift resources in favour of more urban areas."

Will she recognise that that was a brutal shift by the Labour Government from rural areas to urban areas? It is wrong that the cake is sliced in such a way that it discriminates against an efficient force such as West Mercia, which would benefit from more community policemen.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. I remind hon. Members present that, with injury time for the Division, the winding-up speeches must now start not later than 3.55 pm.

3.43 pm

Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I shall be brief, and I shall not do all the consensus stuff that has been done before. I agree with almost everything that has been said. I shall therefore strike a slightly more discordant note, but I hope that the Minister will understand that I associate myself with much of what the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) said in his opening speech, and I again congratulate him on securing the debate.

The funding question lies at the heart of the debate. The welcome move from intelligence-led policing to neighbourhood policing is something that, as constituency MPs, we must be pleased about. However, it requires additional resources. I hasten to add that that should be achieved through a fairer share of the cake, not a total increased spend.

We have 300 extra police officers in West Mercia, paid for almost entirely by increases in council tax. Of course, the Government claim the credit for the extra police officers and then threaten to cap the police authority for having the temerity to raise the money to pay for them. That is the bizarre situation in which we find ourselves. The recipe put forward by the hon. Member for Worcester for improving funding is exactly the recipe that I put to the Deputy Prime Minister in a letter in September last year. I entirely agree with what the hon. Gentleman said.

I am concerned that the police authority seemed to think that it could increase the council tax again—that there was popular will in favour of that increase. I caution it against that move. It is not right that the council tax payers of our area should pay for the shortcomings imposed on us by central Government. Although people can always be asked to pay an extra 5p for this or £1 for that, all the fivepences and pounds add up, and hard-pressed pensioners, in particular, and low-income families in my constituency cannot afford further increases in council tax, full stop. I would caution the authority not to go down that route.

I am also concerned that there is the beginning of declining consent for the police in my constituency—a point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard). High council tax payments are one of my worries. Constituents are saying, "We've paid the money. Where are the police officers?" I have a high regard for the West Mercia constabulary; it is extremely well led at local level, at basic commander unit level, and at constabulary level by the chief constable. However, there is the beginning of a concern. Controversially, the police have been asked to do things of which my constituents do not approve, such as enforce the hunting ban. There is a concern among my middle-class constituents—I know that it is controversial, but it happens to be true—about what is seen as a war on the motorist, or the soft target of the middle classes. That perception is growing. I say that because during the election campaign, I went round my constituency saying that we could promise people more police. The response every time was, "I'm not sure that we want more police." People feel that the police are unable to deal with the issues that concern them. Quite often, there is some confusion about the relationship between local authorities and the police about Traveller incursions, for example, but a feeling that such incursions are not being dealt with. That is, in my view, unfair, because members of the West Mercia police are doing a good job in the circumstances that they face.

People are concerned about slow shows in the more rural areas of my constituency. It takes a long time for the police to arrive, if they arrive at all. One local sports club never saw a police officer after reports of serious vandalism. There has also been the loss of police cells, such as in Evesham. My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) made a point about the loss of police cells in his constituency. We have lost them in Evesham, leading to a loss of the ability of the police to respond to incidences of lawlessness in Evesham.

There is a perception that the police now have their hands tied behind their back. What people would like is more police officers with real powers. I have some caution about community support officers, which I have expressed in this Chamber before. If they are the only way we can obtain extra police strength, I shall take them—better them than nothing. However, I would prefer to see real police officers—full police officers and increased numbers of special constables, who have declined shamefully in number over recent years in our area.

We know that there is no problem recruiting real police officers. The police authority recently advertised for new constables and received some 900 applications—so many that it could not even look at 150 of them. They were sent back unopened, asking applicants to apply for another police force. Perhaps they were the best 150 going; we do not know, but there is no problem recruiting. It is a bit odd to return applications unopened but that is what happened, and it seriously concerned the Worcester News.

I have been controversial, Mr. O'Hara, in my brief contribution, because I agreed with the opening remarks of the hon. Member for Worcester, who said that there is a lot to praise and celebrate. There is a lot of efficiency and modernisation of the best possible kind, which has made our force one to be proud of. However, it needs a bit more help than it has had from the Government if it is to achieve what it is capable of achieving.

3.48 pm

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on securing the debate, although I did not understand what he said about the statistics involved. The Government claim that crime is going down and things are getting better, but to be honest, a lot of my constituents say to me that the reason why the figures are going down is that they are not reporting crime. They simply do not have confidence that the police will intervene on some of the problems that villages in rural areas face. They simply do not report crimes.

Recently, there have been a lot of problems in Shrewsbury with the Government allowing later licences in pubs. It has caused tremendous problems. Very early in the morning in Shrewsbury, all sorts of vandalism is going on. One gentleman from Shrewsbury, Mr. Bamber, had his garden shed set alight this week. I met him in his garden and he was just sitting there crying, because his whole garden had been destroyed at 2 am by vandals. I am absolutely appalled that the Government want to grant licences to pubs up to 2 am or 3 am. Why on earth does anyone want to be drinking at 3 am or 4 am? I simply do not understand how that is possible and why people want to do that. I want the Minister to know that it is leading to many antisocial behaviour problems in Shrewsbury.

The police in Shropshire are extremely hard-working. They make tremendous efforts in policing the Shrewsbury flower show, the Shrewsbury carnival and all the sporting activities. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) on raising the fact that those major events are not policed through money from the Government; the organisations have to raise the money themselves. That is resulting in some organisations deciding not to hold those annual events because they simply cannot afford to do so, which is a tremendous shame.

David Wright: There is clearly some inconsistency across the force area. I was at Dawley day on Saturday and there was a police presence there coupled with a CSO presence. Perhaps we have to raise the protocol for events such as Shifnal carnival, the Shrewsbury flower show and Dawley day with Ministers or with the force itself. There seems to be some difference across communities. Perhaps we need to work together as Members of Parliament to raise the issue with the force.

Daniel Kawczynski: That is a fair point. I wanted to stress the point to the Minister so that she was aware of the position. Like my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), I feel passionately that the police have to deal with too much red tape and paperwork. I have been to Monkmoor police station and met many police officers there. There is a feeling that police officers do not dare to talk about the problems that they face because the state will come down on them like a ton of bricks. That feeling is also found among people working in the hospital. People are petrified of being quoted because under this Government if someone has the temerity to challenge the processes they will be sacked, as has happened over and over again. That is the case whether we are talking about the council in Bucharest highlighting illegal immigration or people highlighting local issues.

Monkmoor police station in Shrewsbury is the regional headquarters in Shropshire. The building was constructed in the late 1960s. Going into the station is like going in a time machine back to 1965: it is so old, outdated and dirty. Our hard-working police officers should not have to tolerate such conditions. I notice that the Palace of Westminster has had a lot of money spent on it recently. I wish that the Minister would look at Monkmoor police station and ensure that our regional headquarters in Shropshire has proper funding for proper facilities for our police officers.

3.52 pm

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): I shall pick up on the remarks of my neighbour and hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski). I, too, have visited Monkmoor police station—last week, in fact—and I was told that some refurbishment work will shortly be done on the cells there, but the number of cells in Shropshire as a whole is lamentably low. I think that the building in question is a former secondary school; it was not built to be a police station. It needs to have proper cells put in and I welcome the refurbishment work. That is relevant to my constituents because there are no cells in the Ludlow constituency, which, for those who do not know the geography, is 40 miles by 20 miles. People who are to be held in custody overnight have to be taken to Shrewsbury, to Telford or, occasionally, to Hereford.

Just before Christmas, I went out with police officers in Bridgnorth, thanks to Inspector Andy Thomas, and I saw for myself the problems caused by drunkenness—which I am aware also happens in other towns. Generally speaking, the police on the spot have to take a tough decision. They have to ask themselves whether to arrest the person. That is the appropriate policing response, but it takes two officers to deal with an individual who is drunk. They have to be driven 25 miles to Shrewsbury or 15 or so to Telford, which takes the officers out of the local district for two hours at a time. There are usually four people on duty in Bridgnorth in the evening. If they make two arrests of drunks, the decision will be to have no cover in the town of Bridgnorth. It is a very tough call and it comes about entirely because of the points that many hon. Members have raised to do with the police numbers and the resources in our area and particularly in the rural areas. Ludlow has a brand-new police station, which is very welcome. The station has been built with no cells because, as other hon. Members have said, the level of manning to justify cells cannot be supported within the budgets of the division. That is wrong.

Although we have one of the lowest crime rates, not only in the county of Shropshire but in the West Mercia division, that does not mean that we have no crime. Far from it. To give one example, the village of Highley saw the second ASBO issued in the entire country. As of two weeks ago, Highley has had its first policeman for six months. It is an area with noted crime problems—it had the second-largest drugs bust in the county last autumn—and it has been without police cover because the police division does not have to man to 100 per cent. of its capacity. The beat duty officer took maternity leave and there was not any surplus capacity to provide cover to Highley. That should not be repeated.

3.55 pm

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on securing the debate. He has a long and honourable record of securing debates on West Mercia funding and policing. I remind colleagues that the debate is about neighbourhood policing, and I want to concentrate on some of those areas.

The hon. Gentleman was right to mention funding, particularly the sparsity factor, which was also raised by the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff). The hon. Member for Worcester was also right to raise the issue of the statistics bandied about in the run-up to the general election. I remind colleagues that when we criticise and try to make political points about statistics—whether about the health service, dirty hospitals or police levels—we are often criticising the people who work in those public services. Police officers said to me that they did not recognise the story that was being put about; I heard the same from members of the health service.

I also join the hon. Gentleman in his tribute to Paul West, the chief constable.

3.57 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.12 pm

On resuming—

Mr. Keetch: I was thanking the hon. Member for Worcester for having, rightly, paid tribute to the chief constable, Paul West, and wanted to put on record my thanks to the divisional commander in Herefordshire, Kevin Bentley, and his team, which does such excellent work.

The hon. Gentleman was very generous in taking a number of interventions, including one by the hon. Member for Leominster (Bill Wiggin), who continued his campaign for a bypass for the A49 at Ashton. We then heard a very good speech from the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard), who highlighted the issue of specials. They are an important element of rural forces, and we must not forget that. The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) also, rightly, issued warnings about paperwork. Attending to that does affect the amount of time that our police officers spend on the streets and, although the situation has improved since the O'Dowd report—many things have changed—I hope that the Government will continue to look at the issue all the time. It is something about which police officers speak to us regularly.

The hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) also mentioned funding, and we heard generous interventions in the speeches by the new hon. Members for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) and for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne). Again, they spoke about local issues. The hon. Member for Ludlow was right to point out that crime happens even in the most remote and beautiful areas. Crime is a 100 per cent. statistic for each household affected by it.

This debate is about neighbourhood policing, so I asked a number of police officers from Herefordshire what issues they would want to raise if they were here. I will focus not on what my constituents have said—of course, my police officers are also constituents—but on the issues that the police officers really want to get across. Four came up constantly. The first was their inability to deal with matters such as Travellers. They are hugely frustrated that they cannot do enough on such issues, which affect our rural communities. It is the same with neighbourhood disputes: local bobbies feel unable to do what they want to do when faced with problem families on estates. Another issue is traffic. Again, the police feel hamstrung when trying to keep traffic moving in a city such as Hereford.

Most important were the issues relating to alcohol-related disorder. We all enjoy going out with our friends and family, but the cost of alcohol-related disorder is now huge. Recently, a very good study was done in Hereford. It looked at the cost of alcohol-related disorder to the accident and emergency department of our local hospital. It was calculated that in one month, February 2004, alcohol disruption cost the Hereford A and E department more than £32,000. I daresay that figure would be repeated in Worcester or Shrewsbury or other units. The cost of trouble in the evenings, on the Friday and Saturday night, is not just the disorder on the streets. During that period there were assaults on members of our A and E staff; the police were called 18 times to Hereford A and E department in that one month alone. That makes the reported comments of Louise Casey even more difficult to explain.

We must take this seriously. The Government are trying to do this. They will not be helped by noises off by senior civil servants after drinks parties. The people on the streets of West Mercia and our other cities and towns expect something to be done. I always supported the liberalisation of the licensing laws. I felt instinctively, as a Liberal, that that was the right thing to do. We have yet to see what the result will be, but the Government must ensure that the police have the opportunity to control the streets in our market towns and in our cities when these changes take place.

4.16 pm

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I begin, as always, by declaring an interest as a Crown court recorder and an acting district judge, and move straight away to congratulate the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on securing the debate and on the way in which he introduced an important subject to us all. It is a great pleasure to see no fewer than four colleagues from Shropshire here today. All my hon. Friends have spoken with a great deal of knowledge of their constituencies and of the problems. I thank them all.

My hon. Friends the Members for Mid-Worcestershire (Peter Luff) and for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) both spoke about the need for more specials and with great knowledge of their own constituencies. My hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) raised the importance of having a real police officer on the ground with power of arrest and referred to the ever-troubling issue of paperwork. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) spoke of the time that police have to take in relation to their duties which can sometimes involve difficult judgments as to their priorities.

My hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) talked about antisocial behaviour in Shrewsbury. He, in common with others, including my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin, spoke of the need for local police to police local events in order to secure the confidence of their communities. All my hon. Friends were supported in the debate by the presence of my hon. Friends the Members for Leominster (Bill Wiggin) and for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer).

In the short time available to me I shall mention one or two matters. The issue of specials cropped up throughout the debate. The Opposition believe that it is important for the Government to initiate a drive to get more specials, particularly in the west Mercia area. Reference was made to drug and alcohol crime. My understanding is that Worcester, along with many other towns and cities in this country, faces a great deal of crime that is based on alcohol and drug taking.

Frankly, binge drinking and the ready supply of hard drugs on the streets are two of the greatest problems affecting people today, particularly young people. I imagine that that is the same in the cities and towns in the west Mercia area. I hope that the courts are alive to the fact that these are twin issues. Certainly, I hope that the courts and the police in the west Mercia area take a tough line with licensed premises that sell to drunks. It is a regular activity in the south of England. Much stronger enforcement is needed, and in relation to drug crime, too.

My final points—it is amazing how quickly five minutes pass when one is enjoying oneself—concern the problems that we can all identify. It is a great shame if the time of the police in west Mercia, as elsewhere, is over-dominated by paperwork and having to reach targets. What really encourages the public to have confidence in the police force is their visibility on the streets of the towns and, particularly in the west Mercia area, the villages. The public want to see their local policeman, talk to him and get results from someone who is knowledgeable about the sort of people who offend in the locality.

Finally I make a personal plea. If I could see many more police, not in police cars but wandering around having a chat with the public whose confidence they need, I, for one, would be delighted.

4.19 pm

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety (Hazel Blears): I, too, join hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) on having yet another excellent debate about west Mercia. He is an assiduous champion for his community and, as well as these debates, he has asked me a number of parliamentary questions, particularly about antisocial behaviour. I know that that is of great concern to his constituents.

I am also delighted that despite some of the contributions from Opposition Members, there has been a broad welcome for the move towards neighbourhood policing. For once, the policy thrust that we are trying to put in place has support, not only cross-party but from police forces. The fact that one basic command unit in every force has volunteered to be a pathfinder for this new form of neighbourhood policing is encouraging. I say "a new form of neighbourhood policing" because this is not about going back to the bobby on the beat. It is about having neighbourhood policing that builds relationships with local communities, local people tasking the police on their priorities, and using intelligence to direct those resources into the places that matter. It is not simply a matter of having a cup of tea with people, important though that is to build those relationships. It is also about hard-edged policing, which will work only if the police officers involved are catching, arresting and convicting criminals, tackling drug problems—

Mark Pritchard: Will the Minister give way?

Hazel Blears: I will not give way because I have about eight minutes left and I want to deal with questions that hon. Members have raised.

The new form of neighbourhood policing is about both building relationships and hard-edged policing. It is a hard task for our police service to build relationships and to be close to the public, who set the priorities and need feedback, at the same time as carrying out hard-edged proper modern policing as part of the force. That is a considerable challenge, but I am delighted that police forces throughout the country are taking it on and making things happen.

I shall deal with some of the specific issues raised by hon. Members because that is more useful than simply reading out my brief. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester referred to the budget, as did several other hon. Members. I know that he is exercised by the issue of fairness and area cost adjustment, which he has raised before. Throughout the police service we have had a 30 per cent. increase during the past few years—a 21 per cent. real-terms increase after inflation. That applies to West Mercia police as to other forces.

The second important issue is that we have never funded police forces on a per head or per capita basis. The formula works on the basis of what the policing need is in a community and allocating funds for policing need. Hon. Members are right: when we last reviewed the formula there was a big shift to high-crime areas with vulnerable communities that need help. We recognised that areas such as west Mercia would be significant losers if that formula were implemented in full, so we had a damping mechanism through floors and ceilings that have helped West Mercia police over the past few years not to lose the amount of funding that would otherwise have been the case. In fact, last year it received an increase of 3.75 per cent. and if the formula had been implemented in full it would have lost another £2.5 million, so it was better off because we put in place floors to ensure that we took account of the needs of the area.

In addition to the extra general funding, West Mercia police has had significant extra investment for specific funds. It receives £2.34 million from the rural policing fund and is one of the biggest beneficiaries from that fund, which is not ring-fenced. The force can spend the money on priorities that it identifies in the local community.

Mark Pritchard: Is not part of the problem that very point? There are pockets of money here, there and everywhere and chief constables are asked to apply for different pockets of money when they really want a proper budget and to have the independence to spend it to meet the needs of their local community, rather than having to run around chasing the latest Home Office partnership fund or whatever.

Hazel Blears: I hope that the hon. Gentleman recognises that the force has had a 30 per cent. increase in general grant during the past few years, which was not ring-fenced and which it could spend as it wanted on operational policing. Indeed, he will know that the rural policing fund is not ring-fenced to any specific project and the force has the freedom to spend it to meet local community needs. It is important to get the balance right.

My hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) made some telling interventions to highlight the improvements that are taking place in his community. He recognised that there are still pressures on the service and he wishes to keep pressing me to ensure that we provide proper resources and facilities for his community. However, I was pleased to hear about the improvements.

I was delighted to hear of police and community support officers who are making a significant contribution. They were named by several hon. Members. In West Mercia, there are 262 more police officers than we had in 1997. Hon. Members who pressed for extra officers—[Interruption.] There are

[Hazel Blears]

262 more officers and 82 community support officers. Over the next three years, as we develop neighbourhood policing, we will have a total of 24,000 community support officers in addition to the record numbers of police officers—not in substitution for police officers but in addition to the record numbers. The extra 13,000 police officers now in place throughout the country, with the 24,000 community support officers, will give us the capacity to have mixed teams in communities.

Are Opposition Members really telling me that they want fully warranted officers to do every single job in the police service? That would be a very backward step, because we need mixed teams of police officers, special constables, wardens and community support officers in the wider security area. In that way we can ensure that we direct the right people to the right place with the right skills at the right time. That is what neighbourhood policing is really about; it is about working smarter and getting the most out of the resources available. If the policies proposed by hon. Gentlemen were implemented, communities would have far fewer resources to tackle the very real problems that exist.

What illustrates the point for me is the success of the multi-agency antisocial behaviour team in Worcestershire, which has police officers, a housing officer, a civilian investigator and an analyst. That is the sort of modern policing that will be successful, not simply a one-size-fits-all model but one that puts the right people with the right skills in the right place. That is incredibly important to us.

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester also raised the matter of resources for identifying signal crimes, and BCU Pathfinder wants to see whether we can put in some more support. There is support to develop the neighbourhood policing model; it is a genuine point. My hon. Friend also wanted some research on visible policing and what it means. That is an interesting point about whether it is simply seeing police officers or about the quality of the interaction.

Further back-office roles for staff were mentioned and we are trying to engage more civilians. I add to that the possibility of local authorities and police forces coming together to do some of those back-office roles in call centres and pay roll administration, which would give us even more efficiencies.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) and other hon. Members mentioned specials. I am delighted to be able to say that in the last year nationally there has been an increase of 1,000 specials, and 2,500 more are waiting to go through the process of recruitment. For the first time, we put significant amounts of money into national advertising and I want to see whether we can do some more focused advertising this year. Local advertising is a matter for the forces; the numbers are beginning to increase in West Mercia, as they are nationally. One of the reasons why they have decreased in recent years is that there have been more opportunities for people to join the police service, because we have been increasing numbers. Many people who would have been specials have joined as community support officers. That is one reason why we have not been able to increase the numbers, but this year, for the first time, those numbers are increasing dramatically.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) said that response, as well as neighbourhood policing, was important. He is right. If we are to get the model to work we need response policing, investigation and neighbourhood policing as an integral part of doing our business. Again, it means getting the right people in the right place.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) talked about having real policemen with powers of arrest, and about the need to get people out on the beat on patrol. If community support officers are to be involved in arresting they will have to give evidence and go to court, which will take them off the front line of policing, which is where we want them to be.

Hon. Gentlemen raised issues around "stop and account", and what they said was a travesty of the truth. "Stop and account" does not simply mean that every encounter has to be recorded; it is clear that there are many circumstances in which, if people are not being asked to account for themselves in detail, the encounter will not have to be recorded. I ask hon. Members not to keep repeating such misinterpretations of the process.

Finally, on custody facilities, I understand that some new facilities are being introduced in Leominster, which is very near to Ludlow.

Mr. Edward O'Hara (in the Chair): Order. We must now turn our attentions to Dr. Ghosh and the Northumberland primary care trust.

Dr. Ghosh

4.30 pm

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): It is difficult dealing with doctors. I have been a coal miner all my life and have always been in trade unions, and dealing with miners is a lot better than dealing with doctors, I can tell you, Mr. O'Hara. They are always at each other's throats, that is for sure. I will demonstrate that later.

Basically, the argument between Dr. Ghosh and Northumberland primary care trust has been going on for some time. To give the background of how the situation developed, Dr. Ghosh was accused of sexual harassment last year. He was taken to the Crown court by the girl in question, an employee of his who had worked for him for six months, and he was tried by judge and jury. The jury unanimously found him not guilty. Of course, I recognise that the Crown court is, in some people's eyes, just a Mickey Mouse court.

The girl in question had done something similar to her previous boyfriend. She said that he had raped her. Again, that case went to the Crown court, but there was not enough evidence, so the judge threw it out. That was a few years ago, and the girl later did the same thing to Dr. Ghosh. Then, she decided to take the matter to an industrial tribunal. As hon. Members will know, in a tribunal, three sit on the panel and a solicitor is always one of them. The tribunal decided to err on the side of probability—it might have happened, so he lost the case.

Dr. Ghosh was suspended from the time he was charged until he was found not guilty by the Crown court. When the industrial tribunal's verdict was reached, he was immediately suspended again. The primary care trust decided to have an investigation into the matter. That has gone on for a long time. In the meantime, we have had trouble with locums who were not turning up for patients. Patients had to be turned away and came to my constituency surgery saying, "It's not good enough. What's happening with Dr. Ghosh?"

Dr. Ghosh believes that he has lost about 100 patients. People just got fed up. At this moment, and after a lot of pressure from me, we have a locum who is doing a fairly good job. I think that we are talking about a deliberate act by the primary care trust systematically to destroy Dr. Ghosh's practice.

So, Dr. Ghosh was suspended and there is an investigation, which has been going on for a long time. I accompanied Dr. Ghosh to an inquiry once. They brought in someone from Newcastle, a Pauline Fryer, head of corporate affairs at Newcastle primary care trust. I do not know what experience she has of investigations, but, if I have time, I might read some of the questions that Dr. Ghosh was asked. They are absolutely appalling. I do not know what they have to do with the charge. Quite honestly, I do not know which was the higher court—the tribunal, or the Crown court. He was not guilty in one, guilty in the other. In the eyes of the trust, he was guilty in any case.

Whatever happens here today, and whatever the Minister says to me, Dr. Ghosh will be sacked. His contract will be determined, and he will go, because we have it on good authority that the doctor who has taken over one of the practices is being told that he will get Dr. Ghosh's practice in due course. I did not know this before, but every doctor who practises has a code number. This new doctor is not even sitting in that practice yet, but I was told yesterday morning that he has Dr. Ghosh's code number. If that does not tell us something, what does? It seems to be game, set and match.

The solicitors who deal with doctors have, like me, been trying to get through to the trust. I have asked for meeting after meeting, until I had to write to the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) and say, "Look, these people won't see me, but I want to talk about this case." That went on for a long time, but only last week did Jim McKay, the chief executive, come to see me on the Friday morning. He came into my office and, lo and behold, said, "I can't talk about the case." "But I need to know," I replied, "I've got an Adjournment debate and I want to know your take on it." "I'm sorry," he said, "I can't talk about it." "So what are you doing here? If you can't talk about it, you'd better leave", I replied. So, it was a useless meeting. He came to see me only because he was forced to by the Minister, but he would not talk about the case. I thought, "Is this a court of law? Is there a law thing with these people in the trust? Is there something they can't discuss?" Why can they not discuss the case with a Member of Parliament and instead ignore him when he is trying to get to the bottom of it?

Dr. Ghosh's solicitor has written that she remains concerned about the interpretation of the regulations governing suspension post-Shipman, which I understand are complex. The solicitor has interpreted those regulations and the nature of the advice given. In other words, she has questioned the PCT's interpretation of the rule under which Dr. Ghosh was suspended. She wrote letter after letter to the PCT and never received an answer.

Dr. Ghosh is up on the 19th, but he has been told that he cannot have legal representation. I do not know whether that is true, so perhaps the Minister can tell me. Can a doctor bring a lawyer or solicitor in such cases? Apparently not. Dr. Ghosh can bring a friend or someone from the British Medical Association, but he cannot bring his solicitor. Some 20 people from his ex-staff will be interviewed, all of whom have made allegations—very poor allegations, I might add, which I have here—but he is not allowed to question or to cross-examine them. If that is the case, anyone could say, "Well, if I'm not going to be cross-examined, I'll stick one on him—not a problem." That is disgraceful and unfair. Dr. Ghosh has a right to cross-examine those people and what they say about him.

One of the people in the investigation has claimed that Dr. Ghosh was having an affair with one of his staff. Dr. Ghosh was shocked at that. The girl in question has not been interviewed. What happens if I pick the phone up and say to that girl, "Look, you're in a report saying you had an affair with Dr. Ghosh. I would go and see your solicitor and sue"? There is no proof—the allegation came from a third party. Pauline Fryer, the head of corporate affairs at Newcastle PCT, alleged that Dr. Ghosh paid his staff money when he took them places. Well of course he paid them money—he had to pay them subsistence allowance, which was in their contracts. If they went anywhere with him, he paid them their subsistence allowance. What is the investigator suggesting he paid them for? Sex?

I do not know what is going on. The Minister should have an inquiry and consider the matter seriously to see exactly what has been happening. Who is right in their interpretation of the law? The solicitor has said that Dr. Ghosh should be entitled to legal representation, but the PCT says that he is not. Who is right? They go on to say that there is a similar case pending in the administrative court. They suggest that Dr. Ghosh's case should be put off until it has been heard. I know nothing about the pending case; that is what the solicitors say. However, doing that will mean that Dr. Ghosh will be suspended for a lengthy period, unable to practise and to care for his patients as he wants to. That is the state of affairs at the moment, but it gets worse.

I want to challenge the committee. It is supposed to be independent. There is only one independent doctor on it, whom I do not know. I know everyone else on the committee, and they have been involved in the case from the beginning. It is as if a detective were the prosecutor, a chief constable the judge, or a policeman the jury. Dr. Ghosh does not have a chance in hell of getting a decent decision. The same people who wanted the investigation and started the suspension will make sure that he does not practise again.

On what grounds is that happening? Because someone won a tribunal. People might want to say that, but Dr. Ghosh can equally say, "Wait a minute. I was found not guilty by a unanimous jury in the Crown court." There are balances. However, they want rid of him. As I said, they have already given his practice away to another doctor. We must wait to see what happens when they get rid of him—because they will; the decision has already been taken. I was told that on the grapevine by some members of the primary care trust, who told me "You are wasting your time, Ronnie. They are going to go for him."

In the end Dr. Ghosh will have to take the matter to court; he will have to sue. That is the only answer that I can see. The allegations are grave, but none of them can be defended. If the girl who worked for him is supposed to have had an affair with him, which is what they have claimed, in writing, she should take the matter to the High Court, too; she should sue.

There are other aspects to the case. A doctor—he has gone now—called Dr. McCullen made a racist remark to Dr. Ghosh, about which Dr. Ghosh obviously complained to Mrs. Frazer, who is chairman of the trust. She made some investigations. There was evidence and there were witnesses. To this day, Dr. Ghosh has never received an apology for the racist remarks.

Another case came to light of Mr. Sayeed, a Pakistani who has shops in Blyth. His daughter went to see Dr. McCullen because Dr. Ghosh was suspended and Dr. McCullen was seeing some of his patients. A racist remark was made to her. Her father made a complaint to Dr. Frazer, who is chairman of what I call the kangaroo court. Nothing happened. There was no letter of apology. Two proven racist remarks by a doctor were swept under the carpet by Dr. Frazer.

I sent Dr. Frazer a letter, asking what was going on, why the complaints were not being investigated, and why there were no letters of apology. I am still waiting for a reply from the primary care trust. I never received a reply, so I do not know what they are trying to hide.

I talked to another doctor, who I have known for some time, who said, "There was a lot of trouble in north London a few years back, when Peter Mitford was in charge of the committee"—the kangaroo committee. "Dr. Mitford was the chairman and he hounded Dr. Aman and Dr. Khan." Dr. Aman was interviewed in a general medical magazine about how he was hounded out. I have been trying to get a copy of the magazine, but it was published a few years ago. He cited racial abuse in the relevant primary care trust in north London at that time.

Dr. Khan left the area. I think that he is now practising somewhere in Newcastle. I have been trying to trace him. He had the same problem. He was harassed out by Dr. Peter Mitford. I suddenly found out that Dr. Mitford and Dr. Frazer were in the same practice in Morpeth. I am not making any suggestions, but I am drawing a comparison. Two complaints about racist comments were made about which nothing was done. Those two doctors worked in the same practice, and they have now left to take up big jobs in the PCT.

It is difficult to get any information on this matter at the PCT because the people concerned will not talk to me. They will not meet me—well, I did manage to arrange a brief meeting with someone, but they would not talk to me. I cannot get anywhere with them. That is why I have had to have this Adjournment debate. I thought about meeting the Minister, and perhaps I should have done that first, but I got very upset because I was told by a good friend on the health authority that what would happen to Dr. Ghosh was signed, sealed and delivered.

If Dr. Ghosh has done wrong, he should be sacked—doctors should get sacked if they do wrong. However, I must repeat this because it vexes me: he has not been found guilty in a court of law—in a Crown court of law, before a judge and jury. He has been found guilty at a tribunal, with a solicitor and two lay people deciding. I do not know why one route has been taken rather than another. It is as if such decisions are plucked out of the sky—"Well, we'll do that, because it seems like a good idea." I have now been told that Dr. Ghosh's clinical record will be examined. They are not satisfied with the questions asked so far. They want to take a look at other matters. They are having a go at him, and I do not know why. If Dr. Ghosh is a serial abuser, he must pay the penalty, but people who have known Dr. Ghosh for years do not believe that he is a serial abuser.

I wrote down some of the questions that were asked. "Did Dr. Ghosh comment to the staff that he liked them to wear short skirts?" Dr. Ghosh paid a lot of money for uniforms for his staff. He took that money from the budget. They all wear the same uniform. So why did the investigator ask about that? "Did you ask one of your staff to marry you?" He is a single man, so I suppose that he can propose to anyone he wishes to marry. It is funny that Dr. Frazer, who chairs this kangaroo committee, married a practice manager. I wonder whether he asked her to marry him in the surgery.

Those questions show what that investigation is really like—when a man's livelihood is on the line. Another question was asked about a named employee, but I will not mention her name because I do not think that names should be mentioned. Dr. Ghosh was asked if he had touched her neck. Who is making these allegations? "Did you touch her neck?" What does that mean? Another question was, "Did you stand close to your employees?" I have been in the practice and it is not very large. I hope that the Minister does not stand too close to me at the bar this evening, because she might get into trouble over it.

Some of those questions are not worthy of comment. That is the sort of stuff that this doctor has to endure, and he now sees his livelihood and practice disappearing. If what has been predicted comes true, he does get the heave-ho, and his practice does go down the Swannee, I will return to this Chamber to remind the Minister that I told her that that would happen, and she might be able to reply then as well.

4.49 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) on securing the debate. This matter is clearly of great concern to him and, as he said, he has made representations to Ministers about it in the past.

I hope that my hon. Friend will understand that it is difficult for me to comment on individual cases, but I thought that it would help if I set out the procedures by which general practitioners in the NHS are regulated. GPs are covered by the Health and Social Care Act 2001, which requires them to be registered on primary care trust lists to provide or to assist in providing general medical services. That enables PCTs to refuse to admit doctors to, or to remove them from, the lists on grounds of unsuitability, inefficiency or fraud, and to suspend GPs to protect patients or act in the public interest. The Act also abolished the NHS tribunal and established the Family Health Services Appeals Authority as an independent tribunal.

Under the National Health Service (Performers List) Regulations 2004, which came into force last year, a PCT is expected to investigate any concerns about any aspect of a doctor's performance. Those concerns can be based on information from any source. In the most serious cases, the sanction can be dismissal—removal from the PCT's performers list. As I have said, the grounds for removal from the list are unsuitability, inefficiency and fraud. The PCT can also consider suspension from NHS practice as an interim measure to protect patients or to act in the public interest while an investigation is under way. When considering a suspension—which is not considered punitive, but a neutral act—PCTs are free to consider any information brought to their attention by a patient or other person or body, information obtained through the PCT's management of primary care in its locality, or any combination of the two. The suspension must be reviewed regularly.

Each primary care trust is responsible for carrying out its responsibility for maintaining its performers list, and the regulations set out the decisions that the PCT can make and the notifications and time frames with which it must comply. Each PCT is responsible for drawing up its own procedures for carrying out the process, including the composition of the panel if there is to be a hearing. Panel proceedings are for the PCT to determine, but they have to be in line with guidance produced by my Department. If a PCT decides to remove a doctor, there is a right of appeal to the FHSAA, which, as I have said, is an independent tribunal. There is not a right of appeal against suspension, because that is considered to be a neutral act designed to protect patients or the public. Given that framework, I hope that I can assure my hon. Friend that the Northumberland care trust has followed due process in their treatment of Dr. Ghosh.

Once the trust was made aware of the serious allegations against Dr. Ghosh and the serious nature of the employment tribunal's findings in January, there was a duty to investigate.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: I referred to the committee: basically, it was the judge, jury and hangman. It had one independent doctor on it. I do not know who he is, but I know the others who sat on it. They should not be involved at that stage. The committee should hear the case but remain independent. Why are those people sitting listening to the case? They should be independent.

Ms Winterton: I will come to the composition of the panel and to the options that will be available to Dr. Ghosh in the light of the outcome of any hearing.

A formal complaint was made to the trust about Dr. Ghosh and, in a sense, that can run separately from the employment tribunal. The investigation was not dependent on it. If allegations had been made, the PCT had a duty to investigate.

Under the regulations, an internal investigation was set up at the end of January, chaired by a non-executive director of the trust, which included the acting chief executive of the trust and an independent member. The investigation was conducted, as my hon. Friend said, by the head of corporate affairs of a neighbouring PCT in order to ensure independence from the panel.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: Was she—Mrs. Fryer, the head of corporate affairs—sitting on the committee?

Ms Winterton: The head of corporate affairs carried out the investigation and reported to the tribunal. That was in accordance with the regulations. A number of current and former members of Dr. Ghosh's staff were interviewed. The interim findings led to the extension of Dr Ghosh's suspension until the investigation is complete and any decisions dependent on it are reached.

I am told that the investigation has now reached its conclusions and that a panel meeting is to be held on 19 July to discuss the results of the investigation and to reach a decision. My hon. Friend asked whether a solicitor could be present. Under the guidance issued by the Department, neither the PCT nor Dr. Ghosh can have at the panel meeting a solicitor who comments directly. However, his solicitor can certainly attend the meeting with him to observe.

Ministers are not empowered to intervene between a trust and a doctor on the matter of the performers list, because primary care trusts are independent organisations. However, Dr. Ghosh will have a right of appeal to an independent tribunal if he is not satisfied with the outcome of the hearing on 19 July. In addition, if he chooses to go to appeal and that appeal fails, he will be able to go to judicial review.

My hon. Friend made it clear that he was dissatisfied with the locum provision. I have been informed that locum cover arrangements were put in place and that those involve the use of a locum previously approved by Dr Ghosh. The arrangements have meant that it has been possible to cover his practice on all but a small number of occasions.

I understand that Dr. Ghosh was contacted about the allegations of racism that were investigated by the trust. That is obviously a difficult situation and I understand my hon. Friend's concerns. However, I think that the trust has followed procedure as laid down in NHS guidance. I hope that I have been able to outline the alternatives that Dr. Ghosh will have if he is not satisfied with the outcome of the investigation and the hearing on 19 July.

Youth Policy

5 pm

Simon Hughes (North Southwark and Bermondsey) (LD): I am grateful for the opportunity to have this short debate, and I welcome the Minister to her new responsibilities. I hope that she enjoys her new job.

Will you allow me 30 seconds of indulgence, Mr. O'Hara? It would be odd to start a debate about the future for our young people without sharing the excitement that many of us feel at the announcement that we have won the bid for the 2012 Olympic games. I say to the Minister—and therefore to the Government—that all of us can only sincerely congratulate the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and the Minister for Sport and Tourism.

I also add without reservation my congratulations to the Mayor of London. I wish that I had been doing that job at this time, but one cannot win all the prizes. I also congratulate Seb Coe, Craig Reedie and their teams. It has been a really encouraging day for the country as a whole, but for young people especially. I was delighted to be in Trafalgar square at a quarter to 1 with many, many others.

I have called this debate on this momentous day, knowing that—hopefully, within days—we shall get the Government Green Paper on the future of youth services. I shall press the Minister on that in a second or two. I want to make sure that at the beginning of this new Parliament the case for a really well resourced, developed, growing youth service is put again. That would serve England well. A good youth service with more qualified, competent and good youth workers can do phenomenal good for young people in their development from children into adults.

From all my political and pre-political experience, I am clear that such things are as important for fit, healthy and safe communities as are good homes and schools. Together with sport, if youth services can be well developed we shall have a much happier and healthier society.

I am patron of various constituency organisations, as are other hon. Members in their patches, but my only formal interest is that I am one of the parliamentary vice-chairs of the Commonwealth Youth Exchange council, which does good work that it wants to expand—with, I hope, a bit of encouragement from the Foreign Office. I put that on record, because the bid keeps going in.

I shall make a couple of general remarks, given the comments from the press and other sources in recent weeks. There is a regular clamour, particularly in much of the local and tabloid press, about how young people do not have respect and are not what they used to be. Of course, a minority behaves badly and that behaviour is rightly to be condemned, as are the failures of their families, which, in many cases, are equally responsible.

Young people often say that if they are given respect, they will reciprocate—and they deserve that presumption. The youth service deserves that respect too, because there is some really good work and practice in every single local authority up and down the country. If we can develop the youth service in the statutory and voluntary sectors—sometimes through faith groups, sometimes through other organisations; uniformed and non-uniformed, traditional and modern—there will be much less bad and antisocial behaviour from that age group in our cities, towns and villages. Bluntly, we would probably end up with far fewer calls for an end to hoods in shopping centres, including at the Elephant and Castle in my own constituency, just over the bridge.

If we work on this agenda well, I am sure that young people will respond well, get less of a bad press and begin to get out of that cycle of criticism. I hope that collectively in this Parliament we will stand up for young people and not run them down, and that the Minister will see that as one of the items on her agenda.

I shall give a few undisputed facts. The last figure that I had was that there are about 4.3 million youngsters between the ages of 13 and 19 in England. In ball-park figures, local education authorities spend between £300 million and £400 million on youth services in England, from core funding, as it were; I think that that is the right figure. Some £100 million comes from other funding, and some money—about a quarter of that: £25 million—is given to the voluntary sector. Those are the ball-park figures; we are talking about £500 million a year. About a quarter of young people of the relevant age range are in contact with formal youth services. About half that group are involved intensively, the other half less frequently.

Of the 8,000 members of staff, about half are full-time, and the other half are the equivalent of full-time. There are also 16,000 or 17,000 who do what used to be called part-time hours and who are now called support workers. The latest statistic suggests, although averages are always misleading, that there is roughly one youth worker for every 500 young people up and down the country. The Minister will know, however, that the amount spent locally varies hugely. I do not criticise that or argue that a similar amount should be spent, because local variation sometimes results in better value for money, but the amount does vary significantly.

At the bottom end of the range for that age group, the average amount is £71 a head, the lowest is as little as £40 a head, and the largest goes up to £200 a head. A question that people always ask is why there are such different priorities in different parts of the country, many of which are not hugely different from each other. Some regions are much lower spenders than others. The two midlands regions, the south, the south-west and the eastern regions spend less, while London, the north-west, the north-east and Yorkshire and Humberside spend more. My borough, which my colleagues have run for three years, spends about £141 per young person on its youth services. Inner London tends to spend more than many other local authorities elsewhere in the country.

When I first came to Southwark to settle permanently after college, I was a youth leader with the Greenhouse trust in Camberwell in my spare time. The trust still exists, and I shall talk about it in a moment. I learned about the level of need, which I shall illustrate briefly, and about the continuing need for support in order to do the work that everyone accepts needs to be done.

I have five figures, which I know have been given to the Minister, so there is no dispute; I merely place them on the record so that we can agree about the basis of the need. More than one in 10 of the children—just under 6,000—have parents who are never at work, are long-term unemployed, or have never worked. That is twice the national average. Just under 25,000 dependent children, which is half of all Southwark children, are living in overcrowded accommodation, and have all the more need to get out and do stimulating things such as exercise away from home. That is one in two and is much greater than the national average, which is not much more than one in 10.

Almost half of dependent children—some 23,000—are in one-parent families, which is double the national average. In addition, some 3 per cent.—some 1,500—are not in a family at all, which is three times the national average, and about 650 children are in foster care or local authority care, which is more than double the national average. Those are the special needs children.

There are also other children who do not have special criteria but who are simply young people who want to escape their parents and school and do other things. The very well respected head of youth services, Karl Murray, whom I have known over the years, and his predecessors make the same point that they have always made, which is that they want more youth workers because there is much more demand for youth work.

Some very good initiatives came out of the tragedy of Damilola Taylor's death. There is a new centre in the neighbouring constituency of the Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs, the right hon. and learned Member for Camberwell and Peckham (Ms Harman). It is now used very actively, and I give all due credit to those who use it. There is also a young people's magazine project, which is what it says it is, and a detached youth work team in Nunhead.

So there is very good practice, but I shall give four examples of where parts of the system are struggling for lack of resources and support. This morning, I visited the Geoffrey Chaucer school in my constituency with XLP—a Christian youth work organisation that won the Queen's award for volunteering in, I believe, 2002, and has been going for nine years.

XLP provides counselling and support in schools and helps with arts, reading and other education. It did a presentation at the school this morning, and it was simply brilliant, engaging a raft of kids at 8.50 am. I must say that Geoffrey Chaucer school does not have a tradition of children sitting quietly in rows and listening, but they were in really good form.

We were there because I had a meeting with the school and with someone who might help it with funding because it is struggling to find funding that will continue. One of its key funders, the Church, cannot fund it as it used to, yet it has huge demands on its time. The local authority gave it a bus, which it uses two days a week on the estate. It wants to use it five days a week but does not have the resources to do so.

The Scouts in Southwark were on to me recently because there is a risk that one of the places to which they go in the Thames valley for canoeing will not be available anymore and because, in some of the voluntary community premises, they do not have places to do their scouting.

The Salmon youth centre, which is in Bermondsey, has a brilliantly planned new building and is a really good new project with which I have been involved for a long time. However, it is 20 per cent. short of what it needs to get back up and running. The Greenhouse Trust, at which I started my Southwark life, is struggling to expand special work with younger children with particular needs.

That is happening in a borough in which the talent is unarguable. The Minister may not know this, but last weekend the London youth games were held at Crystal palace. Not only did Southwark, for the first time, become the best inner-London borough, but it got the best result of any inner-London borough in the history of the London youth games. So the energy, talent and willingness to do well and succeed is there.

When Southwark young people are asked what they want, their answers are unsurprising. They want three things. First, they say what nearly every adult throughout the country says: "We want more things for young people to do." Secondly, they say, "We have problems with other people hanging around." Thirdly, young people say, "We have problems with crime"—being attacked, harassed, and so on. The issues are no different.

Really good youth work—from rural youth work in villages in Dorset to inner-city youth work in London—is vital as a bridge between school life and home life. It often produces role models who do things that parents and teachers can never do. Often, youth clubs are the places that young people go to in their most difficult periods.

Mr. John Leech (Manchester, Withington) (LD): My hon. Friend is probably not aware that in south Manchester the police have been instrumental in raising thousands of pounds to buy a youth bus for my constituency and those south of the Mersey. Unfortunately, the use of that bus is dependent on the availability of youth workers to staff it. Having raised all that money and provided a facility that is good for young people, and well tended when in use, the problem is having the resources available to staff those buses on a regular basis so that it is in use all the time rather than a couple of nights a week or a couple of afternoons at the weekend.

Simon Hughes: I did not know that, but I know my hon. Friend's part of Manchester. My hon. Friend the Member for Solihull (Lorely Burt) is also here. I bet that, in the west midlands and the north-west, including in the Minister's constituency in the Wirral—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): My constituency is in Liverpool.

Simon Hughes: I beg the Minister's pardon. I was thinking of her sister's constituency.

Maria Eagle: There is a difference.

Simon Hughes: I know. Those constituencies face the same issues as does London.

I end with my policy questions. First, when will we get the Green Paper? Will it come before the summer? It was due last September, but got deferred. It was coming before the election, but somehow did not come and everyone is waiting.

Secondly, will the Government consider having the same sort of campaign for recruitment and retention of youth workers as was successful in increasing the number of nurses and police officers some years ago when we were short of them? It would benefit us and I am sure that it would be taken up if we did it properly.

Thirdly, will the Minister confirm that it is Government policy that youth services should be available not just for those with special needs but as a universal service accessible for all young people? Youth services should not just be targeted on those who are thought to be particularly needy.

My fourth question is the most controversial and topical. It would not have been a question a month ago. Although we can understand why private owners of shopping centres such as Bluewater say that they will ban hoodies, does the Minister agree that that response is not helpful? It starts to demonise young people who are wearing something fashionable. If we said that they could not come in wearing trainers or certain sorts of jeans, it would become nonsensical. We must try to respond positively to young people's needs rather than saying that they cannot go somewhere and are not accepted.

Fifthly, will the Minister be clear that youth work is principally best outside school? I am in favour of wrap-round school provision. I chair a school governing body and we will do it in my school. However, that is a different issue. It is important that we do not just think about 8 till 6 provision but about evenings and weekends.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): On that point, I wonder whether my hon. Friend is aware of some excellent provision that is being made in my constituency, where there is an innovative scheme called teen spirit, of which hon. Members might have heard. However, the amount of funding for youth services in my constituency is very small, and I know that my hon. Friend will point out that there is equally little funding in other constituencies. Solihull was 138th out of 148 English local authorities in terms of provision in 2001. That situation has improved, but we are still near the bottom of the fourth quartile for funding. Will my hon. Friend ask the Minister to give us an assurance that the necessary funding will be forthcoming, so that we can continue to grow such excellent services for our young people?

Simon Hughes: I hope that the Minister will be very positive, although she will probably say that it is partly the responsibility of the local authority. One of the problems for all of us is that I have never known funding for the youth service to be a core local election issue. We need to do more to ensure that it is on everybody's agenda, whatever their political party, so that it is not something that the local authority can ignore. The needs of young people in Solihull are fundamentally no different from those of young people in Withington, Southwark or Liverpool.

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): On the hon. Gentleman's fifth point, about the balance between schools and services outside school, would he agree that part of the key is to find ways of discovering what the young people themselves want? We might think that we know what young people want, but it would be far better to find innovative ways of asking them, and for that to be at the core of any youth strategy.

Simon Hughes: Absolutely. I have not yet welcomed the hon. Gentleman to Parliament, and I do so now. The next point on my list was to ask whether the Government will give encouragement and support to young people who want to set up their own youth clubs—that is, to go and ask what they want. It is a slightly different, but connected, point. A couple of years ago, I went to south Wales. There had been problems in a very poor area of the valleys, and young people said that they wanted a shelter. That was all; a shelter to hang around in. They got the wood and built the shelter, and solved half of their problems in that town.

I have three questions to go: I draw the Minister's attention to Tom Wiley's speech in which he used the mnemonic "respect" to set out what was important for a good youth service—relevance, entitlements, sustainability, participation, evidence, community, transitions. I respect him greatly—he has done hugely good work—but I am not sure that there could not have been a better version of that phrase. The basic message is, "show respect for young people". It is all about a set of things that are available to them.

Last but one: is it a principle that we will grow the youth service, its funding and its participants? That must be the right thing to do. The inevitable last question is—I expect that the Minister always has it on the list when she is given a brief—is it a possibility that at last, after 60 years, we can have a statutory youth service rather than a non-statutory one? I know that it is not the answer to everything, but if there were an obligation to provide education and services for adults, services for old people and services for young people, at least everybody's mind would be focused. I hope that we can have a very positive dialogue in this Parliament, and that it will be all to the advantage of young people. I would like to see a coalition for building support across the parties in their interests.

5.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): First, I congratulate the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) on securing the debate, which has necessitated his coming back from the celebrations in Trafalgar square. I am happy to join him in the congratulations that he was liberally spreading around at the beginning of his speech in response to the fantastic news that London is to host the 2012 Olympic games. That announcement went down as well in the House of Commons Tea Room—where I watched it, and a wonderful moment it was—as it did in Trafalgar square.

I hesitate to say that we will take the Green Paper away in order to incorporate the fact that the 2012 bid has succeeded; as the hon. Gentleman said, we have been waiting a little while for it. To put him out of his misery and answer his first question, it will be soon. He will not have to wait much longer. I cannot spill the beans any more than that, but he ought to realise that that is a positive thing for a Minister to say in reply to any debate.

I am particularly glad that the hon. Gentleman raised this subject. It is characteristic of him to have done so; it is well known in the House that he has an interest in this field relating back to his work before he came here. It would be wise of Ministers to listen to his opinions on this issue. I have enjoyed listening to him, and am glad that he appealed for some cross-party consensus on the issue, as that could only be a positive thing.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have been working together across Government to improve the life chances of children, young people and their families. It is particularly important that that work does not stop when children reach 13, and that we do not then say that we have sent them off and that they can make the rest of the way themselves. It would not be sensible policy making not to have good youth policies, which can have a direct impact on the lives of young people and on society more widely. As he said, this issue is not only about children in need, although it is important that youth service work should focus on children in need.

It is tremendously important that youth work should be more accessible to a wider range of young people, because of the impact that it can have on their lives. It can play a critical role in young people's personal and social development by helping them to aspire to the future, develop themselves, stay in good relationships, understand and appreciate our rich and diverse cultural heritage, have fun, learn how to take calculated risks, build their confidence and make informed choices, thus helping them to turn into thoughtful, mature, well-rounded, responsible and caring adults. Youth work at its best can make sure that people reach that level of development who might have had more difficulty in doing so without youth work intervention.

Good youth work can also challenge young people's perceptions, attitudes and behaviour. The hon. Gentleman mentioned several times the fact that the behaviour of some young people gets a disproportionate amount of attention. It is important that young people become a part of society, rather than see themselves as being outside it, or rebel against it to too great a degree. We want to ensure that our young people will turn into the responsible adults that we know they can be. They are the future of the country. I do not complain about the focus on behaviour, but it sometimes distorts the many good stories about how fantastic many of our young people are, and the great things that many of them do for our society and their communities.

If all young people are to fulfil the potential that we want them to, it is important that they grow up in communities in which they feel safe. The hon. Gentleman told us that young people say that feeling safe and not that they are about to be the victims of crime is as important to them as anyone else in society. That puts the debate about hoodies into context. Feeling safe and secure in one's community is a concern to people of all ages, so we need to have a proper balance on that.

The hon. Gentleman asked about making sure that there is more and better youth work, and more youth workers. He will know that the Government recognised that point in 2001 in their transforming youth work agenda, the intention of which was to raise the quality and quantity of youth work throughout England. That recognised that youth work had been something of a Cinderella, perhaps underfunded, service in the past. That is an important part of our policy agenda.

The hon. Gentleman referred to local authority youth services and the active and thriving voluntary and community sector, which many communities have, particularly in Southwark. I know that his authority spends a higher percentage than some on supporting local community groups and voluntary organisations. That is important. He gave some examples from his own experience and from his constituency, particularly that of the Salmon youth centre, which is a fantastic example of local initiative. It is gathering a dauntingly large sum of money in one place and is on the point of doing something incredible in what he has described as quite a deprived community—a point which I accept. That kind of service and such facilities would be well used and welcome and can only have a positive impact. We support that.

We have developed a clear specification for an excellent youth service through the publication of "Transforming Youth Work: Resourcing Excellent Youth Services". We are trying to ensure that local authorities know what translates into such services. We have provided extra resources targeted at service improvement. I am talking about an extra £11 million this year. We have also tried to ensure that management training and development are improved, to ensure that we can draw more people into youth work. As the hon. Gentleman will know, it is a rewarding and important career for those who have an interest in the field.

The hon. Gentleman asked some questions and perhaps I ought to get on to answering some of them. I have said all that I am going to about when the Green Paper will arrive. He will not have to hold his breath too much longer. He asked whether we intend to grow the youth service. There is a commitment through "Transforming Youth Work: Resourcing Excellent Youth Services", the support we are putting into enabling local authorities to understand what a good youth service is and the Ofsted inspections that are taking place. I know that his authority has not been inspected since 1995, but I suspect that it would do rather well. It will be inspected at some point before 2008.

All those things, combined with the extra resources, focus the minds of local authorities, which is where this action has to be led and implemented in a given local area, on ensuring that they can make the improvements and give this service a higher priority. The Green Paper, which is not too far in the future, will provide a further boost to that process. We want to stress to local authorities what they can do to show the positive impact of young people being in charge of things that are going on in their area.

The hon. Gentleman made references to places to go and things to do. We will consult on a number of issues that we think are important in reforming the delivery of services to young people. Those will include access to exciting, enjoyable activities in and out of school or college. They should enhance young people's personal, social and educational development and give them the opportunity to have the achievements that they make in those areas recognised. Another issue will be easier access to personal advice and the support that they might need to fulfil and raise their aspirations, which will include high quality and personalised careers education advice and guidance and some more targeted interventions where children need that. Better and earlier support for young people who demonstrate risk factors associated with poor school attendance, poor behaviour or poor attainment will be included, to try to ensure that people do not go off at a tangent and then find it more difficult later in life to get back to where they would have wanted to be.

There will be consultation on greater access to specialist services, and opportunities for volunteering and mentoring, which will build on the proposals in the Russell commission and the successful millennium volunteers programme, for example.

We know that young people are ready and willing to support others when they are given the chance, but they just need an opportunity. We want to ensure that young people can have more of a say in developing local support and activities. There will be some exciting proposals on that in the Green Paper. I shall be interested to hear what the hon. Gentleman has to say about those when he gets to see it. My hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Edward Miliband) mentioned the issue as well.

The youth Green Paper will launch an exciting change agenda for young people's services. It will put young people at the centre of those developments. Good youth work will also be at the heart of it. That fits in well with our entire "Every Child Matters" agenda. It applies a little further up the age range, but none the less it is an important part of the way in which services for children and young people will be transformed in every local area in this country. I hope that when the Green Paper arrives shortly, the hon. Gentleman will respond to it. I look forward to seeing what he has to say, and I hope that it will set off a debate about the future, which will be tremendously helpful in all our communities, whether it be in Liverpool, Southwark, Solihull or even Manchester.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Five o'clock.

Sustainable Development

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Cawsey.]

2.30 pm

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): It is good to see you, Mr. Hancock, in the Chair today. This debate has been overshadowed by the dreadful events in central London today and I know that the whole House is united in our thoughts for the people who have been killed or injured and their family and friends. I am pleased that several Members are here for this debate.

Sustainable development is an important issue. It must underpin the Government's policies and we must have an effective strategy for it. I am glad that the strategy that the Government launched on 7 March, "Securing the Future", and the attention and high priority that the Government have given to sustainable development were widely and warmly welcomed. The strategy was launched by the Prime Minister and the launch was attended by Ministers from various Departments, which publicly illustrated the fact that sustainable development is a matter for the whole Government, not for any one Department or just for the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs.

At the heart of the new strategy are five guiding principles on sustainable development: first, ensuring a strong, healthy and just society; secondly, living within environmental limits; thirdly, achieving a sustainable economy; fourthly, promoting good governance; and finally, using sound science in a responsible way.

This is not the first UK sustainable development strategy. It builds on previous strategies that were launched in 1994 and 1999, but there is a great deal in it that is new. It reflects the views and opinions of many people who responded during the public consultation. The whole idea of the strategy was to involve the public—to get their ideas and views—and it was a useful exercise.

The strategy places an emphasis on the need for co-operation between government and wider society to promote sustainable choices. In practice, sustainable development comes down to the numerous, everyday choices about how we live and work. It is an issue for all of us individually as well as collectively.

Achieving sustainable development will depend largely on long-term changes in the behaviour of the stakeholders who were involved in the consultation, individuals, communities, businesses and the public sector. We all have a part to play in fostering greener and more sustainable choices while continuing to support a stable economy. Of course, there are challenges. Unfortunately, unsustainable patterns of behaviour are all too often the norm, despite many dedicated individuals and groups showing what might be achieved. We all know about that from trying to encourage people to use public transport, to recycle waste or to use less energy. Many unsustainable habits are embedded in our normal patterns of behaviour, and that is a challenge for us.

That is why the strategy emphasises the need to understand more about the social and cultural influences that shape our consumption. We will look for ways to enable behaviour changes that are focused and meaningful to our audience. I draw the attention of the House to our proposal to establish a new service called Environment Direct. The idea is to provide consumers with information about the choices that they can make when purchasing and using products, to enable them to minimise the environmental impact. That will be predominantly a web-based service. We are in the process of putting that together now.

It is also important that the Government lead by example and encourage the public, business, and the rest of the world to follow us in making long-term choices for the good of the planet. We must do that in our policies, but also in our practice. The public sector in this country spends more than £125 billion per year. That represents an enormous influence for furthering sustainable development, new innovation, new companies and new ways of looking at whole-life assessments.

We are beginning to use the absolutely crucial tool of sustainable purchasing, but we can develop it much more. I am pleased to say that we have established a sustainable procurement taskforce, which will produce an action plan in April 2006 setting out how the public sector can embed sustainable development in procurement. We have demonstrated, with our policies on procuring sustainable timber, for example, how the whole market can change and what influence that can have. That has been enormously successful in changing attitudes and behaviour, and in assisting work with developing countries to promote sustainable logging.

During our presidency of the EU one of our priorities will be to lead work on promoting sustainable—or "green coloured"—procurement throughout Europe. In October we will host a workshop with representatives from all member states to discuss how to improve environmental performance in public procurement across the EU. As part of that we want to establish an EU-wide benchmark, so that the average performance in 2010 will match that of today's best-performing states.

Public procurement is also a focus of the European environmental technologies action plan, which sets out a range of actions to stimulate innovation and new business opportunities. That is important because success, both here and in Europe, depends on businesses fulfilling the growing consumer expectations of higher environmental and ethical standards, and on cutting out the negative impacts of growing material resource consumption. New materials, energy technologies and innovative product design will be a crucial part of that.

The strategy sets out a challenge to all of us in the UK to live more sustainably, and to choose healthier and happier lives. However, we know that making difficult choices today for a better tomorrow is often hard. Our Together We Can action plan, which was launched on 28 June—and which, again, is a cross-departmental initiative—describes how communities can work with the Government to secure the future. That will be supported by programmes to encourage communities to save energy, recycle, play their part in tackling climate change, improve local neighbourhoods, support healthy eating and exercise, and promote a range of other sustainable development issues.

The strategy also recognises that there is a need to improve the local environment in our most deprived communities. Some 56 per cent. of local environments in England in 2003–04 were described as unsatisfactory or poor. That has improved by 12 per cent. since 2001, but the figure remains unsatisfactory and we have a long way to go.

There is also an issue of social justice, because people in our most deprived areas generally have the worst local environments, with vandalism experienced by 27.9 per cent. of households in deprived areas, as compared with only 6.6 per cent. elsewhere. Air quality is often poorer and residents in deprived areas are much less satisfied with refuse collection services than the average population. Two London studies suggest that poorer households are also less able to access recycling services.

We want to make England cleaner, safer, greener and healthier. I am pleased that recycling rates are increasing, and we recently granted new powers to local authorities to tackle those issues under the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act 2005. We have also provided programmes of funding, support and guidance on such matters with "Living Spaces" and the "How to" guides. For the future, we want to provide everyone with much better information about the quality of the local environment in their area through data on their doorstep to encourage and inspire communities to act.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): In passing, as my hon. Friend is talking about the UK sustainable development strategy, I hope that it is not only England that we make greener. Much of Scotland is green enough thanks to the generous rainfall, but it is important to emphasise that the strategy is a UK strategy, allowing for the devolved interest.

Will my hon. Friend say a bit more about Environment Direct and how it will relate to the other initiatives that have been launched to encourage people to choose a more sustainable way forward in their personal lives? It is important that there should be as much publicity as possible of the various sources of information available and that they should be as clear as possible, to maximise the opportunity that exists.

Mr. Morley: Environment Direct is linked with a range of Government strategies. I mentioned the "How to" guides, for example. There could be a link between Environment Direct and "How to". It will also link in with the £12 million budget that we have for a promotion later this year on climate change, what it means and what contribution individuals can make. Incidentally, that £12 million is not just for an advertising promotion, although that will be part of it because it is important; it will also be about funding local groups and trying to give some support at grass roots level to groups that are working in communities to promote energy reduction and insulation, and offer advice.

The advantage of Environment Direct is that there will be information for people and consumers who want to make informed choices. For example, the latest washing machines and dishwashers use a fraction of the electricity and water used by those made not very long ago. In fact, they are now graded from A to F in relation to energy use. That is an important step forward in terms of consumer information. It has completely changed the white goods sector because no manufacturer wants to put anything on the market that has not got an A rating. People look for the A rating. There is even a new rating of A plus, which goes beyond the A rating. I am glad to say that the washing machine that I bought recently has that rating.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): The Minister will remember the parliamentary questions that I have asked about TVs and other goods on stand-by, which he was kind enough to give reasonably full answers to. Does he agree that it is a deplorable waste of energy to have goods churning out carbon emissions for no good purpose? Would it not be better if, through EU legislation, manufacturers were prevented from having a stand-by mode and people had to choose that kind of function themselves, rather than having it automatically as a default?

Mr. Morley: I agree. I am glad to tell the hon. Gentleman that I recently launched the new eco-standard directive, which has come from the European Union. It sets new design standards and the first phase focuses on energy consumption and, in particular, the stand-by mode. Even as things stand, there is a huge difference in power consumption between different models of television, for example. Some TVs use 80 per cent. of their normal running power in stand-by mode. That is an incredible amount of energy. The more modern TVs use a fraction of that. The eco-standard sets new standards of design. Initially, it will be voluntary, although the Commission is obliged to bring forward at least one compulsory standard in two years. So, we will see that happen.

There is growing awareness of the waste of energy involved in things such as stand-by mode and how the design of electrical equipment can make a huge difference. Even though the first phase is voluntary, it is a challenge to manufacturers. If they do not respond to the new standard, it will inevitably be followed by compulsory standards. I hope that we will see those changes in the near future.

Mark Lazarowicz: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for the information that he has provided. May I just clarify one point? Will the £12 million for the climate change programme be available for activities throughout the UK, or is it restricted to England or England and Wales?

Mr. Morley: If my memory serves me right, I think that this is a UK programme—[Interruption.] Yes, I am pleased to say that my memory does serve me right.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): The Minister did not seem sure.

Mr. Morley: It was just coming to me, Mr. Hancock. I was racking my brains. With devolution, we expect the devolved Administrations to bring forward their own action programmes in relation to their own priorities.

Sustainable development also means being able to go from local to global. For the first time, the strategy has integrated our national policy goals with our international policy goals. I have just given some examples in relation to climate change. We need to tackle the whole issue of greenhouse gas emissions. We have a high awareness of the issue in this country. The focus of the G8 and the EU presidencies has been helpful in that respect.

I am glad to say that we also have political agreement in this country that there is a need for action. The only argument is about how fast we are going and who has done more than others in the past, but that is not a bad position to be in compared with many other countries. The consensus for action in this country is important and will help us achieve the ambitious domestic goals that we have set. We are well on track for Kyoto and have already achieved our target, but we want to do more than that. We recognise that Kyoto is but the first step in the process, not the end.

Norman Baker: At the risk of trying the Minister's patience, can he be encouraged to answer this question a third time? There is consensus in this country about the science and the need for action, which is welcomed by all parties. However, there is no consensus in the G8, which is wrestling with that subject today. I am sure that the Prime Minister has been doing his best in Gleneagles, despite the difficult circumstances that we all face.

Does the Minister recognise that there may be a choice—I hope that there is not and I understand his position and desire—between a meaningful post-Kyoto process through the coalition of the willing and a meaningless piece of paper that the Americans consent to sign up to? I hope, as he does, that we can avoid that. If we cannot, are the Government in favour of the former or the latter?

Mr. Morley: That is a false choice. It does not exist. We can move forward on a multi-track basis and nothing will come out of Gleneagles that will alter our commitment to the United Nations forum on climate change or to our domestic targets, which go much further than the Kyoto agreements.

We seek to reach an agreement with countries such as the United States. That is important. Whatever agreement we seek, I am confident that it will be meaningful. I said in DEFRA questions that there is not the slightest chance that the UK will sign up to a meaningless agreement. I hope and believe that there is every possibility that we will be able to move forward on the subject of our contact with the United States and, incidentally, on the subject of our contact, co-operation and collaboration with countries such as China and India, that are also part of the G8 process. That does not mean that we will have to go in one direction or the other, but that we should follow all tracks. We should look for co-operation at all levels. I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman would encourage that.

We will see co-operation and progress coming out of Gleneagles. I am not in a position to say so for certain—I do not think that the final agreements have been drafted and I am sure that negotiations will go on right to the end—but I believe that the G8 will address climate change and will not undermine our commitments. It is a question, not of choosing one or the other, but of a multi-track approach.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): Is it not a fact, however, that whatever agreement is reached at the G8 meeting, we cannot and should not set aside the post-Kyoto process through the conference of the parties? Whatever happens this week might be superseded or enhanced by an agreement in Montreal at the end of November. That is the formal legal process for implementing Kyoto and moving beyond it.

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. That is why we will not see and would not expect targets to come out of Gleneagles. Targets should be negotiated through the meeting of the parties in the Montreal conference.

I hope that we will see some thinking about post-2012 coming out of Gleneagles. I repeat that Kyoto is the start of the process and we have to turn our minds to post-2012. We have to think about how we will take that forward at the Montreal conference. The discussions from Gleneagles may play an important part in that, but Gleneagles is not a process for short-circuiting the international process of the United Nations. That is where such discussions should take place, as my hon. Friend rightly states, and where agreements should be made.

We want to develop a dialogue on climate change, clean energy and sustainable development that will complement the UN process. We are well aware that that will not be easy and that there are differences of opinion. From what I have seen already, the statements from President Bush on accepting the science and that there is a problem have gone far beyond what he has said publicly to date. That may not seem much to us in this country where we have long accepted those principles, but given the resistance that still exists in the United States and the vested interests there, it is a welcome step forward in itself. I hope that we shall see more than that, but we should not underestimate that step forward in recognising the priorities.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): To make a factual correction, I think that the process began not at Kyoto, but in Rio some years before. On biofuels—I declare an interest in the matter—oilseed rape and cereals are being exported to other countries in the EU to be made into biofuel, which is then re-imported into this country. That is crazy. The experts have told me that the problem is not simply the amount of tax rebate on biofuels, but the lack of long-term commitment. If they had a commitment of three to five years of the present tax regime, they would be encouraged to invest. There are active plans for a plant in the south-west, if they could have that long-term commitment. Will the Minister consider the matter seriously?

Mr. Morley: That is a serious issue and I accept that the discussion process started in Johannesburg, although the framework to which people refer started in Kyoto. There is no disagreement on that point.

On biofuels, I was talking to investors in a new biofuel plant that is being built on Teesside. Another is being built in Scotland. Investors in this country are interested and I agree that a biofuel sector is important to climate change. It also offers benefits to farmers in this country and we should not underestimate that.

The climate change review is taking place and we will publicise the results. It is designed to guide Government strategy to help us meet our 2010 target, and biofuels are part of that review. I understand what the hon. Gentleman says. The duty rebate is but one measure that can be applied to biofuels. There are others.

We want to look at the whole issue of bio-energy and the supply chain. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that Sir Ben Gill has been tasked with producing a report on how we can develop a biofuel industry in this country. We have also made funding available to develop the supply chain for biofuels. We are committed and I hope that we can take that further.

This year, key meetings are taking place on sustainability. Gleneagles is an important meeting and I hope that it has a good outcome. There are also high level dialogues with China, India and Brazil in the EU summits with those countries. There is the Doha development agenda and the World Trade Organisation meeting in Hong Kong, which is important for trade. There is continued need for reform of common agricultural policy schemes, such as the sugar regime, which will come under the UK presidency. We want better regulations—the registration, evaluation and authorisation of chemicals proposals—and to review the EU's sustainable development strategies.

Again, as part of our presidency and within the climate change agenda we want to include aviation in the second phase of the European trading scheme and we believe that there is considerable support for that. There are time issues and we will not be able to achieve completion within six months, but we can bring the matter forward and start the process of including aviation.

The Montreal conference on the UN framework convention on climate change is coming up and the UK will lead the EU at that conference and chair the co-ordination meetings. I hope that we can play our role in taking the process forward within the UNFCCC agenda.

We will publish the climate change review towards the end of the year, and it will address many of the points that hon. Members have made. Work is ongoing on the energy efficiency innovation review, and the revised climate change review timetable fits quite well with that.

I have one final point, which is quite topical. I am glad to say that sustainability was a big feature of the successful bid for the London Olympics, and I had some input in that respect. The bid and the design are based on using recycled materials and water, on having a zero-carbon impact in terms of development and on green space. All of that will contribute to the legacy, which is also a strong part of the London bid, and I believe that that legacy will be sustainable for the future.

I am pleased not only about the success of our Olympic bid, but about the priority that sustainable design was given in our bid programme. I very much look forward to sustainable design being incorporated in the new stadium, the new Olympic village and the new housing that will be built in the area for the future. In terms of sustainability, that will be a very good legacy for a very long time to come.

2.56 pm

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): I am delighted to respond to this important debate on behalf of the official Opposition. Sustainability has become something of a watchword. Every political speech needs to mention it to gain any degree of validity. Defining it, however, is altogether more difficult because it is used rather loosely, so I hope that the debate can help us clarify what we mean by it.

It is right that we should recognise that sustainable development and sustainable models for production and consumption are essential if we are to respect our environment while allowing for improvement and development. If Britain is to play a prominent role in changing the models of production and consumption in the way that the Minister described—particularly during our chairmanship of the G8 and the EU—we must provide more than just talk.

As I said, it seems that sustainability must be in any speech if that speech is to be recognised as relevant, and I am afraid that there is also a tendency in government to bolt the term on to every policy, as though that alone makes the policy more persuasive and deliverable. Although much of the debate is not about partisan matters, it is important that we hold the Government to account on whether they are delivering on their fine words and great promises. Words and targets might sound impressive, but the Government cannot tackle the problems without introducing a range of deliverables on which they can be tested.

Let me start what I hope will be a thorough exposure of the weaknesses of the Government's position by dealing with their policy on housing. They champion that policy—I shall deal with it in greater detail during my speech—on the grounds that it is about the development of sustainable communities. In practice, it is neither sustainable, nor about communities.

The opportunity cost of the Government's policy is twofold. First, they have failed to regenerate parts of Britain such as the north of England and some of our greater cities, which so desperately need investment, including in housing. There has been no injection of energy, led by the Government, inspired by policy and enacted by the private sector. Instead, 400,000 homes face demolition, many of which could be renovated in a more environmentally sustainable way than by their demolition and the building of new homes, and some of which are essential to the character of their areas. The policy is an inevitable consequence of the Government's declared intent to concentrate development where development pressure is already greatest.

The second prong of the opportunity cost of the Government's policy—

Mr. Chaytor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: Let me first deal with the second prong. The hon. Gentleman can then attack me on both prongs simultaneously in what I am sure will be a witty and pithy intervention.

The second element in the Government's policy means destroying some of our precious environment. Since Labour came to power, it has approved no fewer than 162 schemes for building on green land that was intended to stop urban sprawl. The green belt is being developed where it should be used to protect against sprawl, and is being expanded where development pressure is at its least.

Some 90 per cent. of the land added to the green belt since 1997 is in areas described as scenic or remote. The principle of the green belt, which was introduced in this House in 1955 by Duncan Sandys, is to provide a tight circle of land around urban areas to prevent them from sprawling. That principle has been, at best, misunderstood, and, at worst, abused by the Government. When we talk about sustainability and look at the development of our towns and cities and at housing policies, we must understand that the twin losses of green belt and the opportunity for redevelopment in urban areas are direct products of the Government's policy.

I shall happily give way to the hon. Gentleman if he still wants to intervene.

Mr. Chaytor: I shall try to attack the hon. Gentleman's prongs consecutively rather than simultaneously. First, I shall address the issue of older houses in the north of England. I am the only Member present from the north of England, and am probably the only Member present who was born in one of the older terraced houses to which he refers. Huge numbers of people are desperate for some of those houses to be demolished and replaced by modern, more energy-efficient, sustainable homes.

The hon. Gentleman made a second point about the green belt. Between 1979 and 1987, huge swathes of green belt in my constituency were built on to create enormous suburban housing estates with few, if any, social facilities, thereby contributing to the completely unsustainable lifestyles that many people are now forced to live. Does he think that the Conservative demolition of the green belt was somehow different from the Government's policy?

Mr. Hayes: Let me deal first with the point about demolishing those homes. You will know, Mr. Hancock, because you are an assiduous student of these things, that the policy of demolishing homes, many of which are occupied, is contrary to English Heritage advice to the Government that renovating Victorian terraces is cheaper, more environmentally friendly and better for the local social fabric than demolition.

The Government often use the power of the regions to ride roughshod over local opinion in such matters. Local opinion may support demolition where it is appropriate, but the wholesale implementation of this policy through regional authorities without the proper involvement of local communities and irrespective of such advice causes a certain amount of alarm among all non-partisan observers. The hon. Gentleman may be a partisan observer, but I try to approach these things with a trifle more empiricism.

Mr. Chaytor: With respect, I am a partisan observer because I was born and lived in one of those places. Many of my constituents still do and they want to get rid of them. I am not making sweeping generalisations. I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that few members of the board of English Heritage or few of its senior officials ever lived in any of those houses, and I am sure that he would agree that the further away one is from an old, decrepit Victorian terrace, the more likely one is to support its preservation, so long as someone else lives there.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): Order. That is more of a speech. The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) takes interventions, but I should much prefer it if the hon. Member for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor) waited for his chance to respond to the debate.

Mr. Hayes: I do not want to be encouraged to go down a tributary and so to be distracted from the main thrust of what is, I am sure the whole Chamber would agree, a fascinating peroration.

I, too, have lived in a Victorian terraced house and when I have asked most politicians, builders and most other people of some importance whether they would choose or have chosen to live in a house built before or after 1900, the responses, which should not come as a surprise to many people but perhaps do to the hon. Gentleman, were that they would choose to live in older properties. They, for the most part, do not live in modern houses. I do not. I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman and most of us present do, but let us not go down that road.

The truth is that the Government's sustainable communities plan flies in the face of the statements that they have made about sustainability, many of which were repeated by the Minister during his opening remarks. He said that on 7 March, the Government launched their strategy for sustainable development, "Securing the Future". However, what have they actually done to secure the future? One year ago, the Sustainable Development Commission published a critique of the Government's track record on sustainable development. Some of the comments on the report card that it created for the Government were:

"Greenhouse gas emissions: Disappointing. Road transport emissions and projected increases in air travel will cancel out reductions in other areas.

"Road traffic: Dreadful. Britain has the most congested roads in Europe, and we spend more time commuting than any other European nation. The Government's response seems to be to alter targets rather than change policies to meet previous targets.

"Waste: Dreadful. Municipal waste is rising faster than GDP and faster than in most other European countries. Recycling rates are rising, but are still among the lowest in Europe."

No doubt the Government will claim that they have improved their record since last year, or will maintain that this year's strategy will magic away their failures, but the RSPB has already drawn attention to its concerns that in the Government's sustainable development strategy, there is a lack of overall top-level responsibility for making the strategy work in practice, and that no one part of Government will ensure the overall implementation of the strategy.

I do not doubt for a moment the Minister's commitment to, nor his integrity in, such matters. He has a long and honourable record of taking more than just an interest in them. He was a champion of many elements of sustainability before they were fashionable. Before they were included in every speech, they were in his speeches. We are in the presence of a Minister who cares about such matters. However, I wonder if in his heart of hearts, he believes that there is sufficient co-operation between Departments, throughout the public sector and throughout other agencies to meet the admirable targets and objectives that the Government have laid out and that he has articulated.

I am not sure that on this matter there has been joined-up government, even if there has been the necessary joined-up thinking. That is of particular importance to sustainability, because it is integral to so many aspects of what we do. Sustainability is hard to achieve because of its complexity, because it is multi-faceted and because it affects so many areas of our lives. I do not underestimate the challenge when I make what I hope is constructive criticism.

Despite the Secretary of State's promises, made when launching the strategy, to put an emphasis on delivery rather than on challenging aspirations, we have been faced with a number of new or repeated promises, and a serious question mark hangs over the possibility of meeting them. Let us consider for a moment the Government's record on sustainable development.

The Government now have 68 sustainable development strategy indicators. It seems on occasion that they do their best to alter them when it suits them to do so. In a sense, it is better in politics to limit one's targets, to be straightforward and consistent about them and then be tested against them, than it is to be elaborate or creative about one's targets and thus to cause uncertainty about whether they have been met.

There used to be 15 headline indicators and 147 other indicators. The campaign for rural england points out that a "key measure of countryside protection and efficient land use has been dropped."

If the Government are dropping targets that they do not think can be met and perhaps adding targets that are already on schedule—notwithstanding the appropriate words I used about the Minister's personal commitment—it is unsurprising that certain doubts have arisen about the nature of the commitment of the people who really run the show.

Governments are susceptible to the ministrations not only of those who favour sustainability but of those who endanger it. Dare I mention supermarkets, a subject for debate that might take even longer that the present subject? The power of large retailers affects all aspects of life. The stick that they wield when dealing with primary and secondary producers such as the many farmers in my constituency; their relationship with the consumer, which is at best patronising and at worst something altogether more sinister; and the influence that they have on public policy formation, all seem to be cause for serious concern. There has rarely been a case of such power being held by so few in so unaccountable a fashion.

I am a little surprised that the Minister did not address that point directly in his comments about sustainability. The major retailers have a great impact upon the mode of consumption and the nature of production, which affect lives throughout Britain. I want to see a rebalancing of the food chain in the interests of primary producers. I want to see a fairer deal for farmers. I want to see traceability being provided through a shorter food chain, with more emphasis on local supply. I look briefly to my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), who has infinitely more experience of farming than I do, when I say that we appear to want our farmers to do more and more, yet we seem to value them less and less. I hope that the Minister will address that point during his summation of our debate.

One of the indicators of long-term sustainability is a record of what percentage of new homes are being built on previously developed brownfield land. That indicator no longer appears in the headline figures. That may be unsurprising because the Government's definition of brownfield land encourages what I have previously called town cramming: people's back gardens being built upon, even though the resultant developments are sometimes unsustainable in that they can have a significant impact on local water usage, air quality, wildlife and other environmental factors.

Although there are encouraging signs, which I shall acknowledge shortly, it seems that the Government have yet to recognise that brownfield land is a stream, not a reservoir; as land use changes, new development opportunities become available. There are two ways in which the Government could deal with the issue more imaginatively. The first is through the extensive redesignation of brownfield land for residential development rather than commercial development, where commercial development is unlikely to take place. What I mean is that much brownfield is currently designated for industrial or commercial development because it has a historic use of that kind. The decaying factory, the empty warehouse—we all know of sites that have been unused for perhaps a decade or more, but where there is faint hope that the industry will return. Meanwhile, land for residential development, which would be regenerative and environmentally desirable, goes wanting. Redesignation following a proper appraisal of the balance between those two requirements is one way of increasing development on brownfield land in many urban and suburban areas.

The second way is to free up large amounts of public-sector land—this is where I give the Government some credit, although they started about a year after I recommended it in Conservative housing and planning policy. There is good news on this front as the Government are taking the idea seriously. I hope that it will bear the fruit that I think it can. However, I issue a word of warning about £60,000 houses and the idea that such land should be made available solely for the building of houses for particular groups.

If I were a teacher or a nurse, I am not sure that I would want to work with my fellows all day and then go home and live with them all night on a campus designed by the Deputy Prime Minister. Such schemes may well not create real integrated communities. I suspect that people prefer to live next door to people who do other jobs, have other interests and do other things. Real communities are organic, are they not? They are mixed. I happily live in a lovely village that has all kinds of different people and it works for that very reason. Socially and culturally it is sustainable and delivers a high quality of life. I therefore issue a word of warning about the mix of Maplins and Chairman Mao that seems to lie behind the idea that we are going to force people who do certain jobs to live in prefabs. However, I welcome the idea that public sector land will be brought into the net more than it ever has been, because it is highly sustainable.

The sustainable communities plan has at its heart several misassumptions about sustainability. There are fundamental misassumptions concerning the demand on water, for instance, which in the south of England, including the constituency of the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), is a massive problem. A number of Select Committees have highlighted the threat to air quality, including the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Committee, which specifically commented on it in its critique of the sustainable communities plan. The Minister will already be aware of that, but I remind him anyway. The Committee warned of excessive pressure on water supply and other natural resources, and mentioned other sustainability issues, such as the costs of providing transport links, education and the other facilities that new neighbourhoods require.

The Committee also discussed the journey to work times, which affect not only quality of life but emissions, and the relocation of people to areas with which they have previously had no connection. The major house-builders, such as Barratt Homes and Wimpey, say that more than 80 per cent. of people buy their houses within 10 miles of where they live now. The idea that all development will be concentrated in four areas, with all the environmental impact that I have described, and that we will persuade builders to build those houses and people to live in them when their first preference, according to the major builders, is to live within 10 miles of where they live now, seems at best ambitious and at worst fanciful. There are real doubts about such concentrations of development. It is environmentally unsustainable.

As the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Committee said in the recommendations on neighbourhoods, sustainability is also about community and people's sense of worth and purpose, and those things are defined by our sense of identity, our sense of place. I am not sure that communities can be constructed in quite the way the Government intend. Change is best when it is incremental and organic, but I suppose people expect me to say that because I am a root-and-branch Conservative. Nevertheless, I do not believe that it is beyond anyone in this Chamber to have some sympathy with that perspective, which is widely shared beyond the political class.

Mr. Morley: That is all very lyrical and interesting, but there is an enormous demand for homes in the south and south-east. One reason why homes are expensive is that demand is fuelling high prices. We cannot ignore that. All I have heard are arguments against the development of communities. Is the hon. Gentleman saying that his party is opposed to the expansion of housing and to meeting the aspirations of many young people?

Mr. Hayes: No. I know that the Minister does not have responsibility for housing, so I shall deal with that important intervention in three simple parts. First, there is the misassumption that house affordability is best dealt with by supply-side changes. Of course, that can be done, but given that the proportion of new housing to total stock is 1 per cent. and that only 10 per cent. of annual transactions involve new housing, to affect prices significantly by supply-side change would require building a massive number of houses, which is what Kate Barker recognised, and would probably take 10 or 15 years because of issues such as planning, land availability and local objections.

I suggest that house price affordability is principally a feature of demand-side issues, such as the level of borrowing secured by housing equity, net migration and interest rates. Those are the demand-side factors that drive up and hold up house prices. As we saw when the Chancellor adjusted interest rates recently, the effect of that on prices is considerably quicker and much more predictable than the changes that might result from the kind of building programme that the Minister describes.

Mr. Morley: Still new homes, then?

Mr. Hayes: I shall come back to that.

The second point that the Minister implicitly made was about young people having access to the houses that they need. My judgment is that much the best way of allowing young people to get on to the housing ladder is by seriously concentrating on equity. Actually, the Government accepted that about a year after I first recommended it. It is by making housing more available to the people who need it through dealing creatively with equity that one can affect affordability almost immediately—certainly more quickly—and more sustainably. I hope that there will be an equity revolution in which we can make many more homes available to the people who need them by bridging the gap between their means and what is available.

What we have in Britain is a mismatch between provision and need. Many people who live in large houses would love to live in accessible houses because the large house has become too big for them, but there is a shortage of accessible homes. Many people who live in rented accommodation say, whenever they are surveyed, that they would like to live in their own home. Many people who live in temporary accommodation would like to live in rented accommodation. Dealing with the mismatch between provision and need through equity, and breaking the barrier between ownership and social housing, would provide solutions.

The Minister's third point about where to build houses is perhaps the most difficult to answer. I do not take the view that we should necessarily dictate the number of houses that should be built nationally each year. We only do that in housing. We do not say that we should produce X number of baked beans every year. We do not get the Deputy Prime Minister saying how many Jags should be built in a year. Other Ministers do not suggest what sort of production there should be in all sorts of other sectors, but in housing we feel the need to say that X number of houses should be built in a year. I rather suspect that that is a finger in the air task, and the housing industry thinks so, too.

There is a need, however, to demand of local areas that they come up with a plan for the sustainable development of their locality. I would place that duty on areas, and expect the process to produce a notional number of houses needed. If a local authority were to act perversely and say that it did not want anything built anywhere, there might well be long-stop powers to intervene. A bottom-up approach would give us the sort of plans that we need to deliver the houses that people want in an incremental, organic and sustainable fashion. It is the centralised approach that lies at the heart of our problems. We need new houses. We need to look at equity and affordability, but not via the means that the Government are planning to employ.

The Government's housing targets, which I have mentioned, mean that, unless more measures are put in place, our water consumption will go up and up, resulting in water shortages or the need for more reservoirs and desalination plants. If our use of resources is to be truly sustainable, we cannot gloss over the subject and dismiss trends in water usage as entirely the result of hot weather. The Government's comments on those trends tend to do so. The more water that we consume, the less is available for other natural freshwater habitats, and those habitats already need as much help as they can get to grow sustainably.

The Government's indicator of sustainable development No. 30 concerns river quality and shows that the percentage of rivers of good biological quality has increased marginally in England since 1997. That is an issue with which the Minister is familiar as he takes great interest in both river quality and drainage issues. He is an authority on both. I take an interest in drainage myself, as he knows, and when I have been doing other jobs on the Opposition Front Bench we have exchanged ideas—I will not say crossed swords—on that subject.

Incidentally, although there are no Welsh or Northern Ireland Members here to hear this, the percentage of biologically sustainable rivers in Wales and Northern Ireland has decreased since 1997. I am sure that the Minister knows that, and I am sure that he shares my concern about it. It is also significant that some environmental groups believe that the current river quality indicator is inadequate and does not make a good assessment of the state of our rivers. The RSPB, for example, feels that the current indicators give an over-rosy view of the situation.

The Government have, in measuring the state of our rivers, ignored some of the most important factors in determining river quality such as nitrates and phosphates. We must also remember that the apparent improvements in other areas, such as fish stocks, are not all they seem at first. Almost two thirds of fish stocks remain outside safe biological limits.

While we are dealing with fish, I would like to mention sustainability in respect of the oceans that surround the United Kingdom. The Minister and I have exchanged views on that subject before. I want to make one point on the matter: the continuation of industrial fishing, and the effect that that has on the food source for white fish stocks, is an outrage. He shares that view and has articulated it in Europe to the best of his ability, but he has come up against the confines of the common fisheries policy.

The common fisheries policy is remarkable in that, bizarrely, during its lifetime, it has produced less fishermen and less fish simultaneously—[Interruption.] Yes, I have picked up on the grammatical correction—if only we studied classics more in our schools. It has produced fewer fishermen and fewer fish.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): The hon. Gentleman is getting tired.

Mr. Hayes: Indeed.

The Minister has waxed lyrical on that subject, but we need action. It is extraordinary that our oceans are depleted in that way. There are technological changes, closed areas and all kinds of environmentally sustainable means by which we can deal with that beyond the crude instruments of quotas and throwbacks, which are alarming to the public and ineffective in achieving their objective.

Moving on to the air, I want to say a little about birds. I will not go on endlessly, but these are important matters. I want to cover the principal points, as I know that the Minister would expect me to. Performance indicator 20 deals with bird populations. It has become obvious that farmland species of birds have declined since 1997. In anticipation of the debate, I was talking to a sustainable farmer in my constituency a few days ago. He is one of the farmers who have been involved in the entry-level scheme and he has been working closely with officials to work out the best ways in which to effect the beneficial implications of single-farm payments—the move away from payments coupled to production.

There has been a clear increase in the population of some species of birds, not only since 1997, but over the past two decades. It is certainly true that woodpeckers, tits, finches and others have done relatively well. It is also true that some of the birds of prey have done well. While I was visiting the farm, we saw a marsh harrier, which is always a treat; one does get them in the fens, of course. However, it is equally true that, as the Minister will know, a number of other species have declined quite radically. They are often the species that are more traditionally associated with a farmland landscape. I am worried that some of those decreases are taking the species beyond sustainable limits. In England, between 1971 and 1996–97, the wading bird population increased by 59 per cent. and the waterfowl population by 130 per cent., but the number of wintering wetland birds fell by 10 per cent. As I said, a number of other species are in serious decline.

The same indicators are applied to human satisfaction with our environment. I am sure that everyone will agree that one of the most important elements in sustainable development is creating an increasing standard of living for the people of Britain, while protecting the environment that we inhabit. Yet in the case of indicator 66—the percentage of households satisfied with the quality of the places in which they live—the percentage of households satisfied with their local area fell by 4.6 per cent. between 1999 and 2004. The figures show that 53 per cent. of households were bothered by traffic, 45 per cent. by litter and rubbish and 43 per cent. by vandalism and hooliganism.

Surely such failures on sustainable development indicators as widely varied as air quality, conservation and people's satisfaction cannot be ignored. The Government missed a trick with the decent homes standard. In my judgment, it should have been a decent communities standard that took into account the factors that affect quality of life outside people's front doors. It is fine to have a new bathroom or kitchen—we all want one, do we not?—but it is not much fun if someone leaves their bathroom showered and fresh and enters their neighbourhood to face graffiti, rubbish, vandalism and crime. What goes on outside people's front doors is at least as important as what happens in their homes in terms of their quality of life.

I urge the Government to consider how they might effect a decent communities standard using all the appropriate agencies to co-operate and to focus on those matters. That is what sustainability is really about: vitality, community and quality of life. To see sustainability narrowly as merely environmental—although I have mentioned a number of environmental considerations that are essential to it—seems to miss the point. We must have a more ambitious, broader, more hopeful view of what sustainable communities are really about. The indicators mentioned so far are of great importance, but, in light of some of the issues of sustainable development that affect not only us but the whole world, they may be neglected.

If we are to develop sustainably, it is imperative that we tackle the global issues, such as greenhouse gas emissions, the sustainable use of energy, the preservation of forests and the disposal of waste. Indeed, the Government's sustainable development website refers to climate change as the greatest threat. The Prime Minister has made a great point of that; he spoke about it recently when it came to the challenges facing him as he chairs the G8 and the EU. He described it as the "single biggest issue facing the world".

Yet, in the past year, UK CO_2 emissions rose by 1.5 per cent. and are now higher than at any point since 1997. Since the Government came to power, carbon emissions have increased by 3 per cent. The Government are short of their target of reducing carbon emissions by 20 per cent., not surprisingly given that Britain's spending on energy research and development is only 10 per cent. that of France and 20 per cent. that of Germany.

Despite the fact that power generation emits 30 per cent. of the UK's total CO_2 emissions, the Government's renewables obligation stands at generating 5.5 per cent. of electricity from renewables. I do not say that renewable technology is the only answer; at the same time, we need to do as the Minister suggested with consumption. There is no greater example of the need to deal with consumption than the way people shop. I return, albeit briefly, to the issue of supermarkets.

When people shop in their neighbourhoods, as my wife does at the butcher's across the green from where we live, the only energy that they use is that which comes from their own soul. When they drive four miles to the supermarket and back again, they are implicitly acting in a way that is less environmentally friendly. Encouraging local consumption is critical.

Simultaneously, we have to deal with packaging waste, which has spiralled alarmingly even in my relatively short and the Minister's slightly longer lifetimes. When we were children, things were wrapped in brown paper tied with string and lemonade bottles were returned for a few pence. Now, everything we buy seems to have every possible material attached to it before we get to the good purchased.

I buy toys for my son that are 3 in long. They come in boxes that are immense and include metal, plastic, wood, paper and cardboard and all kinds of other materials that I cannot imagine. That is a new phenomenon. We must deal radically with packaging waste if we are to get to the heart of that side of the debate about sustainability and protection for the environment.

I should like to say a word on renewables. Can we move away from placing wind turbines in environmentally sensitive areas? Can we, for heaven's sake, consider the relative impact that the imposition of turbines has on the surrounding environment? It does not take a genius to work out that a 330 ft structure in a fenland siting will have a highly significant impact. It will be seen for miles, which would not be the case if it were placed somewhere less populated with a more undulating landscape, yet there is no provision to make such an assessment of the sites. We must invest in renewables, but not in a way that is damaging to the quality of life and the local environment of the people who have those industrial structures close by.

My final point concerns deforestation. The latest sustainable development report does not even mention the huge issue of the sustainable use of timber. It does deal with some of the other things that I have mentioned. It looks, for example, at recycling. There have been some improvements in recycling, as I said earlier. Most of us have probably witnessed that in our own homes and those of our constituents. However, we still have a long way to go. If Germany diverts nearly four times as much waste per person from landfill as the United Kingdom, and Denmark diverts nearly five times as much, we obviously need to do something serious about our disposal of waste. Perhaps we should pay more attention to some of the environmental groups that are still worried about the Government's action on those sustainability issues.

By contrast, the Government have been almost silent on the use of timber. As deforestation increases to unprecedented levels, we should remember that an estimated 60 per cent. of tropical timber imports to the UK are illegal. That clearly must not be allowed to continue, and the Government must ensure that any forest certification schemes that they approve are sustainable. They must also have proper audits and checks to ensure that such schemes really are sustainable. If we are to continue to believe that the Central Point of Expertise on Timber is effective in protecting forests, we must be told how the Government are progressing on the sustainable use of timber, and environmental groups' serious worries about the issue should not be ignored.

I am grateful for the Chamber's tolerance and indulgence, because I have spoken for a long time. As I said, the issue should go beyond the normal knockabout of partisan politics, because it is too important to be treated in that way. I hope that some of the issues that I have raised have struck a chord throughout the Chamber. I recognise that these are long-term issues. Many of the developments that I have raised began before 1997, and many of them will continue long after this Government have left office.

[Mr. Hayes]

Human-scale development means that each human being feels valued. They must have the chance to develop a clear sense of identity and a real sense of purpose. To achieve that, we must be fierce in defence of the gentle. We must be determined to champion organic development. We must really care about sustainability. That is politics on a human scale—and that is the politics that I want to be part of.

Mr. Mike Hancock (in the Chair): It would be very uncharitable of anyone to say that that was anything other than a sustainable speech, Mr. Hayes. Very good.

3.42 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): As the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) admirably demonstrated, sustainability extends over a wide area. There is a problem with the word, because people down the pub do not know what it means, although they do know what the word "environment" means. They do not yet have any connection with the concept of sustainable development, notwithstanding the fact that the Government regularly use it in all sorts of documents and speeches.

There is a further problem with the concept of sustainable development. Potentially, it can lessen environmental protection, although it need not and will not do so if properly applied. Ten years ago, we simply had the concept of environmental protection. We would consider whether an activity added to the environment or diminished it in some shape or form or whether regulation improved or worsened matters. Now, a triangular assessment is made, involving not only an action's environmental implications, but its social and economic implications. I do not have a problem with that concept; indeed, for social justice reasons—the Minister used that phrase—and other reasons, it is important to consider those three legs together. However, those who do not take the environment seriously or who wish to pursue an alternative that looks above and beyond the environment have the opportunity to dress that alternative up with the word "sustainable", when it is nothing of the sort.

The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings referred to the Deputy Prime Minister's sustainable communities. I remember being at school many years ago and being told that the Holy Roman Empire was neither holy, Roman nor an empire and I suspect that the sustainable communities are neither sustainable nor really communities. The fact that the word "sustainable" has been stuck on the front does not deal with the problems of house building, particularly in the south-east. I listened to the exchange between the Minister and the hon. Gentleman, and I understand the need to consider housing on one hand and environmental problems on the other, but we cannot use the adjective "sustainable" and pretend that we have resolved the two, because we have not.

For example, the south-east has a major problem with water resources, as has been said. It is ludicrous that in my constituency a desalination plant is to be built off the coast at Newhaven, yet we have not yet grasped the nettle of water metering. So, someone can leave every tap in their house running all day and, if they are unmetered, will pay the same as someone who has their taps turned off all day. Given water scarcity in the south-east, where global warming is kicking in quickly and weather patterns are changing, and where significant development involving thousands of new homes is to be foisted on us—let us leave aside whether they are necessary—it is madness to ignore the policy's impact on water resources. The Government need to grasp the nettle of metering.

The Minister will know that I tabled amendments to the Water Bill to achieve the implementation of metering—quite courageously, I might add, because the policy does not necessarily enjoy universal support, although it needs to be implemented. I notice that the Minister has been talking about water metering in the past few days. He needs to grasp that nettle, follow through his convictions and bring forward a plan for universal metering, starting with the south-east. The Government should not leave that to water companies or blame someone else, but should take a lead themselves.

Mr. Morley: We have discussed this issue before, which is why the hon. Gentleman read my mind about what I was going to say. Water metering is the fairest and most sustainable way of paying for water. There is not water shortage throughout the country, however, and there are no shortages in the north of England. Therefore, the provision under the law for companies to apply for scarcity status, which will bring compulsory metering, is a reasonable way of addressing the problem.

Norman Baker: It might well be; we should start from the south-east, where the problem is greatest. However, the water companies that I speak to say that the hurdles are quite difficult to overcome.

Mr. Morley indicated dissent.

Norman Baker: The Minister shakes his head, but that is what companies in my area have told me. They have therefore been reluctant to go down the road he described. Clearly the Government think that there is a political price to pay for metering and they want the water companies to take the rap for it. That is the reality. He should follow through his convictions and give a lead.

Mr. Morley: I want to put this on the record, because many people read our debates: it is a responsible water company that brings forward an application under water scarcity status. We must of course examine the case for and against, but if a company has a case, it is right and proper that it should make an application.

Norman Baker: I will continue to encourage companies to do so; however, I do not subscribe to the view that the Minister implies, which is that all water companies that have not applied are irresponsible.

I have a concern about the three legs of sustainable development—in fact, the Government's document sets out five principles. If we are to achieve ownership and deliver sustainable development properly, it must be on a co-ordinated and cross-departmental basis. The Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs might have wonderful policies and the Minister might be fully signed up to them—as I am sure he and his boss are—but if they are outmanoeuvred by the Treasury, the Department of Trade or the Prime Minister, that does not take us much further forward. The real test is how well the concept is delivered, not by the Department that is its champion, but by other Departments.

Sometimes I find myself complaining to DEFRA Ministers in debates such as this about other Departments and I am reminded of someone complaining to a booking clerk about the train not running—it is not really that person's responsibility, but they are the only person to be found to moan at. I hope that the Minister does not find that comparison offensive, but, although DEFRA is on the right side of things, Ministers who perhaps are not do not appear in debates such as this.

I raise that for a good reason, because there have recently been debates in government about whether the definition of sustainable development should be changed. I refer the Minister to a letter that has come my way which was written on 13 May by the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. It is quite clear from the letter that there are moves afoot not in DEFRA but within the Government to shift the emphasis of sustainable development away from the environment. The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs wrote:

"Government departments have agreed so far on comments on the draft principles for the declaration."

The declaration was to do with the EU. The letter continues:

"They have not been able to agree, however, on language in the declaration relating to the meaning of sustainable development. Several departments have argued for language which would depart"—

"depart" is underlined—

"from the established domestic and international understandings of sustainable development which emphasise the need for integration of the three pillars: economic, social and environmental. This is with the aim of protecting the new focus achieved in the Lisbon agenda on jobs and growth. Defra and some other departments have argued that the UK cannot and should not attempt to challenge the established understanding of sustainable development, but should press its concerns about Lisbon prioritising jobs and growth in other ways."

She goes on to say that "we cannot"—

"cannot" is underlined—

"unilaterally choose to give it a different"—

"different" is also underlined—

"meaning. We are signed up globally—and very publicly—through the Rio and Johannesburg World Summits; our UK framework, which is shared with the devolved administrations, is based on the principle of integration and explicitly extends to our EU and wider international work".

She goes on complaining, with some justification, about other Departments.

I have tremendous respect for the Labour Members present. They are committed to the agenda, and I hope that they will use their good offices within the Labour party to try to back up the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and to deal with those who are causing the problems.

I refer to another document that has come my way. It says that it is unclassified, so I am sure that there is no problem with my having it. It is an internal Treasury memo about the previous letter. It is dated from May, and in paragraph 5 it says:

"The handling of the EU Sustainable Development Strategy between now and March 2006 has implications for the Treasury's economic reform agenda, as the strategy raises a number of risks for us."

Those who wrote these documents are very good at underlining words, as the memo continues with these words, which are also underlined:

"It is essential to ensure that if Lisbon is to be seen within this context"— meaning the focus on jobs—

"the focus of Lisbon on growth and jobs secured at Spring European Council is not diluted... However, Whitehall discussions on the prioritisation of the economics pillar have been contentious: Mrs Beckett does not agree with language that protects the focus on jobs and growth."

The memo then argues for action to be taken.

The memo continues with a letter in May from the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs. The Financial Secretary says:

"I would support an alternative approach to the one that Margaret proposes concerning the interpretation of sustainable development. In particular, I would seek to make clear the prioritisation of the economics pillar over and above the environment and social pillars in the context of sustainable development, in order to maintain the hard-won focus on jobs and growth secured at Spring Council... I am copying this letter to the Prime Minister".

It seems that the good words that the Minister present and his boss are keen to use, and in which they believe fully, are yet again being undermined by other Departments—in this case the Treasury. Perhaps we need a Chancellor who is green and not Brown to deal with those matters. A litany of examples over the years, including abandoned cars, fridge mountains or the EU emissions trading limits, has shown that DEFRA puts forward the right solutions but is outmanoeuvred by other Departments which get their way. The Minister must deal with that, and he must argue his case within the Government. It is clear that the joined-up approach in which he would have us believe simply does not exist. He wants to pretend that there is a duck on the water, but underneath the surface they are paddling madly to try to get an agreement throughout Departments, and they are not managing terribly successfully.

That is important in other respects—for example, in world trade talks. The Doha follow-up round comes later this year, but so far as I can tell it will be handled not by DEFRA but by the DTI. I hope that DEFRA is involved. I would like DEFRA to handle it; no one would be more delighted than me if DEFRA was in charge of that process. Of course, the argument on jobs and growth to which I referred is very much a DTI matter, and it is particularly interested not in sustainable development but in the Barroso approach of the European Union.

Given that our Trade Commissioner is on record as taking a jobs and growth agenda approach, how can we be confident that attempts will be made to prioritise sustainable development in the World Trade Organisation talks, or to ensure that minimum environmental standards and minimum animal welfare standards are argued for in that process? Or will we be pursuing a 1950s-style chase for jobs and growth on the basis that everything else will trickle down—that if we get the jobs right, everything else will follow? That strategy, if it can be called a strategy, was discredited many years ago, but it is clearly creeping back into the Treasury's thinking. The Government have the opportunity later this year to become involved in that; they are probably doing so already through the EU presidency. They must ensure that the DEFRA view of sustainable development is triumphant rather than the view put forward by the Treasury and others. I do not think that they can.

It is clear that there are major problems in how Departments relate to sustainable development. I do not want to go on at great length about that, but it is obvious. For example, we have all seen pictures in the papers of the lights in the MOD building being left on all night. The Treasury's fuel bills have rocketed. Some in the Government do not appear terribly worried about the environment, energy efficiency or the other priorities that the Minister correctly sets out. Yes, they will pay lip service to them, but they still leave the lights on—and I doubt that they are busy writing documents on sustainable development; they have gone home for the night and left the lights on.

That obvious symbol, small in itself, shows that the concepts that the Minister and his team are arguing for so stridently and honestly are simply not being bought by other Departments. What will the Minister do to sort out his colleagues and to ensure ownership across Departments of the sustainable development agenda? That applies also to the House of Commons, which has some pretty poor practices. We also need to put our house in order.

The Minister said that I had put forward a false choice on climate change. I hope that he is right; I hope that it does turn out to be a false choice. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than the Prime Minister pulling a rabbit out of the hat and saying that we have a wonderful agreement. I would happily stand up and publicly congratulate him on that. I do not blame him for it, but I fear that he is trying to balance different interests. In the end, he will want a piece of paper that says, "We have an agreement."

It is a natural inclination for politicians to want agreement. The danger is that such an agreement would, to use Labour's words, take us back not forward. It is important that there is a bottom line; the Government should not sign an agreement if it does not take us forward. Unless the Prime Minister has avoided it, there may be a difficult choice. Perhaps the US will not sign up to anything except something admitting that, yes, global warming is happening and, yes, we should spend money on technology. If that is all that is said, it will be a step backwards, not a step forwards. We need more from President Bush than that.

The Minister may say that President Bush is coming forward, but let us bear in mind that he is doing so on the basis of being outside Kyoto, and that he has been brought forward not because he is in the process—he is outside it—but because of pressure from the rest of the world, including from the British Government and from his own side, from the Republicans, from Schwarzenegger and others in the US who are doing the right thing.

So, there is a diplomatic calculation to be made. If the agreement is weak and Bush agrees, which would effectively water down what everyone else wants, would that help the rest of us? Would it help Schwarzenegger in the US? Would it help McCain who is now arguing strongly for action on climate change? Would it help the north-eastern states, that have an emissions trading scheme up and running? Or would their positions be strengthened by the US President being isolated? I do not want him to be isolated; I want him on board, but not at any price. The agreement with the US cannot be at any price. I hope that that is the Government's approach, although, of course, they may not want to say so publicly.

This is a gigantic issue. I could happily go on for five or 10 minutes on every subject and enjoy it tremendously, but I suspect that it might slightly frustrate others if I did so. I shall address one more major issue—aviation—and to some extent link it with road transport. A look at the Government's record on carbon emissions shows that some good progress has been made. Industry has certainly played a significant part in that. We are making progress in the domestic sector on emissions, albeit slow and sluggish progress, but, as the Minister will know, we are not making progress with transport emissions, which are rising very fast. There seems to be no strategy to reduce them, except to hope that technology will come along and solve all the problems. That does not seem to me to be a satisfactory strategy.

We have abandoned the idea of road traffic reduction, which hon. Members may remember from the Deputy Prime Minister's early days in that role. It seems that that idea has gone out of the window, and that we are now back to a road transport policy of predict and provide. It is impossible to open railway lines in this country. In a recent answer to a question of mine, the Secretary of State for Transport stated that we have reopened 12 miles only of abandoned rail lines since Labour came to power. Yet there are sections of railway up and down the country that would benefit from being reopened. We all know where they are: there is one in my constituency—the Lewes to Uckfield section—and there are plenty of others, but we cannot seem to open them. We can build new roads, but we cannot get railways reopened, even if the cost is less. There is something seriously wrong with the mindset of the Treasury when it still says that money spent on roads is investment, but money spent on rail is subsidy. We need to move away from that way of thinking.

I return, lastly, to aviation. The Minister knows that, if the departmental answers are correct, there will be an increase in emissions of 83 per cent. by 2020, and that a quarter or even a third of carbon emissions in our lifetimes will be from aviation. That cannot be allowed to happen. We must abandon the predict and provide policy of building more and more runways and airports, which is in the aviation White Paper. We should put that White Paper in the bin and start again.

The Minister puts all his money on the emissions trading scheme. I am in favour of the scheme and I hope that it will work—it is certainly a useful tool—but who can guarantee that it will not be business as usual at entry level for aviation? Who can guarantee that the aviation industry will not simply continue to pollute and buy the permits because it will be a relatively small part of the whole package, at least in initial years? Who can guarantee that the scheme will start in 2008? The latest information is that for aviation it will be put back to 2012, by which time there will be a huge number of extra emissions.

We need something else in the short term, but the Government do not have anything. We need to shift airport passenger duty on to the plane, or introduce an emissions tax for take-off—something in the short term until emissions trading kicks in. We also need to keep open the option of a kerosene tax internationally and in the EU, although that is not my favoured method of dealing with the problem. It has drawbacks, about which the Minister well knows, but we ought to keep the option open, if only, frankly, to hang the threat of it over the heads of the aviation industry, so that we can say, "If you don't come up with something serious, you might find this landing on your doormat." It is dangerous to abandon other mechanisms and put all our eggs in the emissions trading basket without the certainty that it will deliver.

I hope that when the Minister replies, he will respond to my real concern—for which there is evidence in leaked documents—about the fact that other Departments do not take this matter seriously. I hope also that he will deal with my points about aviation and transport, and tell us the methods by which we are to control aviation emissions. Never mind setting targets; what methods will be used to ensure that emissions are controlled? Currently, there is no strategy to do that.

4.4 pm

Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): It is always a challenge to follow the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), who has spent so much time grappling with environmental issues. The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) talked about the time that he had spent making his speech, and this debate is really all about time. What clearly emerges from the debate going on in the nation arising from the G8 summit is that we have little time to deal with this problem.

Many issues have been raised this afternoon. The eight or so Members in the Chamber—that reminds me of the eight at Gleneagles—know what the issues are. The question is not whether we should consider sustainable development, but how we should underpin it and integrate it with everything else that is done—every aspect of Government and international policy, every aspect of business and every aspect of Parliament's work, whether in the Chamber, in the other place, in Standing Committees or in Select Committees.

The question is also how to join up those issues, vertically and horizontally, because if we waste time and do not tackle them in the time available, future generations—our grandchildren, for whom we are doing all this, and who were considered in the Brundtland report and early work on sustainable development—will not thank us. That is why I am delighted that just at the time of the Gleneagles discussions the Government have timetabled a debate on sustainable development in this Chamber. That is the big picture. All that we do, we must do nationally, internationally and globally. We must find ways to work together. That is the challenge.

The challenge before us is also one of leadership. I speak as a non-member—although I hope soon to be reappointed—of the Environmental Audit Committee. The issue is one for Select Committees, and the Environmental Audit Committee has taken a leading role in Parliament in that regard. In its reports the Committee has repeatedly raised the question of the leadership role. We have reached the stage at which many of us know the issues, but cannot make progress without knowing what to do about them. I pay tribute to the leadership of our Prime Minister in getting global warming on the agenda at Gleneagles, and to those who, through music, over the weekend—not just in Hyde Park but in Europe and elsewhere—came together to gain greater understanding of the issues relating to poverty and the future of the planet.

What has emerged from previous Environmental Audit Committee reports as the key is the need for the leadership that the Prime Minister is now showing to be focused in Government and applied across Departments, from the Cabinet to the Treasury. I agree with the hon. Member for Lewes that that must be done in a cross-cutting way. We must mainstream all the things that we are talking about, which to many people still seem like another language, so that there is no excuse not to follow them through.

I hope that even if the Minister does not place in the Library leaked letters from the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to the Treasury and others, he will at least share with us how the people who are converted to the agenda of sustainable development can help him and the Secretary of State to ensure that the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer understand that if we fail to deal with these issues, it will be at our peril.

Norman Baker: As I believe in freedom of information, may I offer to put the letters in the Library if that would be of any help to Members?

Joan Walley: I am sure that that offer has been noted but, freedom of information or not, the most important thing is serious discussion with the Treasury. A succession of Green Ministers has come before the Environmental Audit Committee, and it seems that although they get their feet under the Select Committee witness table and talk to us about how they take the issue seriously, they then go back to their Departments and it is not on their radar screen any more.

We must find ways of bringing Parliament and the Select Committees together to ensure that there is support for Ministers such as my hon. Friend who is with us this afternoon to make an even stronger case for the progress that needs to be made on sustainability when they are dealing with pre-legislative scrutiny, the presidency of the European Union and working on the Montreal protocol, the conference of the parties and all the other treaties and negotiations that will come up during the next six months. I hope that this debate, brief as it is, will be an opportunity to do that.

I want to speak briefly about the work of the Environmental Audit Committee, which I hope will be reconvened early next week, or whenever all the other

[Joan Walley]

Select Committees are reconvened. It has an important role. "The Sustainable Development Strategy: Illusion or Reality?" was published in November. For understandable reasons—for example, the general election—we were happy to give the Government some leeway on the usual time taken to respond. I welcomed the way in which my hon. Friend the Minister handled the Government's response to the report. The Select Committee was talking about getting things done. However, rather than expecting the Government to respond in March, just before the general election, when perhaps they would not have had the opportunity to include all the good things that are there to be used in the sustainable development strategy, we were happy to wait for their response until the Select Committee was reconvened. All credit to the Minister for publishing it through the good offices of DEFRA, rather than waiting for the Select Committee to be reconvened before publishing it. That is a way of working together positively.

As for the agenda, the real issue now is how the Government's new sustainable development strategy is embraced, taken up and acted on, not just in Whitehall but around the country. The Select Committee agrees with some things and would like some things to be taken further. One issue that comes up is the relationship between the Environmental Audit Committee that will be formed next week and the implementation of the sustainable development strategy. That must be reviewed to ensure that there is clarity about roles, remits and opportunities to work more closely together. I hope that a debate, or negotiations, can take place, because we all need to reinforce the way in which we work together.

One issue in the new strategy that I want to flag up is the role of the Treasury, which the hon. Member for Lewes mentioned. Much of what the Government do is driven, rightly, by the competitive agenda and the need for jobs, and it is a real challenge to determine where environmental standards, values and regulations fit into that. It is clear that much of what is done around the country and within government is driven by service performance targets, yet how many of the Treasury's targets include environmental standards? Very few. Unless we find a way of putting the Treasury centre stage among Government Departments for the delivery of sustainable development so that it can work jointly, hand in hand with DEFRA, we will be talking to ourselves, and complaining at the railway station to whoever is directing us where to go, rather than being able to find someone who has overall responsibility for the whole agenda. That is why my plea is for DEFRA and our Prime Minister to accept that leadership role.

I accept that there will be issues. We need to know what the problems are and why the Treasury is not doing something—for example, why it has not gone further to solve the problem of VAT on building on brownfield sites. The Treasury was approached to find out why it was not giving tax concessions for brand-new kilns that considerably reduce carbon emissions, although there are tax concessions in other sectors for new investment and new technology. I am a little mystified that, despite the guidance from the Carbon Trust that much of the carbon emissions from kilns that work 24 hours a day in the ceramics industry could be avoided, the Treasury has not acknowledged that by giving the manufacturers tax concessions as an incentive to invest.

Those are anomalies, and we need to put them on the table so that we can identify them. One issue that has been mentioned in relation to house building and transport is that all too often, predict and provide has been the principle underpinning the Government's policies. We need to consider how to make what we do seem sensible to local communities, how that can be organically driven, and how tax concessions and the Treasury can work hand in hand with DEFRA to ensure that that policy is rolled out in Government policy throughout the country.

In the short time now left to me, I want to speak about education. During the previous Session, the Environmental Audit Committee, under my chairmanship, produced a report on education for sustainable development. The Government give a huge amount of attention to sport, and how to educate people through sport with match funding from the Department for Education and Skills. I applaud that, and it is wonderful that we will see all the benefits of it, not least following the wonderful news that London is to host the Olympics. I am not in any way bemoaning the fact that all that investment will be given to sport and regeneration through sport. However, when people such as Sir David King, the Archbishop of Canterbury, our Prime Minister and even the President of the United States say that global warming is an issue that we must consider, I cannot understand why, underpinning our education policy, the Government are not giving to the environmental aspects of sustainable development the same commitment as they have given to sport.

If we are planning new areas and new communities, we need to train building construction workers and engineers who will not just build drains as they always have, but will realise that because of water shortages we need pipes that will conserve water. We must look at the whole spectrum of work that needs to be done. Unless we train people, we will end up without the trained, skilled, professional people to deliver our regeneration agenda for building, through sport or anything else. We are dealing with an agenda of change, and time is running out for us to bring about the attitude change that we need so that we can change what we do, and not just meet our targets but take the agenda further.

People need to know what the debate is about. In my work as a member of the Environmental Audit Committee, I always meet a few good vice-chancellors and a few good directors of further education colleges who understand the issue. Some people understand the agenda, but many people have no idea what we are talking about. There is no common "literacy", or understanding of the problem.

My question to the Minister is: what can we do to help his efforts to encourage education about sustainable development? We must not end up with professional architects, designers and people involved in business who have no understanding of the agenda, or they will carry on doing things as they have always done them, because they do not understand that we are in the process of change. Change is often uncomfortable, and means learning new skills.

On that point, I say to the Minister as an aside that, sadly, a planned visit to SkillCity with the Prince of Wales was called off this morning because of the difficulties in London, of which everyone is only too aware. This debate involves the issue of funding the Learning and Skills Council, and the training of construction workers. We need construction workers to be trained in sustainable development. It is no good building to the old designs if houses are leaking energy right, left and centre. Cuts are being made, and we must make sure that if budgets must be changed, it is not sustainable development and environmental concerns that get cut. We must make sure that the priority is to provide what we need for the future.

Another issue is aviation. How will we use the EU presidency to make real progress on that issue? Many business men and women will think, "Why should we go along with the emissions trading scheme when airlines can expand their operations?" We must all sign up to the issue together.

That is why I particularly welcome the Minister's speech at the outset of the debate. The value of this debate might lie in sending his speech, with its list of the things being done, out to leaders and champions at local and regional level throughout the country, rather than just putting it on a website. Can my hon. Friend find a way of doing that? It would be a means of promoting discussion and getting people signed up to what needs to be done.

Finally, like the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings, who speaks for the Opposition, I shall flag up the issue of timber procurement. The Minister may remember that two years or so ago, I asked the Prime Minister why we were refurbishing the Cabinet Office with timber from endangered species. I am pleased to say that the Government have done a huge amount of work since then, and have apologised for doing that. We now have a strategy on timber procurement, and headway has been made on it.

Discussions are going on. I was in the fortunate position of chairing a meeting in the House that was attended by both Greenpeace and the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians. That meeting considered how to promote among construction workers an understanding of the need to use non-endangered species timber in construction. That was a way of taking the issue forward.

However, there are concerns about whether that process has stalled. Will the Minister tell us briefly what discussions he has had with various non-governmental organisations about illegal timber? Why is it not one of the Government's indicators? Many of us believe that it should be a high priority in any serious consideration of sustainable development. The Forest Stewardship Council is currently the only credible certifier of sustainable timber, and it is vital that the central point of expertise on timber does not bow to industry pressure to adopt less stringent schemes.

Members have referred in all sorts of ways to biodiversity and the cost of illegal logging. When the Environmental Audit Committee considered the issue, it found that public construction paid for by the Government and local authorities accounted for a huge proportion of current building. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister has done a great deal of work on this already, but perhaps we need to do some more. If he cannot give me an answer today, perhaps he will give me an assurance after the debate.

Can we wait for the European Union presidency in six or 18 months' time to take up the issue? What are the UK Government doing now to ensure that we are not inadvertently using timber that has not been properly certified? This is a procurement issue, and there must be a way of dealing with it.

I am conscious of the time that I have taken, but I end by noting all the initiatives around the country, such as the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's new sustainable communities agenda, local authority agreements, and all sorts of opportunities to work in partnership with local councils, with business, with regional development agencies and with Government offices.

I note with great interest that my own Government office for the west midlands has produced a guide to environmental sustainability. We have all these glossy documents, which I hope are printed on recycled paper, but what we really need to know is how we can keep tabs on what is being done and how we are rolling it out, so that at the end of the day I can put my hand up in my constituency and say that all the boxes that need to be ticked are ticked, or that we are missing certain targets, but that we are, for example, energy-efficient. I also hope that we will secure European funding for initiatives such as the Burslem masterplan.

We need to see how we can help the Minister to do all that, which is why I am so pleased that we are having this debate in Westminster Hall while the Gleneagles summit is taking place.

4.27 pm

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): I am pleased that we are having this debate today. The timing is hugely appropriate, not least because of the coincidence of the Gleneagles debate on climate change.

In my eight years as a Member of this House, it is indisputable that the United Kingdom has made more progress towards becoming a genuinely sustainable society than at any point in the previous eight, 18 or 80 years. We have made huge progress, and my hon. Friend the Minister, his predecessor, the Secretary of State, and now the Prime Minister deserve enormous credit for that.

Given the discussions on climate change at Gleneagles today, the wider issues of sustainable development have never had such a high profile in the media or the public consciousness. I welcome the publication of the Government's new sustainable development strategy, but I shall quote briefly from the Environmental Audit Committee's report on it, which was published last October. The concluding paragraph says:

> "We realise that these are difficult issues for politicians across the world because it is always easier to trade-off short term economic and social gains against long-term environmental goals."

Without giving any credibility to the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), I suspect that that is what underlies his concerns about the correspondence that he quoted.

[Mr. David Chaytor]

The report continues:

"It is therefore essential to build a consensus across political parties on the priority and approach required to address environmental issues, while at the same time promoting a far greater and more profound understanding among the public of the global consequences of our current lifestyles."

I shall say a little about the difficulty in building consensus and promoting a greater and more profound understanding among the public. It is self-evident that the overwhelming majority of Members have decided that these issues are so difficult that they cannot conceivably grapple with them on a Thursday afternoon in Westminster Hall. The level of attendance today speaks for itself. It is unfortunate that we are competing with a debate on defence in the main Chamber, but perhaps that competition is significant and says something about the Government's priorities.

In that respect, I want to raise an issue that has been debated on several occasions, although I do not apologise for raising it again. As a matter of course during the year, the Government have a fixed number of debates in their own time on issues such as defence, agriculture and Wales, and the time has surely come for them to have an annual debate on sustainable development. I do not expect that to happen in the very near future, but when the Government publish their reviewed climate change strategy later this year, clearly there will be an opportunity to have that important debate, and preferably on a day when there is a three-line Whip on something else to maximise attendance. I make that point to demonstrate the difficulty that many politicians have in dealing with this issue.

On consensus, there was much with which I could agree in the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley), as well as in those of the Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), and of the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown). Regardless of the little spat between the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings and myself over his desire to preserve clapped out, single-skin, brick-built, roofless houses in Salford's back streets—I am just questioning his romantic view of those matters—the rest of his speech was an admirable critique of many of the issues with which we are concerned. I certainly agree with many of the criticisms made by the hon. Member for Lewes.

How do we reconcile the fact that I am saying that the Government have done more on this issue than any previous Government with the fact that I agree with the criticisms from both the Opposition parties? We reconcile them by saying that these are impossibly complex issues, which no one party can resolve alone in the time scale of one or even two Parliaments. That reinforces the point that there must be collective, cross-party agreement not only on certain basic principles, but on certain basic policies. Although I agree with much of what the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings said, it is significant that the main Opposition party has almost routinely opposed every policy that has advanced the cause of the sustainable development that has taken place in the past eight years. That cannot continue and we must have a different way of operating, with agreement not only on basic principles, but on basic policies.

The matter came up in last week's debate on climate change in the main Chamber, which was, I think, in the name of the Liberal Democrats. The shadow Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), argued that we had perhaps reached the point at which we needed a mechanism to take certain issues outside the parliamentary forum. Soon after the 1997 election, the Government gave the Bank of England responsibility for the key economic policy decision, and we perhaps need a similar external, independent process to establish the basic principles and policies that will underpin the development of our environmental policy.

Norman Baker: I just want to raise an important point about consensus, because we need to move forward on the issue. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that although there is a need for consensus, there is not necessarily a need to involve outside bodies? We all signed up to the concept of the UN, for example, and that is now taken as read without the need for an outside body to audit that for us. My party—I do not say this for narrow party reasons, in any shape or form—has written to the leaders of the other parties on this issue, pledging agreement on the science, targets and possibly the policies. We have not had a positive response to that offer, but it remains open. I am renewing it this afternoon and I shall shortly be renewing it in letters to the right hon. Member for West Dorset and the Secretary of State. We must approach the issue sensibly and move forward on a common basis. If we do not, my serious concern is that we shall not get agreement on difficult issues such as aviation.

Mr. Chaytor: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, and I shall encourage my right hon. and hon. Friends to respond positively to that offer, without, obviously, falling into any political traps that may be laid. My general point, however, is that debate in the traditional parliamentary forum—not so much this Chamber, but the main Chamber—is not the best way to build the consensus that we appear to agree is necessary.

In terms of developing a greater and more profound understanding among the public, may I move on to the timing of this debate? It has taken place, purely accidentally, the day after London was awarded the Olympic games for 2012. That is an enormous cause for national celebration and a great opportunity, and is relevant to this debate.

The Minister, in his opening remarks, commented on the important aspects of sustainability in the British bid. However, I believe that there is further to go in that area. The Olympic games will be a momentous event and will reach many millions of British citizens who have no interest in environmental or energy policy, and for whom climate change barely scratches the surface of their consciousness. We are talking about many young people and people who are fascinated by sport. We will attract to the United Kingdom in 2012 the largest concentration of some of the healthiest people in the world. We will embark on a major programme of construction, with major implications for the transport and housing of those vast numbers of athletes, supporters and tourists, and all the media circus that surround the games. It therefore seems to me that there is a huge opportunity for the Government to take a great step forward in raising understanding of sustainable development issues among the British population as a whole.

Joan Walley: I want to ask my hon. Friend a question that relates to what he suggests and links in with the final part of the Minister's opening speech. A statement was made during business questions earlier today about the possibility of the House examining a different way of working—in a cross-party, cross-policy way—with the aim of involving hon. Members on both sides in the planning for the Olympic games. In terms of the current proposals that are under active consideration, does my hon. Friend agree that we should ask the Minister to take back from this debate a request to the Leader of the House that we underpin the Olympics with sustainable development?

Mr. Chaytor: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I was struck by the suggestion at business questions today that there should be a Joint Committee to scrutinise the progress of the preparations for the games. In fact, my hon. Friend has given me another thought, almost as I speak, that perhaps we need a similar mechanism to build consensus on climate change. Although climate change is considered and scrutinised effectively by many individual Select Committees of both Houses, perhaps there is an argument for setting up a Joint Committee of both Houses specifically to monitor the implementation of the Government's policy on climate change. Perhaps we can return to that matter later.

I believe that there is an opportunity—perhaps it is a greater opportunity than has previously been thought—for the United Kingdom not only to host the Olympic games in 2012, but to host the first green Olympics. The impact of that on international opinion and in raising the awareness of climate change, energy, sustainable building, healthy lifestyles and the quality of food among our own population, and particularly among young people, could be enormous. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can take that matter back and have some further discussion on those matters with the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport.

Having made the point about the potential of the Olympics, may I also say that that links in with Government procurement? Although the Government will not be procuring everything for the Olympic games, they can set the standards. I refer, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North, to the Environmental Audit Committee's report on procurement, published some weeks ago, to which I do not think that the Government have yet given their response. Although it is outside the time period in which responses should be given, there is currently no Environmental Audit Committee in existence, so perhaps that is the Government's excuse for not having given their response. However, we look forward to that response.

The feeling of most members of the Committee was that those responsible for Government procurement had not necessarily fully taken on board the implications of sustainable development policies. There is a huge way to go to set the highest environmental standards and to raise the understanding of those people who do the job on a day-to-day basis—ordering the biros and the boilers. There are trade-offs in environmental standards and costings, and we are not disputing that. Clearly, however, there are issues about life cycle costings and we were not confident that all aspects of Government had fully taken on board the life cycle savings to be made by purchasing more environmentally friendly products.

I want to make one specific reference. I was struck by the comment made by the hon. Member for Lewes about stand-by power. That was picked up in the climate change debate last week by a Conservative Member, the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd), and was stimulated by the important campaign launched by The Independent some weeks ago. I want to reinforce my support for the urgency of the Government taking that question on board.

The eco-design directive is starting its long process, but it will be a long time before its implementation is taken fully on board by all member states. Over the past few months, I have been involved with a small international group that is trying to promote the idea of all Governments having a maximum stand-by power limit of 1 W for all electrical equipment. It happens in some parts of the world already and is not too difficult. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, the establishment of energy efficiency labelling on white goods has had a dramatic effect on the market, has driven up environmental standards remarkably and has changed consumer behaviour. We are not yet at that point with electrical equipment—I am not sure whether they are called black goods, brown goods or grey goods—such as DVD players, televisions or computers. We do not have the same energy efficiency labelling. We need that and we certainly need a maximum wattage for stand-by power.

I made my point about the Olympics and the potential for an enormous marketing exercise with Britain as the host of the first green Olympics, as well as the enormous potential for improving standards in Government procurement on the back of that. However, let me go back to the timing. This debate not only competes with the debate on defence but follows the appalling events that took place this morning.

I want now to move on to another issue and to relate environmental sustainability and climate change to global security. That is not of immediate concern to most people; they do not make that connection. However, more and more, we need to talk about climate change in the context of global and national security. This afternoon, I was torn as to which debate to speak in—I thought of going to the defence debate and talking about climate change, which would probably have been the first occasion on which anyone had done so. I decided in preference to come here and talk about security. The appalling growth in terrorism cannot be defeated by military means and will be defeated only by the creation of a more just and sustainable world, in which the world's natural resources are more equitably shared.

We cannot ignore—I leave aside terrorism—international migration and the appalling consequences of climate change: the increasing desertification that is moving many millions of people from their traditional homes and the impact of flooding and storms in certain parts of the world. We cannot ignore the fact that there is a link between climate change and patterns of international migration, and all the uncertainties and difficulties that that brings.

The debate about climate change has traditionally flagged up the need for sacrifice, which is why we are not making enough progress with the general public. The resistance to the radical policy changes that are needed will be led by people who say that they cannot be expected to reduce their standard of living to respond to climate change that might not affect them for 50 years. When we talk about using fiscal measures to reduce our emissions for example, the debate is always about individual sacrifice and penalising people.

We must get away from that and shift the terms of the debate, not to one in which one section of the population is penalised for a benefit that we might not experience for 30, 40 or 50 years, but to a debate in which we accept that climate change is an external threat to us all and that we can deal with it only through collective action. In many respects, it is equally, if not more, appropriate that climate change is debated in the context of national defence. We have to protect ourselves as a nation against its severest effects, whether that is rising sea levels, growing storms here or desertification in other countries, or the social conflict, civil war and international terrorism that result from that.

I am sorry if I am making slow progress, Mr. Hancock. I understood your earlier admonishment about an intervention that was too long, although it struck me that, as there is no rule about the length of interventions, our guiding principle should be that the length of intervention is inversely proportionate to the number of people in the Room and the pressure on time.

I do not want to delay us too much, but I want to speak about environmental taxation. I suppose the problem is that, although the Minister for Climate Change and the Environment is responding to the debate and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs takes the lead on sustainable development, we know that the key levers of power on the issue lie elsewhere: in the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry, because of the latter's control of energy policy. I raise the question of environmental taxation, even though my hon. Friend the Minister has no responsibility for it.

After 1997, the Government got off to a good start by publishing their statement of intent on environmental taxation. There was great support for what the Treasury was trying to do, and in the past two Parliaments we have introduced a number of environmental taxes that have had positive effects. Most have been introduced with a degree of consensus and public understanding. In November 2002, the Treasury made further progress by publishing "Tax and the environment: using economic instruments". However, since then, despite that excellent document with its clear analysis and specific proposals, I sense that we have taken our foot off the accelerator in shifting the burden of taxation from bads to goods and from labour to environmental damage and pollution.

I know that the issues are hugely difficult. Ever since the fuel dispute of September 2000, any Government would be nervous about pushing the limits of environmental taxation beyond what we know can be sustained by public opinion. However, as I have argued several times—I may be the only Member who stands up to say this—fuel duty should be increased because it is a key form of environmental taxation.

We know about the difficulty that we have in transport policy because we are a major contributor to CO_2 emissions. We have a temporary difficulty in that our emissions have risen slightly, but as the Secretary of State said at DEFRA questions this morning, we are on track to meet our Kyoto targets. However, if we are to do something about the huge increase in mobility on the back of the enormous prosperity that our Government have engendered; the increase in emissions from transport, particularly private vehicles; the huge increase in the number of miles that people are travelling; and the cheapness with which people can now buy private cars—if they buy them they do not want them to sit at home in the garage—we have to confront the cost of travelling and the cost of private transport.

I am not saying that we should crash ahead regardless and risk another national dispute with truck drivers, farmers and all the other hangers on from the British National party and the Countryside Alliance because I know that there are aspects of fuel duty and other forms of environmental taxes that are regressive. The Government have to confront the issue; they cannot for ever run away from it.

This week, the Treasury announced that it will now not go ahead with the annual uprating of fuel duty in October because of the global rise in oil prices, but there must be an alternative solution. One solution would be to make it explicit that there was going to be a revenue-neutral policy where fuel duty was to be offset, perhaps by reductions in income tax. We did that perfectly successfully with the climate change levy, which was explicitly a revenue-neutral policy that was offset by reductions in national insurance. It has worked effectively—people have grumbled about it in some ways—and we have a consensus. I now float the idea that perhaps we have to think far more creatively about transport taxation and have trade-offs between the level of income tax and a higher level of fuel duty.

Norman Baker: I am instinctively sympathetic about that, as the hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to hear. Perhaps all of us failed to make the environmental case at the time of the fuel protests—in particular, the Government. After all, the cost of motoring has gone down over the years while the cost of public transport use has increased horrifically.

However, is it not the case that fuel is most expensive in areas where public transport is worst, such as in the highlands of Scotland where there is really no alternative to the private car? The cheapest place to buy petrol is the middle of London. Is road-user charging not a better solution in the medium-term? We can do that as soon as possible, and it is a far more malleable policy in the sense that it can be fixed to achieve the environmental ends we want while not penalising those who have no alternative.

Mr. Chaytor: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point completely and in the long-term, what he describes will probably be the case. However, the likelihood of having road-user charging on the A927 in Ross and Cromarty in the near future is probably remote. We have to accept that in the short term, fuel duty is a proxy for road-user charging. Arguably, fuel duty is the simplest form of road pricing.

Mr. Hayes: In a more typical fashion, as the shadow Transport Minister, I would like to say that the real point about pricing is that we must distinguish essential car use from voluntary car use and recreational car use. Until that can be done in a persuasive, coherent and—dare I say—sustainable way, pricing is a very thorny subject.

Mr. Chaytor: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. I am not sure, however, that we can easily distinguish between the different sorts of vehicle use. That is the problem.

I shall give an example to illustrate the mountain that we have to climb. The recent impact of the slight—by our standards—rise in the cost of gasoline in the United States has had a noticeable effect on the purchase of sports utility vehicles there—those great gas guzzlers that are far more suited to the centre of Baghdad than to suburbs in small-town America. The American public is now putting two and two together and realising that the appalling trend of the Detroit car industry producing more of those vehicles is unsustainable. In Britain, precisely the opposite is happening. In the suburbs of my constituency, there are more and more British forms of SUV coming on to the roads. That is because of the rising level of prosperity that I am proud to say my Government have achieved over the past eight years, but also because those vehicles are so cheap to buy and run for those in that income bracket. If we do not confront this issue, we will never ultimately contain our CO_2 emissions and meet our Kyoto targets.

Norman Baker: Another short-term mechanism, prior to road-user charging, would be to vary much more significantly the bands for road tax. It is perfectly possible—indeed, it is desirable—to have a huge increase in road tax for the sort of machines that the hon. Gentleman rightly castigates for urban use, at the same time as a significant drop in the cost for cleaner cars.

Mr. Chaytor: I agree completely. I have put that point to Treasury Ministers when they have appeared before the Environmental Audit Committee. The advantage of greater variability in the vehicle excise duty banding is that it would be popular, because the vast majority of the population do not drive gas-guzzlers or large BMW SUVs. In my experience, the average motorist is increasingly resentful of the impact—in terms of congestion, pollution and occupation of road space—of these enormous vehicles. Having a progressive, redistributive vehicle excise duty system would be a political winner for the Government. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take note of that and have further discussions with his colleagues in the Treasury.

I will move on to two further points. The first concerns definition. I recollect that in the 1999 strategy for sustainable development there was an acceptance—if not explicitly, certainly implicitly—that the classic definition of sustainable development by Gro Harlem Brundtland, the former Norwegian Prime Minister, was the one that the Government would accept. As time moved on, we developed our own definition—the three-legged definition—under which sustainable development was partly environmental, partly social and partly economic. I am interested that in the new strategy we now have five criteria by which Government performance will be judged, including not just social, economic and environmental issues, but the issues of good governance and the importance of sound science.

All of those five criteria are important to build a better society, but I am not sure whether they, as a whole, are going to help us to an environmentally more sustainable society. That is for the simple reason that, as environmental sustainability is only one of the five criteria, it is likely that it will be brushed aside by the constant desire of any Government to focus on improvements in standards of living and the economy.

I will digress for a moment to give a small example of how that works in practice in legislation that is currently passing through Parliament. In the Standing Committee on the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill just two weeks ago, an interesting set of amendments was tabled on the responsibility of public authorities in relation to biodiversity. I accept that biodiversity is not totally equivalent to sustainable development, but the point will become clear as I describe it.

Clause 40 of the Bill requires every public authority, in exercising its functions, to "have regard . . . to the purpose of conserving biodiversity."

Of course, it is easy to have regard to something without doing anything about it. It is easy to have regard to it and then ignore it completely and go in the opposite direction. There was an amendment to delete the term "have regard" and introduce the word "further". Giving public authorities a duty to further the conservation of biodiversity would be a far more powerful tool than that which we have in the Bill.

I raise that point as a message to my hon. Friend the Minister. Although the amendment was not carried in Committee, it may well return on Report, when there may be further discussion about it. It seems a striking example of how individual pieces of legislation can allow the cause of sustainability to be sidelined if the environmental aspect of sustainability is only one of three, four, five or any number of criteria.

The consequences of globalisation are another long-term issue with which I hope the Government shall grapple. The issue has been touched on by other hon. Members, and no one can dispute that globalisation exists. It is foolish to shut our minds to it, pretend that it will not happen and that it will go away. It provides the most wonderful opportunities for human advancement that we have ever seen. However, there are tensions in terms of our national policies, the sustainability of our economy and our society, and our capacity to sustain a healthy planet.

I shall highlight a contradiction in two fashionable lines of thought. First, in the context of agricultural policy, and the reform of the common agricultural policy, the Government have been hugely successful in linking CAP reform to progress in Africa. I was going to say hugely successful in outmanoeuvring the French, but I do not think that that is true, and I am not in favour of such petty, nationalist rhetoric. Progress in Africa has taken place, not just by distributing dollops of aid from the west, but by building up Africa's economic capacity and ability to trade.

We are all now in favour of abolishing the CAP and of stopping the $2 per cow subsidy to French farmers. However, we must ask ourselves whether it is sustainable in the long term to source our tomatoes and peppers from Cameroon, as against southern France and southern Spain. In getting rid of one kind of distortion in the market, which is the subsidy to European farmers, are we not in danger of creating another completely dysfunctional market, in which more and more frequently, the food going to the richer nations of north America and western Europe travels many thousands of miles before it gets there? That is the dilemma.

While we are arguing about the importance of freeing up African farmers to sell their goods to the west, we are saying that local food production is important, and that we are all in favour of farmers markets in our constituencies. In my constituency of Bury, North, where there is an excellent monthly farmers market in the small town of Ramsbottom, I know that there are not many local farmers who will be producing mangetout. It will have to be imported if there is a demand for it in the north of England. We must resolve that contradiction. We cannot simultaneously call for and build policies to support more local food production in our communities and our country, while arguing for a globalised system of food production in which food travels many thousands of miles.

Mr. Hayes: The hon. Gentleman makes a most interesting point. If we are to shorten the food production chain, we shall have to face those difficult questions. I wonder if he will consider another distortion with which he may not be so familiar. In the European Union, there is a debate about reform of the sugar regime. The sugar regime protects the price of sugar through a special arrangement with Afro-Caribbean countries which secures their markets. All Tate & Lyle's sugar is cane sugar that is provided by those means. The reform of that regime will be not only injurious to British sugar beet producers, but deeply harmful to those countries highly dependent on the production of cane sugar. It will benefit the sophisticated and wealthy sugar producers in Brazil and Australia—countries that receive high levels of investment from the United States.

Mr. Chaytor: The hon. Gentleman highlights the complexity of these issues. The issue of globalised energy production is related to the issue of globalised food production. Sugar, of all crops, has the capacity to be a powerful supply of biofuels. One great irony of our global trading system is that in Brazil, a significant amount of bioethanol is produced from sugar, but it cannot be sold cost-effectively to the European Union. I understand that a scientific block on the huge expansion of production of fuel from crops is now in the process of being dissolved. Traditionally only part of the crop could be used for fuel and the rest was thrown away, but I understand that new scientific breakthroughs will allow the whole of the crop to be used because the sugars in the whole of the plant can now be broken down. We are on the verge of a great scientific breakthrough in the production of biofuels, and our international trading system has to allow for growth in those markets in order to reduce global carbon emissions.

We are moving towards the end of the debate. I would like to endorse many of the things that other hon. Members have proposed, but that would be tedious and repetitive. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will comment about the first green Olympics. I hope that he will comment on the feasibility of an annual debate in Government time on sustainable development. I hope that he will bear in mind what has been said about the amendment to the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill on the importance of public authorities seeking to further biodiversity and not merely to have regard to it.

5.6 pm

Mr. Morley: This has been a good debate. I appreciate the contributions that were made by the hon. Members for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) and for Lewes (Norman Baker) and by my hon. Friends the Members for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Joan Walley) and for Bury, North (Mr. Chaytor). It is a shame that, because of today's circumstances, more Members were not present.

I said in previous debates that the Government would try to find an opportunity to discuss sustainability and climate change in the context of Gleneagles. Today's debate provides that opportunity. I certainly take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North that, by tradition, if not by right, annual debates are part of the business programme of the House. I do not think it unreasonable to suggest that sustainability should be the subject of such a debate. It is a matter for business managers, but I shall certainly ensure that my hon. Friend's views are known.

I shall try to answer some of the points raised in the debate before dealing with sustainability. The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings said, perhaps not unreasonably, that, if the Government bring forward strategies on sustainable development, there must be some measure of delivery. I do not disagree.

The latest strategy, "Securing the Future" is incredibly detailed. It deals with a number of points, including some mentioned by the hon. Member for Lewes. In terms of measurement of delivery, we have the indicators. He did not mention that each Department has public service agreement targets and that we increasingly share such targets. On the point that he made on air quality and CO_2 from transport, we have a shared PSA target with the Department for Transport. That means that both Departments are obliged to make progress on those targets, which is welcome. Co-operation between the Departments is good, and I shall say more about that in a moment.

The development of the sustainable communities plan is a genuine attempt to address the need for more homes, particularly in the south and south-east, where demand is focused: that is where the population is, where the jobs are and where economic growth is to be found. It is not the only place. There is demand for jobs and homes in other parts of the country, including the Corby growth area.

We heard of the demolition of homes that cannot be sold or let. The argument was presented in a rather rose-tinted way—that they are nice, Victorian terraces. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North that they are not always nice; they are sometimes pretty nasty Victorian terraces.

The hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings would be mistaken to think that it is only about Victorian terraces. Many homes that cannot be let or sold are 1960s concrete, prefabricated developments. I do not know whether he has been to some of the areas where there is a problem with hard-to-let and hard-to-sell houses. I certainly have. They include the no-fines houses that were popular in the 1960s but are now riddled with damp, black mould and all sorts of problems. A range of constructional techniques were used, including in my constituency. In some homes, the walls are crumbling away and the tie bars are corroding. There are all sorts of difficulties with life-expired homes and not all of them are Victorian, some of which tended to be better built.

When such homes can be refurbished, they are. In Frodingham village in my constituency, terraced homes that were built for steelworkers did not have bathrooms but they have been refurbished, had extensions built and bedrooms turned into bathrooms. It is a very nice environmental development and popular, although the refurbishment has provided for two bedrooms. Homes with two bedrooms are not altogether popular with families, as those of us who meet at our advice surgeries people who are looking for homes know well. Such homes have a role to play, but they are not the answer in all circumstances. Sometimes, the cost of refurbishment is far higher than the cost of new build. Some of the problems are to do not with the houses, but with the design, the area and the nature of the community, which can be remodelled when there is demolition.

It surprises me, but I hear now and again that some people living in such homes do not want to move and to see their homes demolished. When I was a city councillor in Hull in 1979, we still had a slum clearance programme in my ward. Those homes had no proper facilities and were in very poor condition, yet people did not want to leave them. There is a lesson there for all of us. It is about communities. Little thought was given to the nature of communities when large-scale redevelopment took place in the 1960s and 1970s. We need to learn those lessons and I believe that we have.

The Government have a target of building on 60 per cent. brownfield sites. We are exceeding that target and it is likely that we will continue to do so, particularly with growth areas such as the Thames gate way, which is Europe's biggest brownfield site. I appreciate that there are issues of definition of brownfield sites and we can look at those.

There has been some loss of green belt areas, but there has been a net gain of such areas under this Government. That should be borne in mind. Green space is an important part of sustainable communities. My colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister recently announced a policy on the use of green space in growth areas as part of sustainable communities. Using green space for leisure, recreation, sustainability and urban drainage is important.

The role of the Sustainable Development Commission, an independent body chaired by Jonathon Porritt, has been strengthened. It will now report directly to the Prime Minister on the monitoring of progress. We also have the Environmental Audit Committee, as my hon. Friends stated.

Mr. Hayes: Just to scotch the Minister's myth about green belt expansion, it is not that the total area of green belt has not expanded since 1997—clearly, it has—but how and where it has expanded. The green belt should be just that: a belt of land around areas where development pressure is greatest. The green belt is expanding into open countryside while towns and cities are being allowed to sprawl into the inner green belt. That is a distortion of the purpose of green belts.

It is true that the targets for brownfield land have been exceeded, but there are two points about that. The target may be too low, and it has in part been exceeded because of the definition of brownfield land, with buildings being crammed into back gardens.

Mr. Morley: That is not the case. The definition of brownfield sites has not changed and the hon. Gentleman's description of how the green belt has expanded is simplistic. Additional areas of green belt have often been included as part of the sustainable growth of communities, both in relation to having a buffer zone and to have some green space in communities. That is important.

The strategy has not led to building in people's back gardens. As I represent a rural area, I accept that that would be a problem. Some people who have big gardens in nice villages are keen to get a house in them. Our policy is not new and is controlled by structure and district plans made by the local authority. My local, Conservative-controlled council is keen on that kind of policy and has overridden the district plan put in place by the Labour authority. The situation is not simple.

I accept the hon. Gentleman's point about mixed communities. They are important. Such housing provision can be achieved. There is also the issue of prediction. I accept that we should be a bit cautious about predict and provide but, when setting housing strategies, it is important that local authorities and county councils have some idea of what demands there will be for housing in the region. That affects councils' long-term planning for schools, doctors' surgeries and transport. There must be some idea of a figure. We cannot expect those facilities to be expanded in an ad hoc fashion. There must be some planning.

I take the hon. Gentleman's point about packaging. It is an issue. The packaging directive has been helpful. Hon. Members should be aware that, for the first time since we have had records on waste, the overall waste stream in this country has declined. I welcome that. Recycling has shot up, from 6 per cent. in 1997 to 18 per cent. in 2004. I believe that we can meet our target of 25 per cent. at the end of 2005–06.

There has been a huge change on the issue. I accept that we have come from a low base compared to other European countries, but we are moving on. I am glad to see those changes. I hope to make an announcement on packaging in relation to retailers in the not-too-distant future. It may be significant. I say to the hon. Gentleman: watch this space.

I understand the points that the hon. Members for South Holland and The Deepings and for Lewes, and my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North made on timber policy. We in this country can be proud of what we have done on timber policy. As I mentioned, we have a procurement policy on sustainable and legal timber. The timber industry has been an enthusiastic supporter of that policy and there have been big changes among the retailers.

To give one example, DEFRA is undergoing extensive modernisation. It is moving to open-plan offices with an atrium. All the timber being used is certified. It happens to be certified by the Forestry Stewardship Council, although there are five schemes that have been recognised by the Central Point of Expertise on Timber. The DEFRA project has involved such a volume of timber that the joinery company doing the work has achieved Forestry Stewardship Council certification. It is the first joinery company to be certified by the FSC. It would not have been able to do that were it not for the volume of timber and the work that we are providing through Government procurement strategies. That project is a tremendous success.

I understand that the point that is being made is that the FSC scheme is not the only certified scheme. To be truthful, at the moment, the FSC could not cover the volume of timber that is being used in this country. The pan-European certification scheme covers many of the softwoods, in particular the Baltic and the Scandinavian ones.

I understand that non-governmental organisations are concerned that, although there is no question about the pan-European scheme meeting the standard on legality, it does not quite meet our criteria on sustainability. That is true. That is why, in the assessment by the Central Point of Expertise on Timber, the scheme did not get the top rating. Since that assessment, the pan-European scheme has talked to CPET and offered to change its criteria. That is remarkable. What the Government are doing might change the criteria of a global certification scheme. Of course, that must be judged against the standards that we have set. ProForest, an independent body, is doing that. We discuss the matter with NGOs regularly, and I have asked that CPET should consult the NGOs to talk about such changes. Is it bad that a scheme with some weaknesses, which is generally recognised to be pretty good, but not ideal, is prepared to address those weaknesses? Should not we encourage that? We will have to see what comes out of the discussions.

Joan Walley: In light of those comments, will the Minister provide me with more detail of where the standards are being met, and where the improvements that he says have been volunteered have been brought in, so that we can measure how fit for purpose the new arrangements are compared to the previous one?

Mr. Morley: That is perfectly reasonable. That work is under way. I note my hon. Friend's question and will make sure that she gets some information on that.

The hon. Member for Lewes said that he offered a consensus in a letter to the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. That is okay, as far as it goes, but he knows as well as I that the Government could not sign up to some aspects of that letter. Indeed, even the Opposition could not sign up to some of them. There is an argument for a consensus. I take his point and accept that he is sincere. There may be some areas of our approach that we can examine. There are challenges for all parties if we are serious about moving forward on sustainability and climate change.

I know that the hon. Gentleman loves leaked letters and enjoys quoting from them, but I must say to him that there are, of course, debates within Government. They would be a poor Government who did not debate various issues. If I were in his place, I would take some comfort in the fact that DEFRA is standing up for the issue of sustainability in that debate. In the end, it is the agreed strategy that matters and he will not find much in it with which he disagrees. The Government, not DEFRA, have signed up to that strategy, which was launched by the Prime Minister, and is supported by the Secretaries of State for Education and Skills and for Trade and Industry, and by DEFRA Ministers. It is a cross-Government approach.

I accept the hon. Gentleman's point about railway lines. It is always easy to close railway lines and hard to reopen them. One line that has reopened, I believe, is the Robin Hood line in Nottinghamshire. One reason for that line's popularity is the National forest. That is a good example of a sustainable strategy that gives an economic benefit, on which I am keen.

I accept what the hon. Gentleman said about aviation. There may be a delay in the trading scheme, but carbon trade is the most effective way in which to deal with aviation. I do not object if a company that wants to expand buys credits, because they come from somewhere else. It does not really matter where the reduction is, because the issue is a global one. That is one of the advantages of the tradability of carbon. I am keen on that scheme.

There are other solutions to consider, such as a NOx tax—a tax on oxides of nitrogen. BAA already has a price on landing slots linked with noise and NOx. That is effective because it encourages airlines to have newer, quieter, more fuel-efficient planes to get lower prices for landing slots. That is a successful market mechanism, although I accept that there is debate to be had on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North talked about the urgent need to take action and to move on, which I fully support, and the need for a joined-up approach, in relation to which I refer her to the EAC report on sustainability, which we have addressed in some depth.

My hon. Friend made a good point about education and sustainable development. If we are to take a new approach, we need people with design, engineering, manufacturing and building skills to support it. The Government's sustainable procurement strategy is an opportunity to encourage such skills. If a company is trying to develop a market for a greener approach to design, building or production, for example, it is worth while for it to invest in the skills base. The Government also provide support for skills. I welcomed her comments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North mentioned the profile of sustainable development. It certainly has been raised as part of the G8 process and our EU presidency. That has been useful, and I welcome it. He spoke about the Olympic games and the idea of a cross-party approach—again, I like that idea. The Olympic bid included a low-carbon approach; reducing energy demands and meeting them from zero/low carbon and renewable sources; showcasing new designs and sustainable building and design; aiming for zero waste by avoiding landfill in both construction and operation; and conserving biodiversity and improving the quality of urban green space. I am keen on the way that green space has been incorporated in the Olympic bid, and how sustainable urban drainage has been utilised—it is a good example. The bid also covered sustainable transport and the sustainable legacy that I mentioned. Those are all important issues.

WWF-UK and BioRegional were involved in the design of the London 2012 bid. BioRegional is a local charity that promotes sustainable development. I liked the idea of a target of 1 W for the stand-by power limit. We must consider such issues.

My hon. Friend might be interested to know that efficiency standards are on the G8 agenda. I hope that something comes out of that. He mentioned the touchy issue of fuel duty. I had something to say about that during the debate on fuel. I cannot say that my comments were particularly welcome in certain quarters. I say to the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings that it is easy to jump on a bandwagon instead of taking an unpopular position on fuel duty. The mark of responsible Governments and Oppositions is that sometimes they do the right thing, even if it is unpopular. Fuel prices have risen significantly because of world prices, and they are unlikely to come down in the near future. As such, there is no need to put the price up with duty, but there is an argument for differential vehicle excise rates, and, to a certain extent, they have been introduced. Changes have also been made to company car taxation. A revenue-neutral approach is important.

There has been discussion about definitions. The strategy document, "Securing the Future", gives a definition of sustainability that is based on the international definition:

"to enable all people throughout the world to satisfy their basic needs and enjoy a better quality of life without compromising the quality of life of future generations."

Page 16 gives more detail about how sustainability is defined, including guiding principles, and clearly outlines the elements of sustainability and a sustainable strategy. My hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North will find on page 34 a progress report on incentives and green taxation, which is quite comprehensive. He might like to look at that.

"Securing the Future" is an important document. It is a Government document that brings all the Departments together to deliver the overall strategy. I very much welcome this debate. I welcome too the fact that the Government take the issue seriously, and constantly seek to strengthen and to refine our approach and to make it more integrated and effective. That process will continue.

Question put and agreed to.

[MR. BILL OLNER in the Chair]

EU Sugar Regime

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Heppell.]

9.30 am

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): It is a pleasure, Mr. Olner, to be under your gimlet eye. I am pleased also that the Minister of State will be replying to the debate. For many of us—I say this in the most positive way—discussing United Kingdom farming and the European Union sugar regime has something of "Groundhog Day", but I am pleased that he is here; it shows that his Department takes the debate seriously.

I am grateful for the opportunity to debate the subject. Sugar beet is obviously important to farmers and to the food industry in my constituency of Mid-Norfolk. Several thousand jobs in Norfolk depend directly on farming and food processing. British Sugar has a beet factory at Cantley in my constituency, and many other people, including road hauliers, depend on that business. Sugar is important to my constituents in a wider sense, not only as consumers but as people with concerns about the environment and the developing world, which has been the subject of a nationwide debate over the past few weeks.

The timing of the debate is apposite, given that the UK took over the EU presidency on 1 July. The EU Commission proposals for reform of the EU sugar regime were published on 22 June. The timetable for consideration of those proposals was set by the UK. Consultation will take place during the summer and autumn, with the Council of Agricultural Ministers on 21 and 22 November taking a decision on the EU's position for the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in Hong Kong that will take place between 13 and 18 December. I regard today's debate as part of the consultation process.

One of the purposes of the debate is to outline some of the concerns about the EU proposals that have been expressed by UK farmers—particularly those in my constituency—and to press the Minister on what he believes will be the main issues that will determine UK policy. I hope a little later to put some specific questions.

Reform of the UK sugar regime will go far beyond the narrow position of UK farmers. It will have a direct impact on the wider UK food industry, which does not necessarily speak with one voice on the subject. Indeed, I note that in recent oral questions to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, some hon. Members have taken a different position on sugar processing and free markets. Reform will not only affect consumers but will have a major impact on sugar producers in the Caribbean; some of them rely on sugar as a staple product, and it is their main earning power for overseas currency. It will also have an impact on access to EU markets by many developing countries. Reform goes beyond narrow UK farming interests.

Over the past few years, farmers have been pillorised as fat cats by the UK media because of the EU subsidies that they receive, particularly those for sugar beet. That is unfair. Many British farmers would not be able to continue without such subsidies. It is unfair to think of them as selfish fat cats. There may be some like that, but the overwhelming majority of farmers in my constituency do not see themselves like that; they believe that they have been unfairly caricatured. They believe that they are putting something back into the community by caring for the land and the environment. They are also conscious that in the past—this could apply in the future, too—they were concerned about security of food supply in a changing and, at times, threatening world.

Consumers in the UK are ambivalent about farming and food. They want UK farming to be compassionate, environmentally friendly and free of subsidies and additives. At the same time, they want the cheapest possible food. They want food that has not been grown or bred abroad under inhumane or environmentally poor conditions; they want food that has not been transported thousands of miles and they want food that is not frozen rather than fresh. We have to square that circle. I do not knock UK consumers; we might find that attitude in our own families.

However, there is a downside to all the plus positive things that we want for our food. One of those is that the very market forces that we wish to open up will close down some of the most efficient, environmentally conscious, humane farming in the world, here in the UK. While I do not wish to exaggerate the problem, it is a sad fact, as the Minister knows only too well from previous debates, that some of the food that we consume in the United Kingdom—perhaps labelled with a Union jack—does not come from the United Kingdom but was produced under inhumane and environmentally horrendous conditions. We should be conscious of that in this debate.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman knows the difficulties that remain to be debated. Given what he has just said, is it not important to try to get a political agreement on the sugar regime during the British presidency while we have more opportunity to influence change?

Is it not important to push out the more inefficient producers in Europe—those in places such as Greece and Finland? Thirdly, in any decoupling mechanism, is it not right that the compensation arrangements that must surely follow are the same across Europe, so that there can be no unfair competition?

Mr. Simpson: I was very happy to take that intervention from the hon. Gentleman, who knows the subject well—several years ago, we served together on the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee. In fact, I am beginning to think that there is some sort of spy camera in my office, because he seems to have read parts of my speech that I thought were known only to me—it seems that Labour Whips have become more efficient over the years. He is absolutely right that the presidency represents an opportunity for the United Kingdom. It has to show Überparteilichkeit—that is my one bit of German for the day—to be above party politics. At the same time, farmers and consumers are looking to the UK to take a position. He is right that whatever happens must happen across Europe. Why should some of the most efficient, environmentally conscious farmers be put out of business while others continue? I shall come back to that.

Looking back over debates in the past few years about the common agricultural policy, in particular those on the EU sugar regime, I am struck by the fact that there seems to have been a general consensus that subsidies either need to be phased out or are going to be. Even farmers who do not want to consider that possibility accept the likelihood that they will go, and the majority think that it is inevitable. However, the devil is in the detail, and there are real concerns about how it will be achieved without wrecking UK farming and possibly damaging the agricultural economies of many developing countries.

Moving from a protected, subsidised farming economy to a free trade economy is not necessary. When the hon. Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) and I were members of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, we visited New Zealand to see how it had moved from subsidies to a free market. Obviously, there is no direct analogy with the United Kingdom, and New Zealand is not a member of the EU. It took the New Zealanders about 15 years to develop a new farming economy. Many farms went out of business, and there was much hardship on the way. I left with the impression that it had been nip and tuck whether they would produce the free trade farming economy that they now have.

United Kingdom farmers face a similar journey, possibly over a similar time scale. I am concerned that the Government have not yet produced a strategic road map to navigate the UK farming industry from where it is now to where it might be in the next 10 or 15 years. About 36 per cent. of the national sugar beet crop is grown in Norfolk, and it is regarded as the county's cornerstone crop. Getting changes wrong will have a serious detrimental impact on farming in Norfolk and particularly in my constituency.

What are UK sugar beet growers' concerns about the EU proposals? First, the timetable for implementing the price cuts is too short and will cause a shock to the industry. Interestingly, that view was endorsed by Oxfam, which argued for shallower price cuts and a longer implementation period than that proposed by the Commission, precisely because of the damaging impact on some of the world's poorest economies. Are the Government considering proposing to other member states that the timetable be shortened, for the reasons that I have advanced?

Secondly, there is the extent of the price cuts. A 42.6 per cent. cut is too drastic and goes far beyond what is required to achieve a balanced market that ensures production in the EU's most efficient regions—the very point made by the hon. Member for Sherwood. The price cuts threaten production, even in the EU's most efficient regions, which obviously include the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): My hon. Friend has come to the point in the new proposals that causes the gravest concern. Although they are considerably better than the EU's first draft, does my hon. Friend agree that the objective of taking 5 million tonnes out of production does not require a cut in the proposed reference price of the scale proposed by the European Commission? For all the Government's support for change, is it not important that they embrace that thought?

Mr. Simpson: My hon. Friend has made a good point, which I absolutely support. I look to the Minister to address it in his reply.

Is the Minister aware of the work done by the sugar beet expert Martin Lainsbury of the Arable Group, which is based at Morley, near Wymondham, in Norfolk? Mr. Lainsbury has calculated the financial implications of the proposed price cuts for the average sugar beet grower in Norfolk. He estimates that growers' income would slump by more than £750 per hectare—from a gross £712 to a loss of £40 per hectare. In other words, we are going straight into deficit. If correct, that would have a devastating impact on farmers. At the very least, it would persuade many to get out of sugar beet; in some cases, it would persuade them to get out of farming.

Thirdly, it seems that highly efficient sugar beet producers such as the United Kingdom will be treated exactly the same under the proposals as the most inefficient producers in EU countries such as Greece and Finland, as the hon. Member for Sherwood said. Surely, the logic should be to close the least efficient producers down and compensate them. Why drive out efficiency rather than inefficiency?

Fourthly, there is the merging of the A and B quotas. Implementing a 42.6 per cent. price cut on an amalgamated A and B quota disadvantages small proportional B quota member states because, as the Minister knows, the price of B beet is lower than that of A beet. The UK's status as a relatively small B sugar producer means that our growers are likely to face an additional price cut of 2.3 per cent. over and above the 42.6 per cent. proposed by the Commission. Do the Government intend to oppose cutting prices on an amalgamated A plus B quota?

Fifthly, since the Government began their partial regulatory impact assessment on 30 June, they have concluded that if sugar beet prices fell to €25 a tonne, the majority of UK sugar beet growing would be unprofitable. I understand that the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs does not expect the price to fall that low and states in the assessment that €30 a tonne is more likely. A €5 margin is not that great. Can the Minister explain on what basis DEFRA made that calculation, and what will happen if the calculation is wrong and the price falls to €25 a tonne?

I could continue to ask a whole raft of questions, but I am conscious that other Members wish to speak. The EU Commission has failed to recognise the legitimate rights and interests of growers. There appears to be no explicit provision for growers to have a say in the process of deciding whether to purchase additional quota or to relinquish quota under the restructuring scheme. I do not think that growers have any more right than any other group in the EU; but they certainly have a right per se to be heard, given that at the end of day their livelihoods are at stake and they are potentially the cornerstone of UK farming. Does the Minister agree that there should be explicit provision for growers to have their say in the consultation process?

Sugar beet growers would have more confidence if there had been a serious policy decision to consider an alternative crop to sugar beet that might help provide financial stability and be environmentally friendly. I refer, of course, to biofuels. Biodiesel is made from vegetable or animal oil, mixed with a small quantity of methanol. Bioethanol is a simple alcohol that is produced by the fermentation of plant co-products—straw, wheat, potato and sugar beet tops.

Over the past few years there has been a long, exhausting debate about biofuels. I would like to acknowledge my former colleague and good friend Baroness Shephard, who has now transferred to another place and whose presence hovers in this Chamber even as I speak. As a former Minister with responsibility for agriculture, she knew the issues only too well and has led the charge on biofuels. Her successor, my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser), will continue with that and hopes to catch your eye later, Mr. Olner.

The serious point is that hon. Members have won the argument with the Minister and his Department. However, although it would be churlish not to acknowledge that the Treasury has lowered the duty on biofuels, it is not until we get a zero-rated duty that those interested in investing in them will be prepared to do so. We are in a Catch-22 situation: the Treasury say that if duty were lowered to zero, we would be flooded by biofuels from the continent, yet if we do not do so, we are ultimately still likely to be flooded.

Paddy Tipping: It is very good of the hon. Gentleman to give way again. Let me associate myself with his remarks about the noble Baroness Shephard. He mentioned the Treasury, but what about the Department for Transport and the notion of a biofuels obligation, which is already in legislation? What has happened to that work? Why is the Department for Transport not moving forward on it? A stepped-up obligation would avoid the import of Brazilian ethanol.

Mr. Simpson: Once again, the hon. Gentleman has made a strong point and although I do not necessarily expect the Minister to answer on behalf of another Department, the point should be passed back. Developing biofuels not only would provide a staple crop for many farmers but would be environmentally friendly on the whole and answer the increasing problems caused by the import of fuel. I recognise that there are many difficulties en route, but I would like to think that the Government were considering the issue strategically. Such behaviour would be a form of what used to be called joined-up government—I do not know whether that phrase has now gone out of fashion.

Mr. Greenway: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend; he has evened up the score of interventions with the other side.

With regard to a strategic view from Government, is my hon. Friend aware of the significant research project into the production of bioethanol from sugar at the Central Science Laboratory in my constituency? I am assured that that work is virtually complete. We could launch that initiative very soon.

Mr. Simpson: A lot of research has come together. Norfolk MPs recently had a presentation from people from the north-east who are involved in looking at developing the industry. I am ashamed to say that they seemed to be far ahead of those of us in Norfolk. Lots of things are coming together and the Government must surely get on with it as quickly as possible.

My debate has been about UK farming and the EU sugar regime. We tend to debate that at the strategic level and we rarely come down to the individual farmer and his family. I am only too conscious that in my constituency the majority of farmers are not large commercial groupings. It is frequently the farmer and his business partner, who is usually his wife. Most of them manage to farm under the most difficult conditions, not least the blizzard of rules, regulations and computer failures.

I want to close with a short quote from a farmer who wrote to me on 4 July, when he heard that I had initiated this debate. He writes:

> "I have now had an opportunity to work through the figures and the impact on my business. I am a small farmer in Norfolk looking after 600 acres. Financially the impact is devastating to the economics of the farm, in fact the only sensible option is to cease beet production altogether. Looking to the future I will have to radically change the way I farm to the complete detriment of the environment I have spent 10 years building up. I currently grow 40 hectares of sugar beet (a spring crop) 50 hectares of linseed (a spring crop) and 30 hectares of spring barley (another spring crop). This spread of winter/spring cropping gives a good balance of environments to all wildlife. I feel particularly proud of my 30 pairs of Grey Partridges and 2 pairs of nesting Barn owls. Without sugar beet the only way I will be able to remain financially viable will be to pursue a Wheat/Oilseed Rape/Beans rotation. This will maximise my gross margin and I hope allow me to remain in business. These are all autumn sown crops and so will offer little in the way of diversity to wildlife. Overwintered stubbles will be a thing of the past, granted I have planned for some skylark plots in my ELS application, but will a dozen 12 square metre plots make up for 60 hectares of stubble or 40 hectares of lifted beet debris, both of which support an enormous diversity of wildlife. I know the impact this will have on the wildlife's environment. I just feel very sad that wildlife is again going to be the main loser in man's pursuit of a fractionally cheaper Mars bar. If this is the implication on my farm, I wonder what impact cutting down vast tracts of rain forest in Brazil to produce sugar cane will be?"

I have not come here as an advocate or to make a special plea for UK farmers. We are beyond that. I believe, however, that UK farmers have a right to look to the Government to see what their policy will be in terms of the EU Commission's proposals. Have the Government thought through the road map to get us from where we are now to where they would like us to be in five or 10 years? If they do not, other colleagues will be debating the disappearance of UK farming in this Chamber in a decade's time.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): We have just over half an hour of general debate before I call the Front-Bench spokesmen. If hon. Members can keep their remarks rationed, they will all get in.

9.55 am

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): One of the enormous privileges of being an independent Member in this place—particularly in Westminster Hall—is that I can sit in the middle and if there are not many Members on one side or the other, I get called early. So, I am grateful to you, Mr. Olner. I am also grateful to the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) for raising the issue, because I have just had a meeting with some National Farmers Union members in my constituency and this debate allows me to put all my questions directly to the Minister, who I am pleased to see present, rather than writing to him at some length.

Sugar beet in Wyre Forest is not of nearly the same significance as it is in Mid-Norfolk, but there are at least 20 farmers who, on average, produce 1,000 tonnes a year. Because the farms are much smaller than the Norfolk farms and are on tight rotations, at least a third of their land is taken up in that way. So they are very vulnerable to changes in the price. Of course, the price that we are being quoted is unviable for many of them. As the hon. Gentleman has said, the timetable is far too short.

One point that has been raised repeatedly with me is the compensation deal. Apparently, the compensation deal involves the Government and not the growers, whereas in some of the continental countries, compensation is going straight to the growers. It is crucial that compensation goes where it is needed. In my area, there is a larger producer, who has bought the incredibly expensive harvesting equipment, which he then lets out to the rest of the growers in the area.

I know of the Minister's interest in wildlife, and he knows of mine. At least we still have lapwings and skylarks in Wyre Forest. We cannot manage corncrakes or pink-footed geese, but I can still hear skylarks. Not to be able to do so would be a huge loss.

Alternative uses have been referred to, and I can only support the comments on getting bioethanol from beet. It is so obvious that there is another use. Why the dickens can we not pursue that? I am sure that many of the farmers in Norfolk, Scunthorpe and certainly in Wyre Forest are joining the specially chartered flight to Brussels on 18 July to lobby the meeting there. As the hon. Gentleman said, this debate is very much part of the consultation and we want to convey the message that our farmers are desperately worried.

I shall talk briefly about diversification, because that is the way sugar beet farmers are having to look. Producing biodiesel from oilseed rape has been mentioned. It seems ridiculous that we export the rape to Germany to be processed and then reimport it to this country. Is that due to subsidies or because there is no processing capacity? Could we not produce the biodiesel in this country?

On niche marketing, high-quality poultry is produced in my area and sold directly to small butchers and farmers' markets. However, the farmers who do that have come up against a tremendous problem. There are apparently eco-friendly poultry houses. They are low-profile, on skids and mobile, and they have solar panels, but they do not fit in with any of the local planning guidelines. The local planning committees do not know how to pass them. Somehow, planning rules are not keeping pace with the aims of diversification.

Another interesting niche market is asparagus. One of the farmers who is growing asparagus and selling it directly has found that the bashed-up fragments are much better than the high-quality stuff, because people buy them for soup. Sometimes he has to bash up his good-quality asparagus just so that he can sell it for soup.

Another problem that was raised with me relates to environmental stewardship. Even getting in at the entry level is difficult because of the problem in obtaining the digital maps. One farmer applied on 17 January and still has not got them. I am sure that all hon. Members have seen them and know the amount of detail that has to be completed. We are talking about every field, every hedgerow, arable scrub and woodland. Every tree that measures more than 30 cm in diameter at chest height has to be entered. So the farmers cannot even start until they get the digital payback.

One bit of good, purely local news that we raised in the Chamber last week concerns neighbourhood policing. There will be trials of that in the area that I represent. As the farms in the area are close to the towns, it will give local farmers a direct phone number to call when the local ne'er-do-wells are invading.

How can the Minister protect the growing of sugar beet in this country? I am sure that, following the trip to Brussels, he realises the strength of feeling. I expect that some of his farmers will be on that trip. It is vital that compensation to growers really gets there. I also want to ask about diversification—converting beet to bioethanol and oilseed rape to biodiesel—and about the planning rules. How can those rules be brought up to date so that they keep pace with diversification? Finally, I would like to know about the digital maps for environmental stewardship.

10.1 am

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on initiating the debate, which is important. I represent The Wrekin, which is in Shropshire and in which is situated the Allscott sugar beet factory. At peak periods, the factory employs 150 people. It is supplied locally by 600 farmers, of which 200 are in my constituency. Therefore, sugar beet, and the sugar industry in general, is important to The Wrekin, and to Shropshire as a whole.

Many of the people employed at the factory have children who go to local schools. When those people get their pay packet, they go off to local retailers and take their families to local leisure operators. Therefore, the future of the Allscott factory is of great importance. I hope that the Minister will be able to confirm that he has held discussions at the most senior level with British Sugar and to reassure me and my constituents that there will be no threat to jobs at Allscott.

I have some concerns on the specifics of the proposed changes to the sugar regime. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk mentioned the reference price. It seems to have slipped. In the White Paper, the reference price was €421. The proposed change now makes it €385, which is a considerable and extremely sharp drop from the existing price of €632. We know now that, for sugar beet specifically, there is a proposed price change to €25. That is unnecessarily severe. It is a huge drop in price. Many farmers have telephoned me to express their concern about the issue.

We have heard about food security. There is a real issue about how it will affect the supply chain. Can we be confident that farmers will not say, "Well, supplying sugar beet is just not profitable any more and I can't continue to do it"? If that happens, we may find ourselves importing far more sugar beet, despite the fact that we have been producing a huge amount for our own needs, never mind those of other people.

We heard from the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor) about compensation. I agree with him that compensation needs to be equitable and that there needs to be a level playing field throughout Europe. He touched on compensation going directly to beet growers. I also agree with him on that point. The rules on the origin of sugar beet need to be transparent and secure.

My key point is about diversification and bioethanol. It is a real opportunity for the Government to produce a strategy that protects farmers and gives them a new outlet for sugar beet. It would enable the Government to say, "We are actually doing something to try to meet our Kyoto and climate change targets." I was in the Chamber when the Minister who led the debate on climate change and made the winding-up speech kindly agreed to consider the issue of bioethanol. I hope that he will comment on any progress that the Government have made during the past two weeks. It is a real opportunity for Britain to lead the way in Europe. It is said that others, such as Germany, are leading. Well, we can catch up.

Why is it that in Brazil 23 per cent. of cars use some form of biofuel? Why is Brazil leading the way? It is a fine country, but we should be leading the way. We have the technology, the innovation and the capability to establish a leading biofuels industry. Of course, it must be led by the Government, and they need to provide tax breaks and some sort of preferential loan, so that the capital investment can be made by those who wish to be involved in the industry. I hope that the Minister will comment on whether he discussed that issue with oil companies and with the Petrol Retailers Association, because the fuel companies appear to be dragging their feet. They appear to be reluctant to get involved, while everybody else wants to.

I have a couple of facts to impart before I close my speech. I note that bioethanol can be produced from UK-grown sugar beet and wheat. Bioethanol produces at least 50 per cent. of the carbon emissions produced by petrol. Surely, that is attractive. Use of bioethanol by 5 per cent. of cars in the UK would provide the equivalent carbon saving of taking 1 million cars off the road. Surely, that is attractive. I hope that the Minister will be able to inform us of the progress that the Government are making.

Allscott is a vital part of the community in The Wrekin. In 2007, Allscott will celebrate its 80th birthday, and I hope that it will be a happy birthday, not an unhappy birthday. There is an issue about the 350 lorries from the plant that travel through my constituency at peak time, and I held discussions with the plant manager on Friday. The company is aware of the issue, and it is addressing some of the local residents' concerns that I raised. However, we welcome Allscott, the jobs that it provides and the spend that it provides in the local community. It is an integral part of Shropshire life.

This is not a matter of either/or; the changes do not mean in extremis the potential demise of the sugar beet industry, its growers and its producers. Let us turn the matter around and consider it as an opportunity. The change is dramatic, and British Sugar will inevitably make cuts somewhere in the United Kingdom. However, let us be proactive rather than reactive, and let us use this change as an opportunity to diversify into biofuels. Let us do it early and do it now, so that in the transitional period between now and 2008, when there is sadly no review, and up to 2015, there are no casualties among farmers, and in particular, farmers in Shropshire.

10.10 am

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing this debate on a subject on which my predecessor, the right hon. Baroness Shephard, also secured several debates.

The recently announced European Union proposals on reform of the sugar regime will, as my hon. Friend said, have a significant impact on Norfolk and particularly on my constituency. I endorse his comment that the proposed cut in sugar prices will seriously undermine the profitability of many sugar beet growers. The Government's partial impact assessment on the proposals states that, at €25 for a tonne of sugar beet, most United Kingdom sugar beet growers will be unprofitable.

I shall repeat the questions that my hon. Friend asked the Minister. How certain are the Government that the sugar beet price will not fall to €25 a tonne? From the Government's conversation with British Sugar, how likely do they think it is that British Sugar will pay higher prices to maintain consistency of supply? How many sugar beet growers do the Government believe will remain in the UK after the implementation of the reforms? The EU proposes to compensate growers for 60 per cent. of the price reduction in a single farm payment. It is hoped that that will cushion the impact, but the Minister needs to answer several questions before we know the full implications of those payments. Will the Government guarantee that the sugar beet compensation payment is paid solely to sugar beet growers and not to other farmers, or do the Government intend to dilute the compensation by putting it into the general funds for the single farm payment? How many UK sugar beet growers will remain if the compensation payment is diluted? Does the Minister agree that a fully decoupled payment paid directly to beet growers should be implemented throughout the EU? Will the UK Government prevent other countries from obtaining a competitive advantage by retaining an element of coupled payments?

In addition to the large number of beet growers in my constituency, there is also the Wissington processing plant, which is one of six such plants operated by British Sugar. That plant, and others at Bury St. Edmunds and elsewhere, process nearly half the UK's beet crop. Out of the six plants, the Wissington plant is the biggest employer. It directly employs 240 people, but is considered to support another 2,300 jobs indirectly. The EU proposals, however, might threaten the future of that plant and the livelihoods of many people in my constituency.

British Sugar is the most efficient processor in Europe. It has the lowest processing costs, and might seek to use the restructuring funds offered to reorganise itself.

[Mr. Christopher Fraser]

Given lower beet supplies and smaller margins, it might seem uneconomic to have six factories. Indeed, without restructuring funds, British Sugar might witness a £90 million fall in annual income. The Government's own assessment states that British Sugar might want to close one or two of its factories. There might be opportunities in the future for processing raw sugar cane, but the likely location for those processing factories will be alongside ports and waterways and that might benefit the British Sugar plants elsewhere in the country. That puts into question sites such as Wissington.

What support will the Government provide to people who lose their jobs in the processing industry as a result of these reforms? As has already been mentioned, the future of many beet growers will be determined by whether we can stimulate a domestic bioethanol industry in this country. The new EU payments for energy crops are an important aspect of that. Payments of up to €45 a hectare would certainly help many of the sugar beet growers in my constituency. That payment, however, is limited throughout Europe to 1.5 million hectares, after which aid is reduced. Will the Minister clarify how much of that payment UK sugar beet farmers are likely to be entitled to? Will countries such as Germany and France take the lion's share? The Government have reduced the duty on bioethanol, but much more is required to stimulate demand.

The renewable transport fuels obligation will provide an enormous boost to demand for biofuels and bioethanol. There are, however, questions that need to be answered about that. When do the Government expect to make a decision on the renewable transport fuels obligation? Could the Government clarify the pilot project that is due to be introduced in 2006 on duty incentives for encouraging the use of biomass in conventional fuel? What progress have the Government made on deciding whether to use an enhanced capital allowance scheme to encourage biofuel processing plants?

It is clear that new markets for sugar need to be found. The Government should do all that they can to achieve that. Jobs are at stake, but so too are aspects of the local and wider environment, which the Government appear not yet to have considered.

10.15 am

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing the debate. I confess that I did not expect an opportunity to speak this morning. If the Minister will forgive me, I must chair another meeting, which starts at about five to 11, and I may therefore have to leave just before he concludes his remarks. However, I regard the issue as so important that I am grateful for the opportunity to say a few words on it, and to support my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson). I am disappointed that more Labour Members are not here to debate an extremely important issue for UK agriculture and the Government's whole agriculture policy.

I recognise that the Commission's proposal in the latest draft policy is a significant improvement. I pay tribute to all those who lobbied vociferously against the original proposal, which would have applied quota cuts across the whole of EU production, when no quota cuts could possibly be justified in the United Kingdom.

It is worth bearing in mind that we have a balanced market in the UK. Roughly 50 per cent. of our sugar needs are met from our domestic sugar beet growing and producing industry, and the other half are met from cane sugar imports that honour obligations that go back generations. It is vital that, as the Government consider what to do about the EU proposals, we should bear in mind not just our farmers' interests but those of the cane sugar producing countries that will equally lose if the price of sugar collapses and the market is made up by imported sugar largely from Brazil.

We should also keep in mind the fact that there is a difference, as we have been discussing in recent days in the light of the G8 summit, between free trade and fair trade. We should keep in mind what happened in connection with coffee growers. A free trade regime was introduced about a decade ago and many third world producers' economies were decimated. I do not believe that anyone in the Government or the Commission wants that to happen with sugar.

We should equally recognise that there is a problem. The European Union agriculture industry produces 5 million tonnes of sugar a year more than we need. That is exported, with the benefit of export subsidies, and many of the exports take the form of manufactured products such as confectionery and biscuits. That is unsustainable and must change. The Commission, supported largely by representations that have been made by the industry, has devised a scheme, which it considers provides a realistic prospect of taking out the 5 million tonnes of excess production. Under the restructuring scheme, whole sugar-processing factories will be closed and growers will be compensated proportionately and appropriately.

It will be difficult, however, to ensure that the efficient industry in the UK and in other member states is maintained while inefficient production is lost. The proposed reference price of €25, which has been one of the key points of this debate, will not keep efficient UK farmers in production. I endorse entirely what has been said by my colleagues. Sugar beet growers in Ryedale, of whom there are many, say that it is simply uneconomical to grow sugar beet at a price of €25 per tonne—absolutely insane. They recognise that there must be a cut, but the price needs to be higher than that.

I hope that the Minister will take from this morning's debate the views of our growers. This debate is important because, while we recognise that the proposals are better than what we had before, they are by no means a perfect solution. Work on the reference price is absolutely vital.

I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk said and, from a sedentary position, I supported the views in the letter that he read out. Many similar things have been said to me by sugar beet growers in my constituency. The crop has not only provided financial stability for two or three decades during this long period of instability in UK agriculture, particularly for growers, but benefited wildlife considerably. The way that we farm our landscape ought to reflect the need for biodiversity as well as the drive for more efficiency, lower prices and greater fairness in world trade.

I have time to endorse another couple of points and to raise an issue that has not yet been mentioned. Last week on the Floor of the House, the Foreign Secretary made a statement about the outcome of the EU Council of Ministers and the obvious rows about the future of the common agricultural policy. I said that there must be mandatory decoupling of the restructuring scheme and the compensation arrangements across the whole EU. We must not have the problem that arose with the last round of CAP reform when, in particular, the French took the compensation and paid it to their farmers because of the lower price but then allowed them to continue producing at a lower price.

If the aim of the proposals is to decrease production by 5 million tonnes, the surplus must be taken out where it is being generated, and that is mainly in France. As I said to the Foreign Secretary, I do not in any way underestimate the political difficulties in doing that, given the current climate. Naturally, the French Government will take a view that is completely contrary to the one that has been expressed this morning. They will speak up for their farmers in the same way that we speak up for ours. They do not want processing plants to close down or growers to be put out of business any more than we do. However, I come back to the fact that, by and large, that is where the surplus is being generated and that is where the problem must be addressed. Therefore, there must be mandatory decoupling of the compensation.

Another issue that has been alluded to is the need to change the reference years proposed by the EU. Because of some of the past restructuring in this country, they would disadvantage our farmers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk referred to the proposal to merge the A and B quota—I shall not reiterate the point. That proposal would be very disadvantageous to our farmers, but no one has mentioned an associated issue, which is a thing called the C quota. It is proposed that none of the sugar produced under the C quota should be allowed to be exported, which prompts the question: what on earth are we going to do with it? I hope that the Government accept at least that C quota sugar exports should be allowed up to the European Union's World Trade Organisation volume ceiling, which is, I believe, just over 1.27 million tonnes. Without that, the market will destabilise further. As we saw last year when there was a drought, the amount of sugar produced can drop below that of average years. Who knows what will happen this year? The size and sugar content of the crop varies from year to year, and the system must be flexible enough to deal with that.

I hope that all these points will be taken on board by the Minister and the Government as they embark on the negotiations, which will surely be complex, detailed and difficult. I hope that our comments today will help the Minister and his colleagues in those negotiations.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. If the two Front-Bench spokesmen are happy to give up a couple of minutes, I shall allow Mr. Moss to speak.

10.26 am

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Olner. I shall be brief. First I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on securing the debate on this issue, which is extremely important not just for his constituency, but for the majority of the farming community in East Anglia. I represent the fens of Cambridgeshire. The whole of the fens region, stretching from the Minister's constituency in north Lincolnshire down to Cambridge, is the primary beet-growing area of the country. Anything that jeopardises the successful growing of sugar beet in that region strikes at the economic hearts of farmers there.

Our farmers want to ensure that the Minister and the Government will negotiate as vigorously as possible on their behalf, and to ensure that our interests and growers' interests are paramount in their thinking. I understand that the issue must be seen in the context of the Government's overall position on CAP reform, but it makes no sense for my constituents seriously to affect the economic viability of beet growing in our region if by decimating that local growing, we encourage the decimation of rain forests in places such as Brazil to grow cane sugar. Of course, that would not even benefit local growers there, because it would be funded by foreign money—probably American bank money—and would lead to other severe problems.

I have received many letters from my growers, many of whom are in despair. Mr. Bill Burton of White Fen farm in Benwick wrote to me saying that having perused the proposals for sugar reform, he believes that British growers will get the worst possible deal all round, and that it could well signal the death-knell of our sugar beet industry. The Government must give some sort of encouragement to our farmers that they will be even-handed in their negotiations.

I have a letter from Lord Whitty that was written before the recent negotiation position—when he was the Minister for Food, Farming and Sustainable Energy—in which he replies pretty positively to questions about discrimination against UK growers. I hope that the Minister will endorse that view in his response. In the letter, Lord Whitty says:

> "We will certainly be looking for reforms which result in fair terms of competition for all concerned and give UK growers the opportunity to benefit from their relative efficiency . . . But we will seek to ensure that any necessary reductions"— in quota—

> "are made on a rational and transparent basis consistent with our wider reform objectives."

The letter goes on to say that DEFRA commissioned independent economic research that suggested that some 20,000 people are employed throughout the industry. I dispute that figure. It is not clear whether those people are directly employed in the production of beet, or whether the figure includes everyone who works on a farm that grows the crop.

The research also found that the impact of lower prices would be offset by the ability of many growers to switch to other crops and to increase productivity in a more genuinely competitive market. I do not know where that research came from—it would be interesting to have it published—but farmers in my constituency would oppose that switch very strongly. Arable farmers are under incredible pressure, and have been for the past few years, from changes to the CAP, the price that they receive for their wheat and the strong pound. I could go on.

[Mr. Malcolm Moss]

Sugar beet is a fundamental cash crop for many arable farmers. If it is removed from the equation, arable farming as a whole will be under severe pressure. The Minister must tell us and farmers what future they have if that fundamental cash crop is taken from them. There is every sign in the present negotiated position that our farmers will be the ones who will carry the can. They believe that that is unfair.

It has been suggested that the French, who produce 150 per cent. of their sugar needs, should be the ones under closer scrutiny, but our farmers, who produce only 50 per cent. of our sugar needs, are the ones who seem to be carrying the can. It will therefore be interesting to see how the Minister answers the many questions that we put to him today. I hope that he will give some reassurance to the growers in my constituency.

10.32 am

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Before I begin, I remind hon. Members of my agricultural entry in the Register of Members' Interests, although there will have been substantial changes in the climate and economy when we start growing sugar beet in the area that I represent.

I place on record my admiration for the remarks made by the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) and his resolute defence of the sugar beet industry in his area. Whatever the faults of the sugar regime, it should be said that the farmers who have operated under it and the processors who have processed the beet have done so most efficiently, and that the industry has become one of the most efficient sugar beet industries in Europe.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned food security, a subject that is close to my heart but one that has been unfashionable for several years. Food security is the reason why sugar beet was first established in this country. People are impatient for sugar. Indeed, they become very irritable if they do not have their sugar. It was important for this country to produce at least a certain amount of sugar, although we are still a net importer of it, unlike France and other countries in the European Union.

Food security will be of concern when political instability and climate change do not allow us to predict how much food this planet will produce in the next 10 or 20 years. Any Government will take great care to ensure that at least a certain amount of the food that this nation needs is produced here in this country by the farmers who have shown in the past that they can produce it and who will, I am sure, show that they can do so in the future.

In the past few frenetic weeks, it has seemed that one could propose any reform, renegotiation or even abolition of the agricultural policy and that it was bound to be a good thing. It would help the environment, the consumer, the third world and almost any other organisation that cared to be interested in it. Yet as soon as there is fundamental change to a particular regime, such as the sugar regime, it quickly becomes apparent that certain aspects of our life will suffer, whether it is the farmers who grow the sugar beet or the processors who process it.

Indeed, they are part of an interdependent economic unit, because without the sugar beet growers, there will be no factories, which would obviously lead to unemployment. Other interests will suffer, too, and that is certainly true of the environment. As several hon. Members have said, sugar beet is an important spring-summer crop, which contributes to the over-wintering of several important bird species.

The changes will also affect those African, Caribbean and Pacific countries that entered into the sugar obligation a long time ago. They knew that they had a ready market for their sugar in the UK and the EU and that the price was profitable. The reduction of that price puts their standard of living and their prospects of developing their industry under threat.

This is a convoluted problem. CAP reform is a complex issue, as we can see from the sugar regime, and the Minister would do well to follow through some of the consequences. The National Trust noted only last week that the profitability of its tenanted farms in the national parks was under great threat, so we could lose landscapes and biodiversity, too. The Minister must follow through the consequences of the proposed action.

I, too, am concerned that we should keep a viable sugar beet industry in this country. We have been told that a 30 per cent. price reduction could be just about bearable for British beet growers, but that depends very much on the monetary and exchange rate circumstances, and small changes in them could make sugar beet completely unviable in this country.

We need more time to ensure not only that sugar beet growers and processors in this country can adjust to the proposals, but that third-world countries—particularly those involved in the sugar protocol—can adjust to them. I therefore have a two-pronged request for the Minister; let us make sure not only that everyone agrees to the changes in the sugar regime, but that the people whose interests are bound up with those changes are taken into consideration.

10.38 am

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I begin by heartily congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) on landing the debate. It raises a matter of enormous importance not only for East Anglia, but for the whole of British agriculture. It is also very timely, because the long negotiation process will begin next week at the Council of Agriculture Ministers. This is a critical time.

I entirely agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) that the price is too low; that is the most fundamental problem that we face. The issue goes back some time. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk is a military historian and will know that the naval blockade that resulted from our success at the battle of Trafalgar, which we celebrated last week, led Napoleon to heavily subsidise sugar beet in France.

Our message to the Government is that the UK is the good guy in this. We produce only 55 per cent. of what we consume and take the rest from the less developed countries, so we are not the problem. It is the EU that has an obvious problem because, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale said, the present arrangements are unsustainable. Under the Uruguay round, the WTO allowed Europe to export 1 million tonnes of sugar, but it has been exporting 5 million tonnes. It is not us who have been producing that surplus; it is the French, and it is they who should take the pain. As my constituent Mr. Frank, from Morton, near Oswestry, said,

"we only grow 55 per cent. of our needs of sugar, whereas countries such as France grow well over their sugar requirements—thus swamping the world market . . . Surely if there are cuts to be made, they should come from countries that are over producing."

If we are not to reduce quotas and are to depend entirely on the price mechanism, we must have a level playing field, something that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk mentioned.

With respect to France, what assurances can the Minister give us that in his negotiations he will consider the lack of a level playing field? Already, French farmers have significant benefits. There are soft loans; French farmers' co-operatives do not pay corporation tax; there are significant grants. Above all, they have not decoupled. It is nonsense to go through the reform if France has not decoupled and if we treat sugar as purely a food product in an open market.

I should be grateful if the Minister dealt with that point. In recent years sugar has been the only profitable crop for arable farmers. They have not made money on grain, but they have on beet. How many farmers does the Minister think will be able to make a profit at £17 a tonne, when many of my constituents tell me that £18 is the absolute minimum break-even price?

I am concerned about details of the proposal, which is better than what was presented to us originally. I agree with my hon. Friends that the price change is too drastic, and too quick. That view is even endorsed by British Sugar, which buys the material. It says that £25 for beet is unnecessarily severe to meet the EU's objectives and would risk damaging even the most efficient industries in Europe, of which we are one, of course.

One of the details that I do not understand is a production levy, which was originally charged to help exports in the event of excess. As I understand the proposal, we shall not be exporting excess. Why is there still a production levy? There is a flexibility clause allowing for a further 10 per cent. reduction in the minimum beet price. Why is that still in the proposal? Why does the Commission not give real recognition to the legitimate interests of growers? Why are they not involved in the restructuring scheme?

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way; he is making an extremely strong case. Is he aware that in Norfolk, Cambridgeshire and Lincolnshire many of the growers are running not large farms but small farms? Many are county council smallholders in my constituency and in that of my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss). They would go out of business if the proposals were to go through in the shape that we fear they might take if the Government do not listen.

Mr. Paterson: I endorse that comment, coming as I do from Shropshire, where there are also many small growers.

The point that I am making is that although the process that we are considering is inevitable—it is inevitable that the world sugar price will be approached by EU growers, and the export of the excesses is not sustainable—the move that is proposed is one huge hit. This one sudden move will cause enormous damage across British farming.

The matter of the A and B quota was mentioned. Again, I want to know why we will be hit by that. What will the Minister do in negotiations to ensure that we are not discriminated against on the price change and the jiggling with the quotas? I endorse the comment of my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale; what will happen to the C quota production now? Where will it go?

I want quickly to discuss the fact that there are other things that one can do with sugar. What discussions has the Minister had with the monopoly processor? It is set to benefit from many of the restructuring arrangements. What is to stop it closing down production here and importing molasses or half-processed material from other countries? We know that British Sugar has invested quite heavily in Poland and is already producing 200,000 tonnes of sugar there.

Will the Minister comment on the EU animal feed regulations? Until recently, sugar beet pulp has been a profitable product. It has now become a cost to the processors and has to be cross-subsidised by sugar production. A further consequence of new regulations is that beet washings have become excessively costly to remove. What discussions has the Minister had with the Commission about that? It is another extra cost that makes processing in this country less interesting.

As to the position of the processors, I am as concerned as my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) about the future of Allscott, which is now the only plant on the western side of the country. If Allscott is not to have a role in the production of sugar and given the Government's history with Milk Marque, which was smashed up although it had only 38 per cent. of the market, in comparison to British Sugar's 100 per cent., what will the view of the Government be should farmers' co-operatives be set up with a view to taking over processing plant and possibly getting into biofuel?

It is extraordinary that the Government have not grasped the chance to get into biofuel; they would have all-party support if they did so. We do not have to eat sugar; we can do other useful things with it. The former Energy Minister Brian Wilson pointed out in an interesting recent article that Tesco is bringing in biofuel, but is transporting it in carbon-fuelled vehicles. Would it not be more sensible to produce it here, in plants that are currently producing a food product?

I am pleased to say that my hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice), who is at the great Yorkshire show today, is to press the Government again for the introduction of a road transport fuel obligation. Sugar beet is part of a broader picture. I do not understand why the Government are holding back on doing something that would have very wide support, instead of pouring money into wind farms. The average 2.2 MW turbine gets about £438,000 subsidy a year, a dramatic subsidy for a system that is only 30 per cent. or so efficient. It has been done in Sweden. I am told that in Stockholm, biofuel cars are not subject to congestion charge and attract reduced vehicle excise duty and fuel duty. Such a measure would have overwhelming support, and would be a legitimate use of the beet product.

[Mr. Paterson]

If I may touch on the technology that dare not speak its name, have the Government considered the merits of planting GM beet as a fuel crop, strictly for non-human consumption? What would be the savings on inputs? Figures given in Farmers Weekly a couple of weeks ago showed that major savings could be made. If it were used strictly for fuel rather than for human consumption, would there be merit in it? Have the Government a view? Have they discussed the issue with the Commission?

Moving on to the environment and picking up the East Anglian connection, I think that "Turnip" Townshend, who established that a break crop is needed, came from that area. There are real benefits for the environment. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds points out that half the world's population of pink-footed geese winter in north-west Norfolk and on the broads, and they depend on grazing the tops of sugar beet after harvest for winter food. It also mentions lapwings, skylarks and other birds.

Mr. Bill Olner (in the Chair): Order. The hon. Gentleman must give the Minister a chance to respond.

Mr. Paterson: I shall be brief. There is a clear environmental benefit in growing sugar beet. There is also a distant environmental benefit in that we would not damage rain forests such as the Cerrado, as mentioned by the RSPB.

In brief, we have a good story to tell. We do not contribute to the surplus, we have a crop that provides employment—as we heard from Allscott—and a food, which is required but which could be used in other ways. What the Minister is proposing to the Commission is too drastic and too quick. We all know where we want to get to, but he should consider the amenity benefit—people go to Norfolk to look at the birds—and the general environmental benefit. All that would be thrown away if reform were too hurried and too drastic.

The Minister for Climate Change and the Environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): I will do my best to respond to what has been a wide-ranging and very knowledgeable debate. The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) has a great interest in the issue, and put his case very well and comprehensively. As many hon. Members have mentioned, the matter is complex and as it has arisen under the UK presidency, we want to address it and to make progress. The debate is timely because many of the issues have not yet been resolved, even within the framework of the Commission proposals, which I, like the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), welcome. They are a considerable improvement on previous ones.

To pick up on what the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk said, it is important for our growers that the Commission has moved away from compulsory quota cuts—that would disadvantage a country such as this, which is not producing a surplus of beet sugar—and towards voluntary exits, with compensation. The more efficient growers will have the greater opportunities. That is exactly what we want from the changes. Our sector is efficient, so if the regime is based on efficiency, our sector should benefit from it. That should be one of the central tenets of the reorganisation.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping), who apologised that he could not stay to the end, that there needs to be an equal approach across Europe and that there should be decoupling, as other hon. Members said. That is a sensible suggestion and the Government are sympathetic to it. The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk said, quite fairly, that there were differences of view on the sugar regime. Although it has been beneficial to many farmers, including those in my constituency in north Lincolnshire, there has been a downside to the sugar regime, particularly on the processing side. We have heard the views of other hon. Members who represent processing areas, especially where confectionery is involved, about the impact that a world price of sugar three times the average has on processing in this country.

It is important to remember that the existing regime is estimated to cost EU consumers and taxpayers nearly £5 billion a year, less than half of which is transferred as benefits to beet growers and processors, which is one of the problems with the common agricultural policy. The result is a welfare loss to the EU economy of about £3 billion a year. In the UK, the net annual economic cost is estimated to be more than £500 million. Therefore, although I do not dispute that there are potential impacts on the sugar beet sector, as is outlined in the regulatory impact assessment by the Cambridge university study that DEFRA commissioned, there is a balance to be struck. We must try to seek that balance, taking into account the impacts on the sugar beet industry and the growers, as well as on the wider economy and our aspirations.

The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk mentioned moving to a free market, which, as I said, will benefit our growers. He also mentioned biofuels, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood and the hon. Members for Wyre Forest (Dr. Taylor), for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard), for South-West Norfolk (Mr. Fraser), for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), for North-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Moss), for Brecon and Radnorshire (Mr. Williams) and for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson); a wide spread, which demonstrates the interest in the issue.

I am enthusiastic about biofuels. As the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk knows, we are in a climate change review, which is considering the various methods, policy options and economic tools that we can apply in this country to achieve our target, which is a 20 per cent. reduction of CO_2 by 2010. Biofuels feature in that review. Also, the Department for Transport is conducting a detailed review on the workings of a biofuel obligation. That report will be published in the not-too-distant future, and will guide and inform the overall climate change review, which will be published in November. We take the issue seriously and are considering the options.

Even with the reforms suggested, however, the price of sugar will still be twice the world average. That is probably not helpful to our sugar beet growers serving the biofuel industry, because they will be competing with ethanol, which will be entering the country at lower prices. It is important that we should have an infrastructure of processing and sales that will help our growers to enter that market, which I believe can be done. However, the risk of large-scale imports into this country remains, which is why I would say that, in answer to the questions about the study and the biofuels obligation, we must consider the implications. We would not want the obligation to be pitched at a level that would shut out our domestic market and allow imports to dominate. Things will be difficult enough as it is, but we want our producers to have a share of that market. That is part of the studies that are being conducted.

The hon. Member for Wyre Forest asked about the wider issue of CAP changes. He asked about planning, and we are certainly trying to address that in terms of diversification. He also mentioned problems with digital maps. We accept that there are problems and we are trying to resolve them as quickly as possible, as it is important for those applying for the new entry-level schemes.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin asked whether we were talking to British Sugar. I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have contact with the company at the highest level. He will understand that it is not for me tc say what will happen; the provision of factories and jobs are matters for British Sugar. Factory closures are not a new phenomenon in the sugar sector. Rationalisation has been going on for many years; for instance, it resulted in the loss of the factory at Brigg in my constituency. Those are commercial decisions for the company.

Mark Pritchard: I wonder whether the Minister feels that the proposals are more or less likely to lead to casualties and factory closures. If he thinks it more likely, will the sword be likely to come down on the east coast or the west coast?

Mr. Morley: As I said, that is a matter for the company, not the Government. They are commercial decisions.

The impact of reform on prices, too, is largely hypothetical. I return to the fact that reform that is open and transparent, and based on the efficiency of growers, should be in the UK's interests. That is what we want to pursue. Representations on the time scale are a matter for consideration, but the WTO has made a ruling on the sugar regime and we are under some obligation to deal with it. We want to deal with it in a way that is sustainable rather than impose a fix that might last only two or three years. If we did the latter, we would have to do it all over again; that would not be good for the industry either. It is far better that we address the issue properly.

Many hon. Members asked about compensation. It was rightly said that growers will be compensated by 60 per cent. of income. I might have misheard the hon. Member for North Shropshire, but I can tell him that the production levy will go. In some cases that can be 40 per cent. of the cost; it is a high proportion, and it will make a big difference. The proposal is that compensation will go into the single farm payments. It has not yet been decided how it will be structured, so we have the opportunity to take account of various factors. We will of course be listening to the industry and taking account of its views.

Several hon. Members, including the hon. Members for Ryedale and for North-East Cambridgeshire, spoke about Brazil. It is often said, wrongly, that the regime will not change the arrangements on tariff access for sugar from Brazil. I emphasise that the changes in the regime will not necessarily bring any more imports from Brazil, nor will they have further detrimental effects on what Brazil is doing in relation to its rain forests. The tariffs will not change.

An action plan will be put in place to assist ACP countries with the transition. However, even with the reforms, sugar will still be twice the world average price. For some countries—for instance, Swaziland has featured recently—sugar is still a big earner. There will still be opportunities for such countries. Indeed, the reforms will allow increased access for those who can take up the utilisation of other ACP countries that will be withdrawing from the scheme; that will give further opportunities.

Time does not allow me to answer all the points that were raised this morning, but I hope that I have dealt with the key issues. It is a timely debate. Much discussion and negotiation about the exact shape of the reform will take place under the EU presidency, and the knowledgeable and perfectly reasonable points that have been made will be taken into account in those negotiations.

Women and Pensions

11 am

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Since 1997 women's equality with men has improved by leaps and bounds. We have seen the introduction of the minimum wage, much improved maternity pay and longer leave, and flexible working and child care, and soon there will be a duty on public authorities to promote gender equality. That has been done in pursuit of a genuine commitment to fairness and gender equality, which is part of our Government's commitment to equalities as a whole. Those ideologically driven developments have established an economic and social matrix that is fairer and more equitable than it was. Pensions are now the last untackled gender inequality issue.

The state pension scheme is unfair to women. It treats women differently from and worse than men specifically because they are women. It is unbelievable that in the 21st century in the UK, after eight years of our own Labour Government, that highly discriminatory pension system left over from an earlier era still exists. It forces the majority of women, who constitute, of course, the majority of pensioners, to survive either on a dependency income of 60 per cent. of their husband's income, or on what they can get back if, despite the discrimination inherent in the system, they have managed to pay national insurance at some time during their lives, which are characteristically split between working and caring. The net consequence is that many women are in poverty.

It is excellent that pension credit has brought 1.3 million women pensioners out of poverty, but they were able to be brought out of poverty only because they were in it in the first place. Two thirds of pensioners are women, so we are discriminating against the majority of pensioners, because women's income in their pensionable years is two thirds that of men. One huge reason why that is so, and what I want to speak about today, is that whereas 92 per cent. of men retire with a full basic state pension, only 16 per cent. of women have a basic state pension in their own right.

That figure swells somewhat if we consider the dependency element. If a woman is widowed, she can replace her national insurance record with that of her husband. However, a woman who is divorced at the time she retires can replace her paltry NI record with her former husband's only for the years that she was married to him. A woman who is widowed and remarries loses the dependency benefit from her first husband and takes on only the NI credits of the second husband for as long as they are together. If a woman is never married, she gets nothing at all unless she managed to build up some sort of record of her own, but only 16 per cent. of women are able to do that.

That is one example of how the Beveridge system—the discriminatory system that I am talking about—has always been inequitable to women, assuming as it does a male breadwinner and female dependent carer. Entitlement is haphazardly linked to life events that are out of one's control. In today's modern society, that dependency model does not work, as the figures show. Many women are in poverty in retirement.

More women work now, but their working lives are far more complicated than those of men and the Beveridge model of a working person, which requires 44 years of unbroken full-time service—or very near to that—for a man and 39 for a woman does not fit women any better than the dependency model does. In fact, there is no model of modern pension provision in UK society that fits the patterns of women's lives. That is precisely why the current system is discriminatory.

In a recent article in The Guardian, Jackie Ashley stated the problem this way:

> "Women have . . . entered the labour market and are vigorously encouraged by politicians to do so. Yet they have rarely been callous enough to shrug off all their traditional caring roles, for children and elderly relatives, and so they tend to work shorter hours than men, and . . . for a mix of different employers, with catastrophic effects on their . . . pension entitlement."

These days women are carers and workers at the same time. An Equal Opportunities Commission poll earlier this year showed that four out of five people asked felt that carers should have the same state pension rights as if they had been in paid work throughout that period.

There has, of course, been an attempt to give credit to people—overwhelmingly women—who care for children. Home responsibilities protection was brought in by the late, great Barbara Castle in 1978. However, it is not a weekly credit that gives the equivalent of a stamp for every week that someone looks after a child. What it does is reduce by a year the number of years for which a person must work to qualify for a basic state pension. It works only for full years, so if someone with a child at home thinks that it is time that she tried out a job and works for a couple of weeks but does not like it, she might make NICs for those weeks, but the price is that she loses her HRP, because that works only in terms of a whole year. Similarly, if a woman goes back to work 10 months after having a baby, as people are urged to do, she might get some stamps for the couple of months left in the year for which she worked, but she does not get home responsibilities protection because she has not been not working for a whole year. The problem arises in all kinds of situations. Children often need transitional support, as when they are changing schools and so on, and women are frequently in and out of work. Often the net effect is that for many years they are theoretically covered by the credit, but in fact they are receiving little credit and paying some NICs but not enough.

If the child is ill or disabled, they need even more support and the woman's work pattern is likely to be even more fragmented. That brings me on to carers, not just of children but of older people. A quarter of women between the ages of 45 and 64 are carers and 90 per cent. of carers are women. There is something called carer's credit, but that, too, is imperfect. It works by being passported to the carer through disability living allowance, which is available only to a person who needs 35 hours of care a week. So the person being cared for gets the DLA if they need 35 hours care a week and then passports the carer through to get their carer's credit. But what if the disabled person needs 30 hours care a week, or 20 hours, or if, as is often the case, two sisters share the care of a disabled parent? What if there are two parents to care for and one woman moves between the two? What happens then is that she gets no carer's credit. If a woman does part-time caring and has a part-time job because—no matter how skilled she is—she is unable to do a full-time job because of her caring, or if she earns below the lower earnings limit, to which I will refer in a minute, she will not make a contribution to her pension through national insurance, she will not get a credit from the state because she is below the lower earnings limit, and she will not get carer's credit, despite the fact that it is the caring that prevents her from working full-time. Indeed, it does not matter if the woman is caring part-time and doing two part-time jobs because earnings cannot be aggregated to bring earnings above the lower earnings limit. So, even though she may be working far more than 35 hours a week, she will not be able to get a contribution to her pension.

Let me explain what I have just implied about the lower earnings limit. If a person works in a job that pays below the lower earnings limit, that person is not credited with a contribution and does not pay a contribution. The real hardship arises because, first, the limit is probably set too high and, secondly, if a person is working in two jobs, the earnings from both jobs cannot be aggregated to bring their earnings over the LEL. That is a common pattern, at least in Redcar: large numbers of women work on things such as school dinners while the kids are at school and then, when their partner comes home in the evening, they go out to work in a convenience store or a pub. Those women have two jobs and also care for the children. They are very much employed full-time but it is to the peril of the accrual of their pension contributions.

Jo Swinson (East Dunbartonshire) (LD): Given that the majority of carers in Britain are women and that carers save the UK economy £57 billion a year, does the hon. and learned Lady agree that it is a grave injustice that the contribution of carers, which is as valuable as paid employment, is not adequately recognised? That lack of recognition leaves many women pensioners in poverty because they have not had the opportunity to build up their pension contributions.

Vera Baird: I am grateful for that intervention, and I wholly agree with the hon. Lady.

Getting women full basic state pensions under the current system is extremely difficult. How can it be changed so that the full pension is obtained more frequently? There is a provision that states that contributions by an individual adding up to anything less than to 10 years' worth are simply not counted. A person can contribute for nine and a half years and get no pension whatever. How can that be made better?

I suppose that home responsibilities protection could be changed to a weekly credit, so that while a woman was caring for a child aged under 16 the credit would genuinely replace the contribution through national insurance that she would be paying if she worked. I suppose that the quarter or the 10 years could be counted, given that there is no reason to leave it out—it used to be said that it was difficult to add up such small amounts and that the effort was not merited. I suppose that the LEL could be lowered. What I say to the government is: will they do all three, please? And will they do so now, without prejudicing any future plans?

Solving the carers problem is much more difficult, as the examples I have given show. What is a carer? If I give my elderly mother a Sunday lunch and a couple of suppers a week to help her out, does that make me a carer? Probably not. On the other hand, if I give her a meal every night and I take her to the hospital a couple of times a week, does that make me a carer? It is difficult to find a way of getting better credits for carers, because of the difficulty of defining a carer.

The other problem with trying to improve credits so that more women can obtain a full basic state pension is that such a change would take effect from only now on. If we changed the credits today, it would be 39 years before a woman could accrue a full basic state pension on the same basis as a man, because she would be receiving credit weekly while she was working or caring. That is a long time—a couple of generations—to wait. Between 2010 and 2020, the pension age will be increased by a further five years, so women will have to wait 44 years before those changes come into effect and give them a fair crack of the whip.

The other side of that coin is that unless we change the system, when the change to the pension age is introduced between 2010 and 2020, women will have to go on for five more years before they can draw their measly pension, and they will have the same inadequate opportunities as they have now to put one together. At the latest, we must improve women's pension rights by the time that change occurs.

If it is difficult to see how to put the credits right, if it is necessary to do so retrospectively in order to be fair so that I and the other women present can benefit, and if it is difficult to see how we can possibly do that for carers, what do we do? If we decide to credit in the men and women who are carers and the people—overwhelmingly women—who care for children, as the public think we should, who do we decide to leave out of the group who receive a basic state pension? Although I appreciate that the contributory system is well respected and highly thought of, should we get away from the contribution system as the basis of pension eligibility and instead consider some sort of universality?

I pay tribute to the pension credit for having helped 1.3 million women, but it helped them because they were poor. There are even problems with that system for women, however. First, it is means-tested, and women who have worked their whole lives, or who have been in and out of working and caring, should not need to be means-tested. Secondly, the pension credit is unfair to savers. As people know, if somebody receives a full basic state pension and has £20 a week income from other savings, they are allowed the pension credit up to £109 a week; however, they receive the pension credit from £79 of the basic state pension right up to £109, and therefore lose the benefit of their savings, because that amount is paid to them through the pension credit and they would receive the same amount even if they did not have their savings capital. In addition, there is a taper, so that all savings above the basic state pension level are kept in some proportion that tapers away but that does not happen to savings below that level. If I, a typical woman, have 70 per cent. of the basic state pension—about £50—and have the same £20 a week from some other income that I manage to scrape together despite my hardship, I will rightly and properly be paid from my £50 right up to the pension credit level, which will be welcome, but I will lose the entire benefit of my £20 savings income because the taper does not work until savings are above basic state pension level, so they just disappear. That is a final injustice.

[Vera Baird]

A further point is that people are starting to appreciate more widely that pension credit cannot go on for ever. More and more people will get it because it is, commendably, earnings linked, whereas the basic state pension and many private pension pots are not. Therefore, more people will be drawn into means-tested benefits—probably a distortion—and the way forward is likely to be seen to be some sort of shift to improve the basic state pension. However, unless the availability of the basic state pension is broadened to include the women of whom I speak, that will be of no use to them.

If the Tories had won the last election, they would have index-linked the basic state pension to get people out of pension credit, but they would not have index-linked the pension credit; they would have linked that only to the cost of living, which would have meant that women, who are far and away the major recipients of pension credit, would become poorer and poorer for want of that basic state pension. The BSP is the foundation on which to build whole retirement provision. It is the only way in which realistically to redistribute income to pensioners and is the only clear route to obtaining pension coverage for time spent out of paid employment to raise children and care for others.

The situation that I have outlined in a most skeletal, but accurate, way is what drove the last Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West and Hessle (Alan Johnson), to accept that a report on women and pensions should be produced this year. He accepted that the present system is utterly incompatible with the new duty on public authorities to promote gender equality. How can these discriminatory pension structures possibly survive that? My right hon. Friend described the situation in respect of women and pensions a national disgrace. When and how will the Government rectify that national disgrace?

11.18 am

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): It is customary to congratulate the hon. Member who secures a debate on their sterling work in doing so, which I find a little absurd, but I have something more important to say, which is that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) has done us a great service by raising this important issue, because now is the right time to debate women's pensions.

My hon. and learned Friend gave a comprehensive account of an extremely technical issue. Sometimes when discussing pensions we become so frustrated by the necessary use of statistics and technical jargon that we lose sight of the real importance of the debate. The reality is simple: we are talking about poverty among older people in our society—people who by definition are not in a position to change their income structures or to establish new pension rights, and who are often unable to continue to support themselves through the normal means of work because such opportunities have disappeared as age, and sometimes health, dictate that the world of work is no longer accessible to them.

Some of the figures are frightening, such as that one in four single women pensioners now live in poverty. That is a disgrace to modern Britain and a national scandal. Women's retirement income is, in round terms, only half that of men. That is such an enormous disparity in our society that it makes even figures about the pay differential seem almost trivial—although I do not want to trivialise the gap between men and women's pay. Pensions show an enormous gap, which we need to begin to do something serious about.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that poverty among women pensioners is strongly linked to the inequitable treatment of women in the workplace? In full-time work women earn 82 per cent. of what men earn, and in part-time work that figure is 60 per cent. In her working life, a woman of average skills will earn £240,000 less than a typical man. That figure rises to £380,000 if she has two children during that period. Pensioner poverty starts in the workplace.

Tony Lloyd: My hon. Friend is right. In fact, he invites me to move immediately on to a subject about which I would have said a little later. In the end, one of the fundamentals of eroding the pensions differential is eroding the pay differential and making sure that future generations benefit from equal pay and proper equalisation of the opportunity to provide for pensions. As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar has already clearly pointed out, even if we do something now, it will take 40 years for the effect to be seen. We have to do something not only about the pay differential, but about existing pensions and the people who have been in the pension system throughout their working or caring lives.

My hon. and learned Friend made an interesting point about the role of women throughout their adult years. The traditional view of the role of women has changed enormously in modern society. I say with all charity to my hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions Reform that one of the difficulties of plotting out how to resolve the problem is that we are dealing with people whose lifestyles over a period of 40 years have become increasingly complicated. No longer do we have the stereotypical housewife who stays at home looking after the kids, or perhaps looking after elderly relatives, but neither do we have the brave new world of the total career woman. Neither exist. The reality in Manchester, Central, as in Redcar, is that many of my constituents have lifestyles that are much more complicated. At least one friend of mine is a double carer, who cares for two different relatives and tries to do some part-time work. She falls foul of all the rules—the lower earnings limit and the 35 hours caring threshold—because such things are not cumulative. A serious attempt to join up people's contributions in life would consider people who care but do not hit the requisite number of hours. It would acknowledge that people who work in more than one job are not untypical, particularly in the more socially deprived parts of modern Britain. If we could make some efforts in that respect, we could make a significant and material difference to the incomes, and therefore the lifestyles, of many of our fellow citizens.

My hon. and learned Friend has set out the subject well. We know the historical causes of women's pensions being significantly lower than men's—they are fairly well documented and include low pay, worse access to the labour market and occupational pension schemes, and less time in the sort of work that earns pension entitlement. Those things will not go away. Women will not stop being carers, and although we should be trying to make real progress, we are not going to solve the pay differential or give equal access to the labour market overnight. However, it would be dishonest to say that we have to wait for those problems to resolve themselves before we deal properly with pensions. We need pragmatism and early hits in pension entitlement.

I notice that the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions has begun to discuss the matter in a speech that he is making elsewhere today. I do not want to pre-empt the Minister's speech, so I will allow him to say what the Secretary of State has said, but I applaud the fact that the Secretary of State is now taking a real interest in the matter. It is important that the subject be considered at the very top of the political system, but I urge the Government to deal with it now.

Pension equalisation is long overdue. It will take a long time to achieve it, but we must regard it as a national priority. It is a scandal that so many people who have contributed to our society for many years and who are emotionally and rationally valuable to our political systems live in poverty. We have practically abandoned them because of the incompetence of our pension regimes in the past. We must deal with the situation now. We have the opportunity to do so. The political space exists, as does the Government's interest. If we do not ensure that women and pensions are an integral part of the pension changes on which the Government are consulting, we will miss an opportunity to resolve the issue in this era and for a long time to come.

This debate is very welcome, because it shines a bright light on an area that we must bring into sharp focus in political debate. If we do not do that, we are abandoning the people in constituencies such as mine and that of my hon. and learned Friend who have never had access to the labour market and who have therefore not had access to the proper pensions that they should have.

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West) (Lab): I wholeheartedly associate myself with the remarks made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) when she introduced the debate. She set out very clearly the scale of the problem and the huge inequality in pension provision for current women pensioners, which is likely to be pretty similar for women who are now over 50 and are therefore likely to be pensioners within the next 15 years.

I shall not repeat the points made by my hon. and learned Friend, but shall instead highlight the fact that the problem will continue for women who are currently aged under 50. The Government seem to believe that, although there is a problem for current women pensioners and for women over 50, the changes occurring in the labour market will mean that the problem will gradually diminish as women gain better access to the labour market. The Department for Work and Pensions working party report of December 2002 said:

"Much of the improvement in the pension position of future female pensions will come from labour market improvements".

I do not want to downplay the effect of the changes introduced by the Government to improve equality for women. The equal pay legislation, the outlawing of discrimination against women, the increased provision for maternity leave and maternity allowance, and the whole emphasis on improving child care provision, which helps parents—notably women, but not exclusively so—have all helped women to balance their working and domestic commitments better.

All those things are incredibly important, and they are likely to mean that the gap in male and female earnings, which is still large, should improve in time. Even with all those changes, however, I do not believe that the gap between male and female earnings will be closed in the foreseeable future. That is because caring responsibilities, although they are now shared between men and women more than they were in the past, are not shared equally; nor are they ever likely to be. Caring responsibilities are the major contributor to the fact that women's earnings are less than those of men.

Women in full-time work also earn less than men. The figure that I have is 75 per cent., although my hon. and learned Friend had a higher figure. We will not argue about the precise numbers, however, because we both agree that women in full-time work earn less than men in full-time work. One contributory factor is that women who take time out to have children are disadvantaged when they return to work. They tend to have poorer promotion prospects than men because their working career is shorter and they often take time out at crucial points in their career, when their male counterparts are just beginning to mount the promotion ladder. Women who take time out therefore find it difficult to get back in again.

Another major factor in reducing women's earnings is that 45 per cent. of women in work are part-time. Notwithstanding the greater protection that part-time workers have been given, part-time working tends to reduce promotion prospects. Obviously, those who work part-time also earn less than somebody who works full-time, even if they are paid the same hourly rate.

Women are concentrated in part-time employment partly because girls are still not attaining the same level of achievement as boys and are therefore unable to access work for those who are well qualified. I hope that we shall be able to alter that over time.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I agree with everything that the hon. Lady says about the pay gap, but does she accept that part of the problem is that women's job pathways are different? Women tend to go into the caring professions, shop work and jobs that are less well paid, whereas men may go into manufacturing and engineering. Something needs to be done to encourage young women to enter sectors of the workplace that are not traditionally regarded as female.

Dr. Starkey: I agree. The jobs in which women are over-represented do indeed tend to be less valued and lower paid. There is a whole agenda about encouraging girls to think ahead and to take the right choices at school and post-school to enable themselves to gain well paid employment.

That is one aspect of part-time work, but there is another. It is a tremendous strain to balance caring responsibilities with a full-time job, so many women—it is largely women who do this—choose to accommodate their carer's role by taking part-time work that fits around it, thereby trapping themselves in a situation in which they earn less money.

Let me quote again from a DWP document. The Department recently conducted an analysis of women's attitudes to pensions, which shows:

"There is some evidence of a cultural shift over time. Younger . . . women . . . seemed more likely to value a degree of financial independence. They recognised that many partnerships do not endure."

Marriage breakdown is important in explaining why women often finish up with lower pensions. They rely on their male partner to provide the pension for both of them, but the relationship then breaks down, and they are left with no pension or with a very diminished one.

The document goes on to say that women feel that it is important for them to make pension provision in their own right. However, elements of traditional gender roles and financial dependency persist in the lives of many young women, particularly those who are married or who have children. It notes that "the effects of changing values and expectations are often diluted by other factors. This tends to perpetuate the pension gap."

The DWP is therefore well aware of the fact that younger women still tend to put their caring responsibilities, or their potential caring responsibilities, ahead of making proper provision for a pension for themselves in their own right.

Tony Lloyd: Does my hon. Friend agree that our society benefits enormously when people make those choices, so that we must not create an incentive not to be carers? We need to ensure that carers are offered proper protection by the rest of society.

Dr. Starkey: I agree absolutely, and that takes me to my next point. I agree with all the suggestions that have been made about ways in which pension provision can properly recognise and compensate for the caring contribution. I want the Government to do all that has been suggested and to ensure that the system is as effective and comprehensive as possible.

Without a future Government becoming incredibly intrusive into the detail of people's lives, and women's lives in particular, it will never be possible to devise a credit system that will fully compensate for women's caring responsibilities. To take an example like the ones cited by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar, what of a woman who, for example, picks up her grandchildren from school at the end of the school day, looks after them for an hour or so and gives them their supper before their parents pick them up for the evening, and looks after parents and parents-in-law, making sure that they are safe, visiting them several times a week, and taking them to hospital or on other journeys?

That sort of caring responsibility is a mix of relatively small individual caring responsibilities, but they add up to a quite big caring responsibility. I do not see how any credit system could adequately match the flexible and changing responsibilities that that woman might have, which would have influenced her in her decision to work not full-time but part-time. That is why we should support the model for future pension provision that has been put forward by a group of organisations fronted by the Equal Opportunities Commission and including Age Concern and the TUC.

The suggestion is that there must be a common entitlement to a basic pension for every individual, regardless of household circumstances, which is not based on a contribution record through the national insurance system. Some residence qualification is obviously necessary, but over and above that the entitlement should be available to everyone regardless of circumstances. That should be backed up by a flexible state second pension that would encourage everyone to accumulate additional entitlement, with a private or occupational pension or savings. That is the model that seems to me best to match the extreme complexity and flexibility of a woman's working life.

I shall say something briefly about occupational pensions. Because women in work tend to earn less and because they have an interrupted work record, they also tend to have a much poorer occupational pension in their own right than a man does. In particular, there is a tendency for their earnings to drop more than a man's earnings as they approach retirement age; a woman's responsibility for her children tends to lessen at that time—although as a parent of adult children I note that they seem to call on one's time, and indeed finances, considerably—but other caring responsibilities, for elderly relatives, increase as a woman reaches retirement age. As a result, the proportion of women over 50 in full-time employment is smaller than the proportion of young women in that category.

Those circumstances affect contributions to women's occupational pension schemes. That is why—although I know that the suggestion is divisive and many people find it threatening—we need to move away from final salary pension schemes. Such schemes favour men, who are more likely than women to have continuous employment records and to have been promoted to higher levels by the time they near retirement. Occupational pension schemes that take into account lifetime earnings rather than just earnings as a person nears retirement are likely to be more favourable to women and need to be considered.

I, too, welcome the debate. The Government seem to be getting the message, and I look forward to receiving further good news from the Minister, and to hearing that the needs of female pensioners will be fully considered when pensions are reviewed.

11.40 am

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): I, too, pay tribute to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), whose wealth of knowledge on pensions is far beyond anything that I might purport to have. She has revealed the inequalities in the present pension system and shown how difficult it is for women to qualify for a full state pension. She has detailed knowledge of how unfair the credits system can be and of the difficulties faced by women with a variety of working patterns. She set out clearly, for us and for the Government, what needs to be done.

I do not think that any Labour Member is critical of the pension credit. It is an important measure that has lifted 1.3 million women out of poverty and has made a huge difference to people's lives. I am sure that, like me, hon. Members found during the general election campaign that women pensioners were delighted with what the Government had done for them. On more than one occasion, women said to me that they had never been so well off in their lives. The fact that they are feeling well off on £109 per week plus housing benefit and council tax benefit reflects how badly off they were during their working lives. None the less, the pension credit has done the business for women who had been almost completely left out of the pension system.

David Taylor: I too encountered good numbers of women during the general election campaign who said just that. However, that could be merely anecdotal evidence. Exit polls showed that, sadly, the greatest loss in our party's support was among women aged over 55. There is a discrepancy, is there not?

Miss Begg: I have not looked at the figures for my constituency, where there are many middle-class women who did not benefit from the pension credit because of the dependency model of the basic state pension—many of them were doing all right because they had inherited their husbands' contributions and were therefore better-off widows. However, in working-class areas, particularly among those living in sheltered housing complexes, most of the women felt that the Government had done a great deal for them and they came out to vote Labour with great enthusiasm. The fact that I am here is a tribute to that. I have a marginal seat and had they not done so, I would not have won it.

The debate is not about criticising what the Government have done: they had to take action in the short term if they were to fulfil their promise to end pensioner poverty, and the savings element of the pension credit has had a huge impact. The debate is about looking forward. How do we ensure, as we move through the 21st century, that the state pension system and the occupational and private pension systems are fit for their purpose? How do we begin to tackle the inequalities of the last century that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar so ably laid out?

I accept the point made by my hon. Friends the Members for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) and for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey). The Government say that things will get better as more women work, and work longer hours—that that will somehow fill the gap and solve the problem—but it will not. Women who work do so for less pay than men and they generally work fewer hours and in lower-skilled jobs than men.

Aberdeen happens to have the largest gender pay gap in Scotland and one of the largest in the United Kingdom. In Aberdeen, women's earnings are 60 per cent. of those of their male counterparts. There are two reasons for that. First, our work is dominated by the oil industry, a high-paying industry with jobs in the offshore sector filled predominantly by men. Secondly, we have a large number of people in work—a large gender pay gap tends to coincide with high employment rates. We have high employment in Aberdeen, but women generally work in the service industries—in the caring sector and in companies that service the oil industry, often cleaning or similar work. A large gender pay gap is therefore inevitable, and when the women retire it will inevitably translate into a pensions gap.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West said that many women have different work patterns from their male counterparts simply because that is how they choose to live their lives. We have made huge strides forward in equality and women have the chance to compete equally in the jobs market, but despite 30 or 40 years of feminism women are still under pressure. Women cannot always choose how to live their lives. They still bear the burden of the caring responsibilities, both within and outwith the home, and I doubt that that will change. If it was going to change dramatically, it would already have done so.

Jackie Ashley, whom my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar quoted, pointed out the fact that although women now expect to have full-time jobs, they still have caring responsibilities. Unfortunately their male partners do not always take the equality agenda as seriously and shoulder the full burden of care and responsibility. They might pick the kids up from school from time to time or do the washing occasionally, but in most partnerships it is predominantly the woman who does those jobs. Women are trying to juggle lots of different balls to ensure that they are both earning and fulfilling those responsibilities.

We face a demographic time bomb not only in this country but across the whole western world, because people are living longer. As a result, the caring responsibilities of women are changing. Once, a woman might have cared for the children, then gone to work, and then cared for an elderly relative for a few years, but elderly relatives now live 20 years or more longer. It is interesting to note that the women who turn 60 this year are the first of the baby-boomer generation to reach retirement age. Looking forward, they can see their elderly relatives, who are now in their 80s, having difficulty accessing care from outwith the family structure. They are especially concerned about the quality of the care homes that their elderly relatives are in and they are determined that that will not happen to them, but at the same time they are looking back to their daughters, who, like them, have been caught in the trap of not being able to build up enough credits and who will be unable to build up a full entitlement to the basic state pension. Beyond that, those baby-boomer women might also be considering their grandchildren—perhaps picking them up from school and undertaking other caring responsibilities. In that way, three generations of caring fall on to one generation of women, who are reaching their 60s. That burden will not ease as more women go into work and as people, particularly women, live longer.

We have a chance to change things. The debate is timely—the Turner commission will report later this year. The Government should now consider the shape of the pensions industry, both state and private, to find the best model to take us through the next 50 years. The Beveridge model has done us well, but it was a model of its time. It was right in 1950, but is not right for 2005 and it will not be right for 2050. Society has changed, as has the way in which people live, particularly women, who no longer expect to be dependent on a husband, partner or other person for the whole of their lives, as may have been the case when Beveridge set up the original state pension system. We are looking for a new Beveridge model: something as imaginative and forward-reaching as that model was, which will take into account how our lives have changed.

It is important that we get away from the dependency model. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar was absolutely right about pension credits and how they could be made more flexible. With such a complex system, the question at the end of it is: who do we leave out? Today, we think that no one should be left out, which means that the only answer is that the basic state pension should be universal, but not in the way in which the citizen's pension proposed by a number of people is universal, because that proposal does not get away from the dependency model.

The Government have the chance to be much more radical and forward looking. Rather than tinker with the pension system to solve inequalities, as we have done up till now, we need to create something fundamentally different. They should certainly consider the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West about building up a second pension and the universal nature of the basic state pension. It is only by being that radical and visionary that we can end once and for all the inequalities that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar so amply illustrated.

11.53 am

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): As is customary, I congratulate the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on securing the debate and on her recent promotion. I had feared that her wings would be clipped and that it was a ploy of the Government Whips, but I am delighted to see that she is in as fine form as ever. I am also delighted that the subject of women and pensions is up for discussion.

The hon. and learned Lady mentioned Jackie Ashley's excellent article, in which she writes:

"To illustrate the issue, the campaigners"—

a couple of whom are present here today—

"cite a couple, Jim and Kathy, both aged 50; he is a gas fitter and she works part-time at Debenhams and part-time in a newsagent's, as well as caring for relatives, though they have no children. As things stand: 'Jim works 40 hours a week and will be comfortable; Kathy works 60 hours a week and will be penniless. What did she do wrong?'"

That is an unanswerable question.

People are beginning to acknowledge that there are inequalities in the pension system in relation to women. The previous Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West and Hessle (Alan Johnson), seemed to be aware of the problem and committed to tackling it. In some ways, I am disappointed that he has moved on. He said to the Work and Pensions Committee:

"My enthusiasm has not waned for tackling a real and substantial problem which is that women's pensions are ... a national scandal".

I hope that now that he has moved to the Department of Trade and Industry he will be able to address some of the problems mentioned today—the pay gap and the nature of women's work—which feed into the pensions problem.

Adair Turner produced a welcome chapter on women's pensions in his recent report. Although it was a sound analysis of the problem, there were disappointingly few realistic or positive suggestions on how the problems could be addressed. Perhaps we will see more in future.

The reality of the present position has been outlined by hon. Members and the facts are stark. One in five single women face poverty in retirement; many women have no occupational pension; half receive less than the full basic state pension; and, on average, for every pound received by a man in a pensioner couple, the woman receives just 34p. The Government have made welcome efforts to address the problem, but the take-up of the minimum income guarantee and pension credit is not good. Government figures show that in 2002–03 as many as 550,000 single female pensioners were below the poverty line because they did not claim the minimum income guarantee. I will return to that point later.

The reasons that women lose out have been highlighted. It is worth remembering that the pension system was designed in the 1940s, when women's lives were very different: by and large, they did not work, they did not divorce and there was an assumption that they would be looked after by a man. Life is different today, and it seems obvious that we need a different pension system to reflect that. Another problem is that child care and other caring responsibilities are not recognised by the current system. The pay gap has also been mentioned: the average woman earns £241,000 less over her lifetime than a man in an equivalent job—provided that she does not have children. If she has two children, her earnings decrease by a further £140,000. If women work, they often work in low-paid sectors, where it is not common to have access to occupational pensions. Finally, older pensioners are poorer and more likely to be female.

We have to approach the problem in two ways. First, what can be done in the short term to help women who have retired or are close to retirement to maximise their income? That is a sticking-plaster solution, however, and we need to think more about whether we have to change the system for the long term.

We have mentioned the low uptake of benefits. Quite simply, means-testing is incredibly unpopular. If we are stuck with that situation, more has to be done to encourage pensioners to take up the benefits to which they are entitled. The big problem is that they do not. I am aware that pensions advisers are spending a lot of time on the phone, ringing people up and trying to make sure that they are claiming their benefits. However, not everybody is on the phone—it is an expense that some cannot afford. Recently, local pensions advisers have been prevented from going out into the community, from talking to groups in sheltered housing schemes or other pensioner groups, and reaching other people in that way. It seems to me that although hitting the phones may be effective to an extent, the women—and men—in the greatest poverty are probably not being reached.

Miss Begg: Will the hon. Lady pay tribute to the Pension Service in Aberdeen, which has been doing as the hon. Lady suggests? Advisers have been going into communities to contact the hardest-to-reach pensioners, with some success.

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Lady has described what should be happening. I am surprised that it still happens in Aberdeen, given that the people who were doing it in Romsey have been stopped because of cuts in the DWP work force. I should be interested to know whether it is still being done, because the Romsey changes were made a few months ago and were quite unpopular with those who had to put them into practice. It might be a local decision, although I understood that it was national; perhaps the Minister can clarify that.

For the current generation of women the married woman's stamp is another problem, which has not been mentioned today. Many women say that they were unaware when they opted for it that it could significantly affect their personal pension entitlement. The Government must inform all women who pay the stamp of its implications and allow a longer period in which to pay fuller contributions so that women will have a pension in their own right.

Carers' credits have been mentioned. We can talk at length about systems of carers' credits, reducing the number of years' contributions that are required if someone is to benefit from a pension, or even reconsidering the lower earnings level. However, those are all sticking-plaster solutions that will help pensioners in the short term but will not tackle the fundamental problems. For the future we need a pension that takes account of caring responsibilities and values them. We need a pension that takes account of gaps in employment, helps to tackle the inequalities caused by women's lower pay and—keeping in mind the 1940s system—takes account of the reduced reliance on the man as provider.

During the general election the Liberal Democrats proposed a citizen's pension system. While I was listening to the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) I realised that she was talking about something not too dissimilar to Liberal Democrat policy. A consensus seems to be growing that an entitlement to a pension in one's own right, based on residency rather than national insurance contributions, is the fairest way to go, and should be considered.

Miss Begg: I understood that the Liberal Democrats' proposal for a citizen's pension still contained a dependency element: it proposed one pension for a single person and one for a married couple. On our side of the argument we see that dependency model as the old model, which we should be getting away from.

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Lady is right about the difference between the single person's and married person's pensions, but our philosophy was to take one step at a time. Entitlement was the first step. Personally, although I cannot speak for the rest of the party, I would support something without the dependency element. If we bear in mind the fact that fewer women are now marrying and the divorce rate is higher, that may become less of a consideration over the years. Nevertheless, it is still a consideration now.

The advantages of a universal entitlement or a citizen's pension include recognition that child care and other caring responsibilities are just as valuable to society as paid work. Many of the caring behaviours that people adopt save the state significant amounts of money and it seems perverse to penalise rather than recognise people who willingly and voluntarily look after their loved ones. If the system provided a universal entitlement, there would be no need for complicated carers' credits. That would also eliminate the need for means tests, which are unpopular and degrading. Even if the citizen's pension were introduced at the age of 75, as highlighted in the Liberal Democrat manifesto, 2.8 million women would benefit.

To sum up, the 1940s system is out of date and needs reviewing. Ministers have hinted that the problem should be examined and that some sort of citizen's pension or universal entitlement is the way to go. I hope that the Minister for Pensions Reform can reassure us on that point.

12.5 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne) (Con): It is a great pleasure to take part in the debate, which is the latest in a series called by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). I congratulate her on securing this debate and the several previous ones. She has been a doughty and persuasive campaigner on women's issues, particularly women's pensions, so it must be all the more disappointing to her that the Government have made so little progress on the subject. Indeed, the Minister had better be careful, because I am not sure that I did not detect in her final comments a veiled threat to sue the Government over the apparent problems of gender discrimination inherent in the present system.

We all accept that the system was designed for a very different era. It was not some Tory plot prior to 1997 to do down women pensioners; it was, as the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) said, a system that was designed in and for the 1940s to accommodate the social systems that were in place at that time.

In her excellent opening speech, the hon. and learned Member for Redcar spoke to some extent about pension credit. As the hon. Member for Romsey said, there must be a high proportion of women among the 1.5 million or so people who are eligible for pension credit but who do not yet claim it. That, of course, is the great problem with a means-tested system. I think that we can all agree with the previous Secretary of State for Work and Pensions—now the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—and many others who have said that this is one of the great untackled inequities in the pensions system. As I said, its causes are historical, but that does not make it defensible.

Like the hon. and learned Member for Redcar, I was present at the launch some time ago of a report called "One in Four", which was produced jointly by Age Concern and the Fawcett Society. The report makes clear the problems of the many women who are forced by their lack of pension provision to live in poverty. I shall not rehearse the statistics and the facts, because that has been done very ably and comprehensively already, but the report does cover several cases, including that of Christine Dunn, who is one of my constituents. She tells of how she worked for the NHS for many years, before taking a break to bring up her children. She then had all sorts of problems with her pension provision, but she is one of the many women who have worked their way out of the problem to a large extent. Aged 40, she went on to retrain as a teacher at her own expense and she has now built up an adequate second pension. She says:

"With such a measly state pension to look forward to, this has been an absolute life-saver."

It is fair to say that significant numbers of women in that situation have been able to requalify and develop their own occupational pension in later life, but far from all women—indeed, far from most women—have been able to do so.

It is interesting, if not slightly amazing, that we debated an enormous piece of pensions legislation at great length last year, but that nothing in the Pensions Act 2004 really began to tackle the issues that we are debating. That gives us an interesting take on the Government's priorities. The hon. and learned Member for Redcar referred, rightly as always, to the concession that was wrung out of Ministers in Committee for the Department to produce an annual report on women and pensions. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us when the first of those much-foreshadowed reports will hit the streets. It is also worth recalling that it was the hon. and learned Lady's amendment, supported by my hon. Friends and me, that forced the Government to make that concession: it had not been their intention to produce such a report.

I am proud and pleased that my party went into the general election with some thought through policies on how to better the lot of women pensioners. We do not need to jettison the contributory principle to deal with the patent inequity of women's pensions. We have heard a lot about the citizen's pension or the universal pension. One of the problems with that, apart from the difficulties of making it work, let alone paying for it, is that people often talk rather glibly about it, but each of them means something different by it. I do not know what happened in Romsey, but I am pleased to say that when I explained to my constituents in Eastbourne during the election campaign that the Liberal Democrats wanted to junk the contributory principle, I found that that was not a popular policy—albeit not quite as unpopular as local income tax. It was not popular because people have an affection for the contributory principle. How often have people come to our surgeries and said, "I have paid my stamp but I cannot get this or that"? We believe that there are more targeted ways of dealing with the issue.

Had we won the election, we would now be doing four things. First, we would abolish the 10-year rule on national insurance contributions. Secondly, we would offer better pensions to those who take time out of the labour market—predominantly women, as we have said—via a much more flexible weekly credit. The present system, as all speakers have said, is inflexible and unfair. Thirdly, we would make it easier for people to buy back the years when they failed to make national insurance contributions. It is interesting that the Government's new rules on private pension saving are much more flexible than those that apply to the state pension and its entitlement. Finally, we would lower the bar for state pension rights, currently £79 a week, to give access to a state pension to people on very low earnings, such as those on £60 to £79 a week.

All those are practical, common-sense and targeted ways of dealing with the problems that have been described in this debate. We do not need to throw out the entire contributory system to tackle the unfairness.

Dr. Starkey: I accept the advantage of a weekly credit rather than the yearly version of home responsibility protection, but does the hon. Gentleman not accept that it would be impossible to make even a weekly credit respond to mixed caring responsibilities such as those that I described for my hypothetical grandmother with elderly parents? That would involve the sort of intrusiveness that I suspect the Conservative party would oppose most strongly.

Mr. Waterson: The hon. Lady is absolutely right that we are opposed to the intrusiveness of, for example, means-testing—we would like that trend to be reversed. She makes a good practical point. Whoever is in power if and when the matter is addressed will also have to address the issue of cost. I have seen it estimated that people who voluntarily care for members of their families save the Treasury up to £60 billion a year. There would have to be a definition of what constitutes caring. At least the flexibility of a weekly credit would be a step forward.

In conclusion, I would urge all interested and committed right hon. and hon. Members to sign early-day motion 544, which my colleagues and I have tabled on the issue of women's and carers' pensions. It makes many of the points that I have made today, and expresses dismay at the lack of Government commitment to dealing with the issue in the Pensions Act 2004 or subsequently. It also recognises that we do not have to lose the contributory principle in order to deal with the issue, and calls on Ministers—particularly the Minister for Pensions Reform—to consider the plight of poorer female pensioners when considering further reforms to the state and private pensions systems.

12.15 pm

The Minister for Pensions Reform (Mr. Stephen Timms): I too begin by congratulating my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on securing this debate and on the consistent way in which in recent months she has led a sustained campaign to improve pension provision for women. The campaign in Parliament has been important in building the wider concern that has been reflected in this debate, and it is playing a prominent part in the national debate to consider the kind of pensions that will be needed in future.

Women pensioners are significantly more likely than male pensioners to be living in poverty. A number of speakers have pointed out the reasons for that, which include time taken out of the labour market, conditions in the labour market, the greater incidence of part-time work among women, straightforward discrimination in conditions and more varied patterns of working. All of those provide challenges that we need to address.

This morning I met the chief executive of the Pensions Advisory Service. He told me about the women and pensions helpline set up in November and December last year. It received 8,000 calls, and seven out of 10 of those callers were not making any private pension savings. A lot of callers had queries about the reduced rate married woman's national insurance contribution, to which the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) referred, and many were confused and uncertain about the value of home responsibilities protection, which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar mentioned. It is important to address all of those issues in this debate.

I shall outline action that has been taken to address some of the problems. They have certainly not been ignored, as the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) suggests—as well as the action that we want to take to make further progress.

When we came to office, our priority was to tackle the bad legacy of inequality for today's female pensioners highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd). The introduction of pension credit has particularly helped women. I had the same experience as my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Miss Begg) during the general election campaign when speaking to women who had been helped substantially by the introduction of that measure. Two thirds of the recipients of pension credit—2.18 million people in all—are women. There is more work to be done to increase take-up, although that has risen dramatically in the past year as a result of the kind of initiative that my hon. Friend described. The latest estimates indicate that up to 90 per cent. of single women pensioners entitled to the guarantee element of the credit now receive it. A smaller proportion receives the savings credit, and we need to do more to further increase take-up. There is no doubt that the majority of those who stand to benefit most from pension credit are now doing so.

The hon. Member for Romsey referred to some local difficulties. I shall be happy to write to her about what is happening in her area. In my experience around the country, joint teams of Pensions Agency and local authority staff have been very active in encouraging pension credit take-up, as is happening in Aberdeen. Alongside measures such as winter fuel payments and the tax and benefits changes, the pension credit has lifted 1.3 million women pensioners out of absolute poverty since 1997. As a result of the changes, pensioner households will, on average, be £1,500 better off this year than they would have been under the 1997 system and the least well-off third will be an average of £2,000 better off. That is an achievement that we can all welcome.

We have also taken steps to tackle the underlying causes of pensioner inequality and poverty. As we heard, when the state pension system was established in the 1940s, those with caring responsibilities were inherently disadvantaged. That is why, when she was Secretary of State for Social Services, the late Barbara Castle took the initiative to introduce home responsibility protection in 1978. I note the advantages, to which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar drew attention, of a flexible credit system rather than the present inflexible form of home responsibility protection. Other Members touched on that as well. It is a point that we need to consider carefully as we look at the future shape of the system. I assure my hon. and learned Friend that a woman will not lose HRP if she does a few weeks work in a year. If she is entitled to child benefit for the full year, she will benefit from HRP if she does not otherwise have a qualifying year through contributions or credits. The difficulty with HRP is that the year in which the child is born is typically not covered by HRP. There are other inflexibilities as well.

In introducing the state second pension, we have, for the first time, given carers the ability to develop rights to a second pension in the state system. That is a significant improvement. Nearly all the 1.9 million carers being helped by the state second pension are women, as are two thirds of the 5.8 million low earners. The state second pension means that the proportion of women who accrue significant state second pension entitlement is similar to the proportion of men who do so.

We have also taken steps to help parents to balance work and family life, including the working tax credit, child tax credit and increased access to affordable and good-quality child care. Couples with children are now able to claim the 30-hour element of the working tax credit if they jointly work 30 hours or more. That makes it easier for families to share work as best suits them. It also means that women are more likely to have the option of going to work and accruing a pension than used to be the case.

As we heard, women have tended to be in lower-paid jobs than men. One of the disadvantages of that is that state pension rights may not be accrued under a threshold level of income. We have addressed that problem in two ways. First, the introduction of the national minimum wage has benefited more than 1 million people, of whom 70 per cent. are women. The Low Pay Commission estimates that that has had the biggest impact on increasing women's pay of any measure since the Equal Pay Act 1970. Secondly, the separation of the lower earnings limit from the primary threshold level means that low earners can start to accrue state pension rights at a lower income than that at which they start paying national insurance contributions. That has been an improvement.

Women are also more likely to be in part-time work than are men. The Part-time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations 2000 and the Part-time Workers (Prevention of Less Favourable Treatment) Regulations 2000 (Amendment) Regulations 2002 ensure that 6 million workers, the majority of them women, are not treated less favourably than comparable full-timers in their terms and conditions, including access to occupational pension schemes. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central made an interesting point about aggregating different part-time streams of income that are earned concurrently. I imagine that that would be difficult, but it is an interesting point that we should consider to see whether we can help more people.

Tony Lloyd: My hon. Friend is trying to be helpful. Does he take on board the associated points about the needs of carers who are part-time workers in more than one job and who fall foul of the present threshold on carers' hours?

Mr. Timms: There are a range of issues relating to carers that require thought and reflection in the context of the debate. We have established the women and work commission to consider how to close the gender, pay and opportunities gap within a generation. I hope that that will lead to some important proposals. Finally, we have taken action to address the issues of the flexibility and portability of pensions, in particular through stakeholder pensions. I should say to the hon. Member for Eastbourne that aspects of the Pensions Act 2004 have helped, for example by aiding portability through helping people who have been in jobs for only a short period of time to take a cash equivalent transfer value of their pension rights to another scheme.

Due both to changes in society and the measures that we have taken, improvements are being made. However, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar and the other hon. Members who have spoken in this important debate have made a strong case and I willingly acknowledge that we need to do more to ensure fair outcomes for women and carers in the future. That is why fair outcomes for women and carers is among the key principles of pension reform that we set out in February. It will certainly be one of the principal criteria in the public debate against which the Government's proposals, when they are introduced, will be measured.

In the background is the changing demographic picture. Over the past 20 years, women's life expectancy at birth has increased by about three months every year. That is a dramatic change in longevity. It is wonderful and to be celebrated, but it adds to the challenges faced by the pensions system. An ageing population with an increasing dependency ratio needs a sustainable and affordable pension system that can provide a long-term solution for everybody, not just a quick fix for pensioners today and in the immediate future. That is why we have launched the national pensions debate. As broad a consensus as possible is crucial to a long-term solution to the pensions challenge. We want to involve Members of this House from the different parties, as well as industry groups, trade unions, interest groups and the public.

The Equal Opportunities Commission wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions last month outlining the desired outcome for women and carers of any reform of the pension system. That letter was signed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar and a wide range of organisations and individuals. We share the aspirations set out, such as better recognition of unpaid caring work.

The women and pensions report will aid the principle of assessing options against how they will provide fair outcomes for women and carers. The report was announced in response to an amendment tabled in Committee by my hon. and learned Friend during the debate on the Pensions Act last year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced this morning, when speaking to the Fabian Society, that we will publish that report later this year at an event in the national pensions debate that will focus on how to make our future pensions system work well for women.

Miss Begg: If my hon. Friend gets it right and is up to the pensions challenge, instead of talking as I was this morning of a new Beveridge, perhaps in 50 years' time our successors will be talking of a new Timms. That would certainly secure his place in history.

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. There might be other contenders for the Beveridge crown, but I will certainly have a go.

There is a lot of work, a lot of reflection and a lot of discussion on pensions at the moment. The concerns that have been raised in this debate will be among those that are most prominent in the debate that will follow the publication of the Pensions Commission report in November. I should say to the hon. Member for Romsey that, as intended, the first report was analysis; the second report, which will follow later this year, will contain proposals. Many people will want to assess those proposals against the benchmark of the concerns that have been set out in this debate and will be aired in the months ahead. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and I met representatives of the Equal Opportunities Commission two weeks ago, and I shall be meeting Fawcett Society representatives later this month. I am anxious to ensure that we engage effectively with a range of people who are concerned about the specific issues that have helpfully been raised today.

Regional Government

12.30 pm

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am particularly pleased to have secured the opportunity to debate the Government's policy on regional government. I am especially pleased to debate the matter with this Minister. We have experience of close team work on the football field, and I hope that today we can demonstrate that constructive team work can result in a beneficial outcome. It did so for both of us on the football field, when I laid on a number of goals for him to score for the parliamentary football team. I hope that if he were to follow my critique and analysis of where the Government's policy is going and where it should go, I might be laying the ball on for him to score some goals and improve his career prospects in the Government.

My Liberal Democrat colleagues and I strongly support the Government's proposals to devolve power, which have been successful in Scotland, Wales, London and, we hope in time, Northern Ireland. The Government know that we have given them strong support during the development of that policy. Many who were keen to promote the continuing devolution of power to the nations and the regions of the United Kingdom are concerned to ensure that despite the referendum in the north-east in November last year, this flagship policy does not fall off the radar, is not kicked into the long grass and does not become a policy that the Government would rather forget.

I intend to analyse the status of the Government's policy, to offer a critique and a constructive approach, to mention Cornwall— I would not want to let anyone down, nor surprise them—and to raise several questions. I have already furnished the Minister's office with those questions, admittedly only yesterday afternoon; however, I have given him advance notice of some of the questions I intend to ask.

With regard to the status of the Government's policy, we must look back to the Deputy Prime Minister's statement from 8 November last year. The no vote in the north-east referendum was disappointing but clearly overwhelming. I shared the disappointment of others, including the Deputy Prime Minister, at the outcome. He said that "our ability to hold referendums based on the current soundings exercise runs out in June 2005."

In other words, there will be no more opportunities to hold further referendums, because as of the end of the last month, the soundings exercise effectively is no longer a basis for them. He also said:

"If and when, in the future, a region wants to move ahead with a referendum, the House will have plenty of notice of that event."—[Official Report, 8 November 2005; Vol. 426, c. 588.]

Further, in response to a question that I asked about whether the Government were giving up on devolution as a result of the no vote in the north-east, he replied that "I am not giving up, and I hope that I do not give that impression."—[Official Report, 8 November 2005; Vol. 426, c. 603.]

However, the Government have shown every sign of giving up. There have been no new Government proposals to address the democratic deficit regarding the need for directly elected regional assemblies to take on the responsibilities of decision-making powers in the regions. I am a member of the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs, which is always keen to consider new subjects, but the Government need to bring such subjects forward. The Committee has not been called since last November. Despite this issue having been raised by me and others in business questions, there are no proposals for the Committee to debate the aftermath of the north-east referendum.

The Government will come unstuck if they continue to see devolution as something over which they can have absolute control and to think that they can determine the agenda completely. Fundamentally, devolution is about letting go, rather than holding on for dear life. One needs to understand why we devolve power. The problem with the Government's approach is that they want to dictate precisely what, how, where and when. What powers, organisations, structures, membership; how to proceed, resolve local issues and reorganise local government; where the boundaries should be. They want to dictate these absolutely, as well as the time scale of it all.

I offer an alternative approach, for which the Regional Assemblies (Preparations) Act 2003 could be used as a basis, in which the Government propose a menu of powers and invite regions, as defined by themselves—that would mean local authorities and community groups coming together—to propose business cases to the Government arguing for referendums to bring powers to their regions. That differs from the Government's zone approach, in which the Government decide the zones and dictate how and when bodies come together, what powers they have and when referendums are held.

If the process were one of letting go and allowing regions to define themselves and to come forward with business cases, based on the limitation of a menu of powers set out by the Government, and of recognising that the whole thing is a process, rather than a single event, I suspect that there would be a different response. Such a process would engage regions and allow them to bring forward proposals, rather than mean them responding as they did in the north-east to what they feel are entirely Government-sponsored proposals. There was quite a strong reaction against that.

It would be remiss of me not to mention Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly. I know that several city-region proposals are being worked on in other areas. Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly is seen as a region for European funding purposes; it is an objective 1 region. With a population of just over 500,000 people, it is not a large region. The Cornish constitutional convention has produced some excellent proposals and several policy documents, all of which have been circulated to the Government.

In November, the Deputy Prime Minister responded to the cynicism of the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning) about not getting a positive response in the south-west by saying:

"if the vote . . . were held solely in Cornwall, I wonder whether she would be so confident about the result."—[Official Report, 8 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 600.]

That shows his confidence that if a referendum were held in Cornwall alone, the Government would have a far better result than in the north-east.

[Andrew George]

Critics will inevitably say, "Well, you couldn't possibly have regions the size of Cornwall," but all we have to do is raise our eyes above the narrow horizon of the British Isles and look internationally at the many successful regions and nations elsewhere in the world with populations of a similar size to Cornwall's or even smaller.

Size is not the most important feature, but the Government have developed an obsession with reaching critical mass to deliver a number of services. Cross-boundary partnerships need to be established and transport networks need to be planned for. We are not talking about cutting ourselves off, but about working in partnerships and establishing joint boards. Wherever we draw the boundaries between one region and another—with transport arrangements, for example—we still need the ability to hold a dialogue with other places.

The need to establish that level of planning could be addressed and is well articulated in the plans and proposals from the Cornish constitutional convention. Not only that, but two years ago local people were invited to sign declaration sheets. More than 50,000 people signed in favour of a Cornish assembly, which represents more than 10 per cent. of the adult population in Cornwall. A small number of supporters were people who were visiting Cornwall, but the figure still represented more than 10 per cent. of the adult population.

There is a question of whether it will be possible to review the boundaries of the Government zones. I prefer to call them zones instead of regions, because the internal integrity does not really exist in the south-west, although for all I can tell it might do in the north-east. Paragraph 6.5 of the regional assemblies White Paper of 2002 says:

> "The Government has not completely ruled out in the longer term the possibility of adopting boundaries for regional assemblies that do not follow the existing boundaries."

There were proposals in that White Paper and the Government have acknowledged that in the longer term there might be opportunities. I urge the Minister in the review of policy to allow for the opportunity to consider again the integrity of the Government zones and whether the boundaries are appropriate.

I said that I had a number of questions for the Minister and they are as follows. What plans do he and the Government have following the north-east referendum to devolve power to the remainder of the UK? With the benefit of hindsight, which factors would he say primarily contributed to the heavy no vote in the north-east referendum? Does he share my critique and does he have any response to my alternative approach? What assessment has he made of suggestions at business questions and in another place to recall the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs to debate that very subject? Perhaps it should hold a series of debates to assist the Government to explore the opportunity of resurrecting plans for the devolution of powers to regions.

What departmental—in other words the ODPM—or Cabinet-level reviews have taken place on Government policy on devolution since the north-east referendum? If there have been any such meetings, will the minutes be published in the interests of open government? Why was the right hon. Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford) sacked as Minister with responsibility for regions in the post-general election reshuffle and what can we interpret from that? I thought that he did an excellent job and, clearly, was engaged in the process. He did not entirely agree with me on everything, but he was sincerely behind the cause itself.

No doubt the Minister and his Department are aware of the proposals for city regions and of the many papers published by the Cornish constitutional convention. What assessment has the Department made of them? What plans does it have to address the democratic deficit at regional assembly chamber level? Can he confirm that there will be no further attempts to siphon off powers to unelected regional bodies at Government level as was the case with, for example, strategic planning powers? Finally, will he agree to meet a delegation from Cornwall to discuss the emerging plans and the need for devolution of powers to a region such as Cornwall?

12.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): What a pleasure it is to see you, Mr. Marshall, presiding in the Chair today. I thank the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) for his kind words about my football skills and our previous experiences playing together. I am not sure that we are playing on the same team today.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising the question of regional government, particularly in Cornwall, and for giving me an opportunity to restate the Government's continuing commitment to decentralising and devolving power wherever we can. This Government have made radical changes since first being elected in 1997. London now has a city-wide government and a Mayor powerful enough to run a global city. The Scottish Parliament enables the people of Scotland to make key decisions without recourse to Westminster for the first time in hundreds of years. The Welsh Assembly has given the Welsh people a powerful new voice in the creation of jobs, prosperity and social justice. Each of those new bodies was voted for by the people and has since proved to be very popular.

The Government have followed a programme of devolution and decentralisation in England. For a decade or more, it has been recognised that some issues must be dealt with at a regional rather than a national level, but need to be co-ordinated over an area larger than any single local authority. The Government offices for the regions were established in 1994 when the work of three central Departments was brought together. They now do work for 10 Departments and have a programme budget of nearly £7 billion.

This Government created regional development agencies in 1998 as economic powerhouses for the regions. The English RDAs have created or safeguarded more than 160,000 jobs in the past two years alone and have played a major part in reshaping our regional economies. Following the outcome of the referendum in the north-east last November, the Government indicated that they would not proceed with the introduction of the Regional Assemblies Bill and set out why they were not proceeding with referendums in the north-west and in the Yorkshire and Humber region.

In response to the hon. Gentleman's question, it is not the Government's intention to recall the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs. We do not believe that a post-mortem would be that valuable as an exercise in furthering future policy. However, there are many challenges ahead. When the Committee meets again, it can focus on them and look forward to how improvements to the regional architecture can be achieved. Of course, it is open to Members to propose subjects for the Committee to consider, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House would be prepared to consider them.

The Electoral Commission said that there should be no further electoral pilots using the new model until at least September 2005, but that in the meantime, under the legislation, our ability to hold referendums based on the sounding exercise would run out in June 2005. That would have created a long period of uncertainty for local government in the regions. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and the Government did not believe that that was acceptable. If and when a region wants to move ahead with a referendum, the House will be given plenty of notice of it.

In each of the eight regions outside London, there are now regional assemblies that are comprised of members from local government, business, trade unions and other representatives of the wider community. By bringing people together from across the region, such assemblies are able to provide a focal point for regional activities and to act as a voice for the region. They have an important influence on housing, planning, transport, economic development, skills and training in their region. They are involved in a range of regional strategies, so that their broad interests can help to ensure that there is consistency between them.

Andrew George: Is the Minister therefore saying that the Government would carefully consider any proposal advanced by an assembly in one of the eight Government zones to hold a referendum for a democratically elected regional assembly if it so wished, and that they might concede to it? What time scale does the Minister envisage, given his earlier remarks? Is this likely to happen within the next 12 to 24 months, or are we talking about four or five years away?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I am not sure of the exact time scale, but everything is always under review, as the hon. Gentleman knows. I shall refer later to future suggestions for devolution.

Questions have been asked about the legitimacy of the voluntary assemblies. The members are not directly elected to assemblies, but up to 70 per cent. of the membership are from the local authorities in the regions. That gives the work of the regional assemblies a measure of democratic accountability.

All the regional assemblies have been appointed as the regional planning body for their region, and are responsible for producing the regional spatial strategy, the objective of which is to contribute to the achievement of sustainable development. Each RSS provides a broad development strategy for its region for a 15 to 20-year period. Regional spatial strategies set out the strategic policies and proposals, including infrastructure proposals and management polices, that govern the future distribution of regionally or sub-regionally significant activities and development in a region.

The strategies also provide a spatial framework to inform the preparation of local development documents, local transport plans, and regional and sub-regional strategies and programmes that have a bearing on land-use activities, including air quality, education, energy and health, and on strategies to adapt to the effects of climate change. This is a two-way relationship, as the RSS should also take account of the strategies and programmes as they evolve.

We recognise that regions are actively responding to pressures where appropriate. In the south-west, for example, we have launched "The Way Ahead", under which the South West of England Development Agency, the Government office and the regional assembly will work to meet the particular needs of the region.

The advisory group has held its first meeting as a step towards refining and delivering the proposal set out in "The Way Ahead". That document was a significant step towards a regional vision for growth, and the Government will continue to work closely with the RDA and regional assembly as they continue to develop it into a coherent strategy for linking economies in the region.

The successful "The Northern Way" initiative, launched last February, is a good example of the benefits of that joint approach. The RDAs and their partners in the three northern regions are working together to create more jobs, more prosperity and greater social justice. The initiative has been warmly received, and has energised the people in the three northern regions. It is one example of how regional structures and initiatives will continue to work throughout the country for the benefit of the regions with the full support of the Government.

Andrew George: I respect what the Minister is trying to do, but he is not answering my questions. I appreciate that "The Way Ahead", "The Northern Way" and various other "ways" might well be doing their own thing for all these various quangos and unaccountable bodies to which they work, but will he say when and how there will be referendums, and how we will solve the problem of the democratic deficit in these so-called regions?

Jim Fitzpatrick: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue, I hope to answer at least some, if not all, his questions later. If I miss any, I will write to him to try to address any deficit in my responses to his questions.

We have a continuing agenda of reform and modernisation. In our election manifesto, we stated our commitment to devolving

"further responsibility to existing regional bodies in relation to planning, housing, economic development and transport."

We are considering responses to consultation exercises on regional funding allocations, and to the merger of regional planning bodies and regional housing boards. We will announce our decisions once we have completed our considerations. We will decentralise and devolve power where we can.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

We have done a lot, but as the hon. Gentleman said, more can be done. The Government recognise the unique position of Cornwall; we support the Cornish language and have taken action to assist in its continued development. Only last month, my hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government announced the level of financial support for the Cornish language.

I note that, in previous speeches, the hon. Gentleman called for Cornwall to be given more regional identity, and today he mentioned the high level of support for a Cornwall assembly. The Government have always said that, to be viable, proposals for an elected assembly must cover more than one local authority area. I realise that the people of Cornwall consider that they have a separate identity, but that alone does not justify creating an assembly for Cornwall. Cornwall already has a county council. That body covers the whole county, and it can speak on behalf of the people of Cornwall. In our view, creating another body cannot be justified.

The hon. Gentleman has called for a Cornwall development agency. I have already said that regional development agencies are the powerhouses for economic development in our regions, and the RDA for the south-west plays a full part in supporting the entire region. Introducing another body only for Cornwall would not be cost-effective.

The Government recognise the acute pressure in the south-west for affordable homes, and the region will benefit from the highest increase of all English regions in its regional housing pot up to 2007–08.

Andrew George: The Minister seems to be saying that the Government will not give people what they want, but will simply give the people of Cornwall what they want to give them. In other words, he seems to have closed his ears to the settled will of people in Cornwall. However, the Government's proposals for devolution in the north-east—they were supposed to be popular—have been overwhelmingly rejected. Should the Government not listen to the people a little more?

Jim Fitzpatrick: We are listening to the message being sent to us by the people of the north-east; they say that they are not prepared for, or willing to have, a regional assembly. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has said that Scotland was initially not in favour of a Scottish Parliament, but some years later the idea was passed by a majority. We are saying that Cornwall is a county; it is a separate entity and not a region, and it does not fit our plans for regional devolution. We believe that the county is adequately covered by the county council for many of the issues raised today.

The south-west housing body recommends providing considerable support in order to allow Cornwall to produce additional affordable homes as and when required.

Through our links with Europe, we have ensured that Cornwall receives support to meet the needs of Cornwall. Negotiations on the structural fund regulations commenced in September 2004, and are likely to continue into early 2006. They cannot be finalised until the overall EU budget for 2007 to 2013 has been agreed. The position is that all funds should go to the new poorer EU member states, with richer member states funding economic regeneration from domestic resources. It is too early to give any indication of how much funding the south-west, or any other region, is likely to receive for domestic or European funding.

We are aware that partners in Cornwall are thinking about priorities for future programmes, and we are pleased to hear that that is linked to wider preparations across the south-west. It is good that that work is focusing on strategic issues and drawing on good practice from the current programmes.

Our continuing agenda of reform and devolution to local government is equally important, and I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is a continuing agenda. We have been engaged in extensive consultation on the future of local government. We are devolving further powers to the Mayor of London and the Assembly, hoping that it will encourage other cities to consider that example. It would allow more decisions to be made by local communities.

Along with the modernisation and reform of local government, we have taken several steps to devolve decision making to local authorities. We have removed restrictive controls on local authority borrowing; we have given local authorities greater power to promote the well-being of their communities; and we have given them the freedom and flexibility to deliver better services.

In his statement to the House on 8 November, my hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister set out the reasons why we were not proceeding with further referendums to establish elected regional assemblies. That remains the situation. However, we do have an agenda of reform and modernisation. When we can, we will decentralise and devolve power.

Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit

12.59 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): This debate is very important to my constituent Peter Lambert. It is unusual for me to bring a particular case to the Commons in this way, but Peter Lambert's case, which is interesting in its own right, perhaps illustrates failings in the system, and I am sure that the Minister will want to address them.

Who is Peter Lambert, what happened to him and what does he want? He is now 63, but when he was 52, he was assaulted. That was in 1995, when he was a schoolteacher. Today, he is in great pain and can get relief from that pain only by hanging upside down like a bat or by swimming. He swims about 40 lengths a day and tells me that the pain begins to go after 20 lengths. Clearly, that has an enormous impact on the way in which he leads his life.

Mr. Lambert cannot walk without experiencing incessant back pain and he has a disabled driver's badge to help him get about. He cannot bend, stoop or kneel without experiencing pain and he has great difficulty climbing stairs. His right leg is numb below the knee and he trips and stumbles a bit. It is also impossible for him to lift heavy weights.

He has been in severe spinal pain for a decade, since June 1995. Every day, he experiences searing, disabling pain. He now takes morphine tablets, which have been prescribed by the pain specialist at the spinal injuries unit of Hope hospital in Salford. He also wants to have an operation on his spine to make things better. His life has been completely dominated by this pain and its management. However, it is not just Mr. Lambert who suffers; his wife literally lives his pain with him.

Mr. Lambert has become part of my life, too, because he has been along to my surgery regularly. He is consumed by a burning sense of injustice. I say to him, as sympathetically as I can, "But you've got to live your life. You've got to move on from this," but he is totally fixated by the injustice of what happened. He has presented me with files thicker than the London telephone directory; one could get submerged in the most minute detail. A few months ago, he astonished me by bringing along a skeleton used by medical students to illustrate the nature of his disability; as if I did not know about it, having seen the photographs, the slides and so on. There he was, however, coming into my surgery holding a skeleton. It took my breath away.

So, how did it all begin? Mr. Lambert was teaching at Edge End high school in 1995. Two boys were fighting, and he stepped in to separate them. One of them hit him at the top of his spine, and that is when it all started. The doctors got involved, naturally. I am not going to name individual doctors or clinicians; that would be invidious and there is no need for it. However, Mr. Lambert is totally and absolutely critical of the medical establishment, the way in which it diagnosed his injury and the subsequent follow-up.

The accident, as I say, happened in 1995. In January 1996, a report from a consultant at the Royal Preston hospital stated that there was some bruising to the back and what he described as spontaneous osteomyelitis not caused by the trauma of the blow, which meant that it was just bruising to the spine.

The following month, Mr. Lambert was awarded 5 per cent. disability for soft tissue injury—the bruising that I have just described. At no stage were those considering his case aware that scans taken at the hospital showed a fracture to the vertebrae. In November 1996, the medical appeals tribunal entered the frame. Mr. Lambert could not believe what was happening to him. Astonishingly, the tribunal did not apply for the detailed medical records but took at face value the original statement by the consultant that there was just bruising to the spine, a soft tissue injury.

In early 1997, Mr. Lambert, who wanted to get to the bottom of the problem, saw the hospital records from Preston. He noted that the spine had been fractured. He appealed again, saying that the tribunal did not have all the facts and had not allowed him to speak about his condition. In December 1998, the social security commissioners entered the scene. They set aside the tribunal decision and asked the medical appeals tribunal to look at the issue again.

In June 1999, years after the assault, the medical appeals tribunal requested all the medical records. Mr. Lambert went through them and noted that various documents were missing and that there were various errors. He was told that the person who presided at the tribunal in June 1999 would not preside at the following medical appeals tribunal that December. When the tribunal met again on 13 December 1999, the person who presided was the regional chairman. Mr. Lambert was very concerned because he felt that that should not be the role of the regional chairman. The medical appeals tribunal reaffirmed the previous decision.

That takes us up to 1 March 2001. The appeal to the social security commissioner at an oral hearing was won. The commissioner wanted to get it all sorted out there and then with a meeting with the spinal surgeon and so on. I am told that the solicitor to the adjudicating medical authority advised against that and that he wanted a further tribunal. The process is endless.

In February 2002, a new schedule of evidence was received and new documents turned up. Some documents were missing and some referred to another individual. So, there were all sorts of anomalies. On 14 May 2002, there was what is known as a direction hearing, at which the chairman of the medical appeals tribunal directed Mr. Lambert to assemble a schedule of the events—documentation of what happened where and when. Mr. Lambert spent hours, days, probably weeks, assembling that documentation. It was a huge labour.

Then came the meeting that changed things. On 19 November 2002, a consultant orthopaedic surgeon gave evidence to the medical appeals tribunal that the blunt trauma, or blow, in 1995 had caused a fracture not mentioned by the consultant in January 1996. That fracture caused the osteomyelitis and the pain that I described. So, Mr. Lambert won his appeal. He was awarded a 20 per cent. disablement, but only for six months, followed by 5 per cent. for life. Such an award does not include any financial recompense. People do not get paid for awards of less than 20 per cent.

So Mr. Lambert's appeal to the social security commissioners had been successful but he got nothing out of it. Inside, he rages about the unfairness of the matter. He cannot understand some things. He alleges that medical notes were tampered with or, no pun intended, doctored.

[Mr. Gordon Prentice]

He also alleges that he saw his GP after the assault and not before. Amazingly, in the statement of reasons for the decision on 19 November 2002, which I just alluded to, we are told that Mr. Lambert

"saw his . . . GP on . . . 22 April 1995."

That was the month before the assault took place. Mr. Lambert contests that. He says that he did not see his doctor about his back pain then and that the doctor, amazingly, got his dates wrong. A general practitioner can be forgiven for getting his dates wrong on one occasion, but Mr. Lambert's general practitioner got his dates wrong on a number of occasions. That is unbelievable. When I read that, I thought, "Is it credible that a professional person such as a doctor would habitually get his dates wrong on medical notes?"

So, in essence, Mr. Lambert says that the pain that he is suffering was directly caused by the assault of the boy in 1995. The authorities have maintained for years that it was a degenerative back disease and that the assault caused only soft-tissue injury and some bruising, which explains the 5 per cent. disablement award. What a state of affairs it is that such a matter can still be rumbling on after a decade.

What does Mr. Lambert want? He wants an investigation into how the claim was handled. That is a daunting prospect, given the volume of material, the details, the medical expressions, the questions about who did what, when, and who covered up what, when and for what purpose. However, that is what he wants. He wants 30 per cent. disablement benefit, backdated to 1995. He tells me, because he is an expert in such matters, that his disablement must be the same, and is probably more, than someone losing a thumb. Apparently, one receives 30 per cent. disablement benefit if one loses a thumb. I suppose that the thumb is important to the operation of the hand.

Mr. Lambert also wants this whole business sent to the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council. I took up the matter on his behalf, and I got a letter from my colleague Baroness Hollis of Heigham, who said that the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council does not look at individual cases. It looks at epidemiological work, so there is a sort of road block.

Mr. Lambert wants someone somewhere to consider critically the doctors who sit on and advise the medical appeals tribunal. He wants people in authority to look behind the medical decisions, to hold the doctors to account, to ask questions and to challenge them. He feels that in his case that did not happen.

Mr. Lambert wants the Secretary of State to take another look at his case, as Mr. Lambert thinks that there are probably thousands of voiceless people suffering because they have been mistreated by the system and the authorities. Those people do not know each other and cannot communicate with each other, but he is convinced that what happened to him was not unique. I suppose that it was not. I have been reading the recently published report of the president of the appeals tribunal, which oversees such matters. The president says that "medical reports under-estimate the severity of the disability and how this might be remedied."

He goes on to discuss the quality of medical reports, and how they can be tested to ensure that they accurately reflect the severity of the disability.

I am sure that Peter Lambert has been in touch personally with anyone and everyone who has a connection with this case. Some people may say that he is literally a pain in the neck. That would be a disservice, but he is persistent. He knows what he wants, and he wants answers. He got a letter from the president of the appeals tribunal, his honour Judge Michael Harris. That gave further encouragement to Mr. Lambert, because the judge said that the Secretary of State has powers to look again at what happened

"if the decision was taken in ignorance of . . . some material fact".

I am not entirely sure how the Minister will respond. This case is immensely complicated in all its details, but in its essentials it is pretty simple. It is about how medical opinions can be tested and verified, and it is about getting some expedition into the system and giving people such as Peter Lambert the justice that they think has been denied to them.

1.20 pm

The Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform (Margaret Hodge): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) on securing the debate. I am sure that when Mr. Lambert reads our proceedings, he will be grateful for the diligence with which my hon. Friend has approached the case that has arisen in his constituency.

I will confirm the position regarding the Department's medical assessment procedures, and I hope that I can answer some of the points that my hon. Friend has raised. I am aware that both he and his constituent have written to the Department and to the previous Secretary of State on these matters. I hope that it will be accepted that I cannot comment on all the individual circumstances surrounding Mr. Lambert's claim for benefit, but I will make some general points, which I hope will be helpful.

There are three main issues that Mr. Lambert wanted to raise through my hon. Friend. First, there is his belief that he should get more than the 5 per cent. assessment of disablement that he has been awarded. He makes the comparison that has been made in today's debate between the assessment of 5 per cent. disablement for his condition and the assessment of 30 per cent. for the loss of a thumb. Secondly, there is the question of whether we should have an investigation of the appeal tribunal system of the Appeals Service and of my Department's medical advisers. I believe that that relates to whether the medical assessment framework has been properly complied with. Finally, the other issue is whether osteomyeiitis should be referred to the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council.

First, let us consider the assessment of disability. The assessment is made by a fully trained medical adviser. Just to put the record straight: doctors on the tribunal are appointed by the Lord Chancellor in consultation with the Government's chief medical officer. Their training is undertaken after consultation with the chief medical officer, so I have some confidence, which understandably Mr. Lambert does not, in the quality and calibre of the people that we appoint.

The assessment of disablement for the industrial injuries disablement benefit is a functional assessment. It tests what the person can or cannot do compared with somebody of the same sex and age whose physical and medical condition is normal. It is not an assessment of the medical condition; it is an assessment of the effect that the medical condition has on a person's capacity to function normally. The reason why we have that method of assessment is that the same medical condition can have different effects on different people and, conversely, different medical conditions can have a similar effect on people's functional capacity.

The schedule that the Department uses to assess disability for the benefit involves the expression of a percentage of disablement. That is a bit awkward, but it is the way the system works. Those schedules are contained in legislation, so we operate within that legislative framework. We have a panel of experts who made the determinations on the assumption that the injury occurred in an otherwise healthy person. That is used as the basis of the assessment to look for a loss of function when compared with a normal person. So, the assessment is not about the extent of damage to, or the loss of, body tissue; it is about the effect on functional capacity.

Let us consider the example that my hon. Friend brought to us. His constituent was given an assessment of 5 per cent. because it was decided that the level of disablement from which he suffered was minimal. Both the formal examination findings and informal observations at the tribunal hearing of 19 November 2002 showed almost normal function of the back. The tribunal assessed disablement at 20 per cent. for the period of time when my hon. Friend's constituent had been in severe pain.

The decision to decrease the assessment after a short time is justified because the evidence shows that his function had returned to almost normal. The tribunal decided that, although there was some residual loss of function, which it assessed at 10 per cent., there was evidence—I understand that it is disputed, but it was the evidence before the tribunal—of pre-existing problems with the lower back; that was the reason for the assessment of 5 per cent.

In order to be assessed at 30 per cent. in connection with a spinal injury, the person would need to have a marked restriction when bending or straightening, with much-reduced other movements of the spine, such as twisting. There would also be much-reduced movement of the limbs, muscle wasting in the limbs, muscle weakness, and inability to tiptoe, bend or kneel. Those things are pretty well set out.

In the comparison with the loss of a thumb that was made in this case, the assessment of 30 per cent. that was suggested does not relate to the number of bones lost, but to the effect on the function of the hand that such a loss causes. I think that my hon. Friend understood that. The important function of the human hand is the pincer grip, which is formed between the index finger and the thumb. Thus, if the thumb is lost, a major function of the hand is lost.

In the few minutes that I have left, it is worth considering the medical assessment framework. When advising on the percentage level of assessment, the medical services medical adviser considers a list of specific injuries and the accompanying percentage disablements, as set out in the legislation. Those not only set out certain degrees of disablement for specific injuries; they are also used as a guide for assessing the effects of injuries and conditions not listed in the legislation.

The medical assessment framework is guidance, which was developed in the assessment of industrial injuries claims as one of the training aids on how to relate the effects of injuries that do not appear in the legislation to those that are set out in the legislation. I can reaffirm the explanation given by my predecessor that the medical assessment framework is for guidance only and has no legal status. It is only one small part of the material to which medical advisers have access.

Disability assessment requires widely based knowledge of what is normal or abnormal, and extensive practical experience. In addition, in the context of the industrial injuries scheme, it calls for tuition in the specific requirements of the scheme and its practical application. That is provided as verbal tuition, demonstration and coaching in the examination setting. It is practical work, which is best learned by demonstration. The medical assessment framework forms just one of the aids to which medical advisers have access. There is no obligation on appeal tribunals to comply with the framework, as the medically qualified members of the tribunals are independent of the Department for Work and Pensions, and their training is a matter for the Appeals Service.

I probably shall not have time in the couple of minutes that I have left to deal with the osteomyelitis issue and whether that should be referred in relation to becoming part of the scheme. However, I undertake to write to my hon. Friend about that aspect of the issue. I understand that his constituent remains dissatisfied with the current assessment of disability for his condition. My response will simply reiterate the position of which he has already been made aware. However, I hope that by responding today in Parliament and by writing to my hon. Friend on the remaining issue, I shall provide him with some satisfaction. If, after reviewing the report of the debate, my hon. Friend has further questions to raise, I shall write to him with a further full response.

NHS (Wales)

1.29 pm

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Marshall. If it is not out of order, I should like to cut my speech slightly short, so that some of my colleagues will have time to speak in the 15 minutes that I believe are allocated to me.

In the light of what took place in London last week, let me make it clear that I very much applaud the work being done by doctors, nurses and other health service workers. As Members of Parliament, most of us will have visited our hospitals and GP clinics and will be well aware of the dedication of their staff. Let me make it clear, therefore, that the criticisms that I shall make are criticisms not of the work done by those workers, but of the system and the politicians who run it.

There is much to criticise in Wales. A report published by the Audit Commission in 2004 found that "the whole system of health and social care is not organised to best effect."

In its summary, the report noted the following: one in four beds in Wales are being blocked; 17 per cent. of beds are being occupied by patients who should not be in the acute sector; the 40 per cent. increase in the Welsh health budget is not being used efficiently or effectively; and the NHS bodies continue to overspend, with the result that the financial deficit in the NHS has risen from £58 million to more than £100 million.

For many people, the problem starts when they want to see a GP outside normal working hours. For many months before the new GP out-of-hours service was set up, senior GPs were warning Assembly Members and, I believe, Members of Parliament, that the Assembly had not done its homework properly and that not enough doctors would be available. The Assembly Health Minister took absolutely no notice, and the resulting shambles was entirely predictable. The service certainly failed me when I needed to use it for my daughter, who fell ill on a Saturday morning and was unable to see a GP. It also failed the Assembly's Agricultural Minister, Carwyn Jones, who felt compelled publicly to speak out after no doctor was available to see his son.

Those who give up trying to see a GP out of hours are sometimes tempted to dial 999. If they do, the service that they get is not necessarily any better. According to the latest figures, only 57.5 per cent. of ambulances arrive within the target time frames. That might be partly because so many ambulance crews get tied up waiting with patients at accident and emergency units while beds are found. As the Minister will be well aware, crews cannot drop patients off until the hospital has checked them in, but with A and E units at hospitals such as the Royal Gwent running at full capacity, that can take hours. Meanwhile, more ambulances arrive, which means that fewer crews are available to deal with emergencies.

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that part of the underlying problem is the lack of capital expenditure in the Welsh NHS? In 2001-02 alone, total capital expenditure on health in Wales was minus £5 million—it was not even positive.

David T.C. Davies: I completely agree that capital expenditure plays a huge part in this, but we must also look at the organisation. If the system does not allow ambulance crews to go back to collecting people who make 999 calls before they have checked their current patient in, that will have a knock-on effect on the whole system.

I think that we would all agree that the greatest failure in the NHS in Wales is waiting list times, which have risen by 73 per cent. since 1999. One in 10 people in the Principality is on some form of waiting list. In September 2004, the percentage of patients on the in-patient waiting list who were waiting more than six months was 36 per cent. in Wales and just 9 per cent. in England. The percentage waiting more than 13 weeks for an out-patient appointment has been falling in England and rising in Wales.

Behind each of those grim statistics lie thousands of stories of individual patients waiting in pain. One constituent in Monmouth, whom I dealt with as an Assembly Member, was forced to sell his house to pay privately for the hip operation that he needed, because he would have had to wait many years on the NHS in Wales. Had he lived just a mile or so away, on the English side of Offa's dyke, he would have been seen in a maximum of six months, as opposed to the 18 months that was then the target in Wales.

Indeed, about two years ago, the local health board in Herefordshire was advising GPs not to recommend any of their patients to go to any Welsh hospital, because the waiting times were so bad. On virtually any measurement, the NHS is worse in Wales than in England. The fact that patients no longer have the right automatically to get treatment in England undermines the myth that our health service is a national one.

This is what others have said about the NHS in Wales. Someone commented that "waiting lists are still unacceptably high and there is a danger that if the Assembly does not pursue reform as vigorously as it is pursued in England, the NHS in Wales will fall even further behind."—[Official Report, 18 November 2003; Vol. 413, c. 746.]

Someone else said:

"Improvement is badly needed, and slow in coming."

Another said that one of the "concerns I have is the unacceptably long waiting time for orthopaedic operations".

It has also been said that

"the response of Ministers has been inadequate and complacent."

Those are the words not of Conservative politicians, but of three Welsh Labour Members of Parliament who were reluctantly forced to express views that are shared by many who have experience of the NHS in Wales. Despite all that, the Government are now considering giving the Welsh Assembly more powers in devolved areas such as health.

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware of the comments of Dr. Tony Calland, the chairman of the Welsh council of the British Medical Association, two weeks ago? He described the NHS in Wales as being "in intensive care", and said that the interference of the Welsh Assembly Government with the implementation of the Welsh consultants' contract was "unprofessional and distinctly unhelpful". Is it not a damning indictment of the Assembly's administration of this vital public service that our health professionals say that they have no confidence in the Assembly's role in this matter?

David T.C. Davies: It is a damning indictment. I was not aware of that quote, but I am aware of one by Roy Lilley, an independent consultant in the health sector who described the Welsh NHS as a basket case, and said:

"Wales has the longest waiting lists in Britain and a critical shortage of staff."

It is clear that the problem is deep rooted. Why, therefore, are the Government considering giving even more power to the Welsh Assembly over health? Given its performance, we should be asking whether the time has come to consider taking powers away from the Assembly, particularly in areas in which it clearly cannot deliver. Ministers and Members will know that there is a clear precedent for that, because central Government have the power to take over certain functions of local authorities—as has the Welsh Assembly—if they consistently fail to deliver. What central Government have given, they should be able to take away. The failure to do so needlessly condemns one in 10 people who live in Wales to languish in pain while they wait for operations.

If we considered taking powers away from the Assembly when it cannot deliver, there would be a huge incentive for the Assembly and its Ministers to improve their performances in areas in which they lag behind England. The Minister for Education and Lifelong Learning has presided over the closure of numerous small junior and infant schools, and is about to authorise Education and Learning Wales to use a new funding formula that will almost certainly lead to the closure of school sixth forms.

Various local authorities have been so underfunded for years that council taxes have risen. In Monmouthshire, they rose by an average of 134 per cent. before rebanding over the past five or six years. If the Ministers responsible for those actions knew that failure to reach a certain level of performance would result in their responsibilities being taken over by central Government and the loss of their ministerial pay, cars and perks, they would suddenly have a strong incentive to deliver.

I therefore urge the Minister to build clauses into the proposed legislation being proposed to the Assembly that would allow powers to be removed, just as we are considering allowing powers to be added. It should be spelt out to the First Minister that those powers will be used unless there are significant improvements in the Assembly's performance.

Adam Price: Surely, the failures that the hon. Gentleman describes—I do not disagree on them—are those of the Labour Government in Cardiff Bay rather than of democratic devolution. His party wanted to form a Government in Cardiff Bay; surely these are political issues of the failure of the Labour party.

David T.C. Davies: I fully accept the hon. Gentleman's point. I have no doubt that political decisions taken by the left-of-centre Labour party in Wales contribute greatly to the problem. However, it will be another two years until a Welsh Assembly election and many people cannot wait that long. If the Assembly cannot do a better job of fulfilling its responsibilities, it falls on central Government to remove those responsibilities, just as we would with a failing local authority in England or Wales. [Interruption.] I am happy to give way again if the hon. Gentleman wants. At the same time as giving away extra powers to the Assembly, the Minister needs to consider the possibility of taking powers away.

Adam Price: The hon. Gentleman is being generous, but is he saying that he has more faith in Labour in London than he has in Labour in Cardiff?

David T.C. Davies: Amazingly enough, I am saying that with regard to the NHS. The hon. Gentleman has access to the same statistics as I have and they are clear. The NHS in England is in a better situation by far than the NHS in Wales. That is not a political statement, but a statement of fact that he can verify himself. I ask the Minister the same question: does he believe that people receive a better service from the NHS in England or in Wales? Also, does he agree with Welsh Labour MPs who have openly criticised the performance of the NHS in Wales or is he prepared to say publicly that they are wrong?

For the sake of those who have had to wait hours on trolleys in A and E units, who cannot see their GP on weekends, who suffer the indignity of being assessed on a mixed-sex ward—as many still do—or who are forced to make enormous financial sacrifices, such as selling their house, to get an operation in Wales that they would get in months in England, the time has come for the Government to act. The time has come for central Government to consider making the Assembly relinquish its powers over the health service. The Assembly's management of the NHS has been a lamentable failure, as many Labour MPs would agree. The Minister should remove the powers of the Assembly to run the NHS and allow central Government to reassert its responsibilities, for the sake of all those who are on waiting lists in Wales.

1.42 pm

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): The failure of the NHS in Wales can be exemplified by the experience of a constituent of mine. Mrs. June Derry is a well known town councillor in Ruthin. She is 73 years old, has worked hard all her life, paid her taxes and national insurance contributions, and over the past few years has developed leg pain. On 8 August last year, she was referred to a consultant at her local centre of excellence for orthopaedic surgery, which is the Robert Jones and Agnes Hunt orthopaedic hospital in Gobowen, which is just across the border in Shropshire. She was told that she needed a knee replacement operation. When she asked how long the surgery would take, she was told that because she came from Wales she would have to wait for 18 months. If, however, she had come from England, she would have had to wait for only 17 weeks.

Knowing that this debate was to take place, I spoke to Mrs. Derry yesterday evening. She told me that she was still awaiting that hospital treatment some 12 months later. As yet, she has received no indication of when the operation will take place, but she is in considerable and worsening pain. What is annoying her more than the pain, however, is the knowledge that if she lived just on the other side of Offa's dyke, she would have received her treatment six months ago. She made a simple point to me that the Minister could perhaps comment on. She said, "I pay my taxes and I have paid my national insurance contributions at precisely the same rate as a patient from England. Why, therefore, do I have to wait five times as long for treatment?" That is a simple question, which a lot of patients in Wales are asking. The answer, as we all know, is because of the Assembly Government's utter failure on health.

I request that the Minister telephone Cardiff after this important though short debate and speak to the First Minister and to the Health and Social Services Minister to inform them—as if they do not know already—of the strength of feeling in Wales about the failure on health. He should tell them clearly that, on health, they and the Assembly are drinking in the last-chance saloon. Frankly, it would be wrong to allow political dogma to take precedence over patient care, but that is what is happening in Wales.

1.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): May I begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) on securing the debate?

The Welsh Assembly Government are committed to establishing not just an illness service, to which many Members have referred, but a true national health service that promotes and creates good health and prevents ill health at source. I welcome this opportunity to explain the Assembly's work in introducing the changes needed in the health service in Wales to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

The Assembly Government have made important progress towards building an NHS and social care services that provide high-quality care that is fashioned to meet the individual needs of patients. For example, 190,000 more people attended hospital via out-patients and accident and emergency departments in 2003–04 than in 1996–97. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of innovative developments in the delivery of health care in his constituency. For example, the operation of Chepstow hospital is unique in Wales, in that it contains both primary and secondary facilities: two GP practices are based alongside the trust's acute facilities. The hospital features highly in the Monmouthshire local health board plans for the future development of health care services in the wider pan-Gwent review of health care provision.

As in other parts of Wales, the NHS in the hon. Gentleman's constituency is being refocused on the needs of patients. This year, £4.3 billion will be spent on health in Wales, almost double what was spent the last time his party was in office. In their last year, the Tories spent £640 per person in Wales. By 2007–08, it will be more than £1,800.

David T.C. Davies: I did not dispute the increase in spending—some 40 per cent.—for the Welsh health budget. My point is that the money is not being used efficiently or effectively. Those are not my words; they are in the Audit Commission's report.

Nick Ainger: The Audit Commission also referred to innovations. It is accepted that more improvement is needed and that, in order to get improvement, there must be investment. The Welsh health service under the Tories was certainly starved of investment.

In the eight-year period from 1999, real-terms investment in health in Wales will rise by 4.8 per cent. a year. By 2007–08, it will be £5.5 billion. The budget for hospital buildings and equipment, an issue raised by the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price), will rise from £120 million in 2004–05 to £309 million in 2007–08. I believe that that addresses the issue of capital spending.

As part of the Assembly's vision for providing better health care for the people of Wales, there will be better designed, better delivered services in key priority areas including cancer, coronary heart disease and chronic diseases. The priorities recognise the higher incidence of such diseases in Wales than elsewhere in the UK, a point that was not made by Opposition Members.

Ambitious new targets have been established to cut waiting times for cancer patients, and trusts in Wales are required to report monthly to the Assembly to ensure that the targets are met. Waiting times for cardiac surgery have also decreased. From April this year, no patient will wait longer than eight months for cardiac surgery, and the Assembly Government will ensure that, by 31 March next year, no patient waits longer than six months. Likewise, from May this year, no patient will wait longer than six months for an angiogram. By 31 March next year, the target will be four months.

One of the top priorities that the Assembly has focused on in the past 12 months is reducing long waits in Wales. An extra £32 million has been given to the NHS to help meet targets in this financial year.

Mr. David Jones: The Minister talks about reduced waiting times and waiting lists, but is not it the case that in the two months between March and May, the number of patients waiting more than 12 months for in-patient treatment increased by more than 1,100?

Nick Ainger: There might well be differences month on month, but the overall trend in Wales, as in England, is that waiting times are falling for patients. That is the important point.

The key manifesto commitment for the Assembly Government is that they will ensure that, by 2009, no one will wait more than 26 weeks from GP referral to treatment. To ensure progress towards that target, they have pledged that, by 2007, no one will wait more than 39 weeks.

Adam Price: In the 2001 general election manifesto, Labour promised to build 10 new hospitals in Wales by 2010. How much closer are we to that target?

Nick Ainger: Ten hospitals are being built or are planned. The capital budget has almost tripled in three years, and a significant part of it will be spent on constructing and completing those hospitals. Two hospitals are under construction in my constituency.

David T.C. Davies rose—

Nick Ainger: I have already given way quite generously and time is pressing.

The Assembly Government have rightly recognised that waiting times are a serious public concern. Just as in England, the Assembly Government are making important progress towards reducing waiting times. Indeed, the latest data show that half the patients admitted to hospital for an operation from a waiting list had waited only 11 weeks or less.

Last year, in-patient and day-case waits of more than 18 months were cut by more than 1,300, and waits of more than 12 months were cut by almost 8,000. That shows the progress that has been made as a result of investment.

Last year, out-patient waits of more than 18 months were cut by more than 7,000, and waits of more than 12 months reduced by almost 10,000. In the last month alone, out-patient waits of more than 18 months have reduced by 27, and waits of more than 12 months have reduced by 220. Almost 90 per cent. of accident and emergency patients are seen in under four hours.

At the end of the day, addressing waiting times and improving the health service are down to increasing the number of staff, buildings and equipment. There are more than 450 more consultants and more than 7,000 more qualified nurses in Wales than there were in 1997.

By 2010, the Assembly plans to have 525 more consultants and 175 more GPs, 6,000 extra nurses and 2,000 extra other health professionals. The Assembly has doubled the annual medical intake since 1998, and has almost 1,000 senior doctors in training for consultant posts. In addition, the total number of nurse training places commissioned in Wales increased from 3,261 in 2000–02 to 3,750 this year.

The Assembly is moving towards abolishing prescription charges by 2007, a measure that is clearly benefiting Mrs. Derry, the constituent mentioned by the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones), although I accept that the problem of waiting times for patients who seek treatment and are referred to hospitals in England needs to be addressed. It is, to say the least, unfair to treat differently patients who are referred to hospitals outside Wales through the traditional commissioning process. That is an equity issue, which the Assembly will have to address.

The Assembly also aims to make NHS provision attractive for dentists. The hon. Member for Monmouth did not make that point, but it is worth making, because the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr and I have similar problems in our constituencies. More investment needs to be made. The Assembly is handling the issue innovatively. As well as implementing dental initiatives, it is investing more money to ensure that more dentists are attracted to carry out NHS work.

The reforms being introduced by the Assembly Government are in marked contrast to what happened when the party of the hon. Member for Monmouth was in power. Seventy hospitals closed in Wales under the Tories.

David T.C. Davies: The Minister should be well aware—it is accepted in the Assembly—that that figure is completely misleading. Some of those hospitals closed, some were reopened and new ones were built. He spoke earlier of 10 new hospitals in Wales. Did he mean 10 hospitals in addition to those built under the Tories? Does he not accept that some hospitals will be closed during the next few years, or have their A and E units taken away in order to make way for new hospitals?

Nick Ainger: The advice that I am given is that 70 hospitals closed between 1979 and 1997. That is a fact. One of the problems inherited by the Labour Government in 1997 was the lack of capacity—in buildings and in staff. Prescription charges increased eightfold under the Tories, whereas under Labour they are being phased out altogether.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that not so long ago we had a general election, and the Conservatives did not address the fundamental issues that any party would face if it were serious about forming a Government: how to address the problem of capacity and how to recruit staff. All that they could come up with was the expensive and wasteful health vouchers, which would have taken £1 billion a year out of the NHS to subsidise private health care. That policy would benefit those who could afford private care at the expense of the many who cannot afford it.

Devolution brings government closer to citizens, and it gives the people of Wales greater freedom to develop policies to meet their needs. Wales was the birthplace of the NHS; under devolution, Wales now has a real opportunity to take control over its own health. Devolution is about approaching priorities in a way that best suits local needs. One size does not fit all.

The health needs of the people of Wales are not the same as those of the people of England. For example, one third of all adults in Wales—800,000 people—have at least one chronic condition; and 23 per cent. of people in Wales suffer a limiting long-term condition against only 18 per cent. in England. In some areas, the problem is worse. For example, 30 per cent. of people in Merthyr Tydfil suffer such a condition. Of people aged over 65 in Wales, 34 per cent. suffer arthritis, 21 per cent. have a respiratory illness and 30 per cent. have a heart condition. The incidence of cancer among Welsh men is 10 per cent. higher than in England.

Adam Price: If that is true, why is health expenditure per head lower in Wales than in the north-east of England?

Nick Ainger: That is a decision for the Assembly. I know that the hon. Gentleman and his party have been trying to claim that it is the result of Treasury decisions made in Westminster but, under devolution, the Assembly decides how to spend the money. I have given the hon. Gentleman the figures, which show substantial increases, including a tripling in three years of capital expenditure. Other expenditure, too, is way above inflation. The hon. Gentleman spoke of one region of England; Wales is spending far more per head than England, but finances in England are now being targeted towards regions with health problems. No one can get away with claiming that investment in Wales is not substantially above the rate of inflation.

The hon. Member for Monmouth claims that his solution would, in effect, take responsibility for health away from the National Assembly. I do not think that his party leader in the Assembly agrees with that policy, nor does his health spokesman, Jonathan Morgan. The hon. Gentleman proposes the complete removal of health care from the Assembly. That shows his failure to come to terms with devolution. It would not be possible to achieve it under the Government of Wales Act 1998, as functions exercised by the Assembly can be transferred back to central Government only with the Assembly's consent. The hon. Gentleman may be a member of the National Assembly, but I do not believe that he speaks for the majority of his colleagues.

Question put and agreed to.

Government Support (Veterans)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Dhanda.]

9.30 am

Sandra Osborne (Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock) (Lab): I am pleased to have secured the debate, following on as it does from veterans' awareness week and last Sunday's world war two national commemoration day. Recently, we held a similar event in Ayrshire, which was organised by the three Ayrshire councils and the lord lieutenant. More than 100 veterans from the second world war took part in a service and recounted memories of their comrades at home and abroad. However, some local women who had taken part in it made it clear to me that they considered that women's contribution to the war effort had never been given the recognition that it deserved. I know that they will be delighted that Her Majesty the Queen has unveiled a memorial to commemorate the 7 million women who worked for victory in the second world war in both the armed forces and on the home front.

I believe that, to date, only one debate on the Floor of the House, in June 2004, was dedicated exclusively to veterans' issues. It is a little disappointing that such a debate has not become an annual event. Although there are opportunities in defence debates to raise veterans' matters, such as the one that was held last week, does the Minister agree that a specific debate held in Government time would help to raise the profile of veterans' awareness week and highlight further some of the excellent work that is undoubtedly going on, as well as providing a platform for hon. Members to raise concerns on behalf of their constituents who are veterans? Moreover, members of our communities are concerned about how society treats our veterans.

I wish to make it clear that I am no expert on defence matters. In common with many hon. Members, I do not have personal experience of the armed forces. That is why I am grateful to have had the opportunity of taking part in the armed forces parliamentary scheme and completing 22 days with the Royal Marines. I pay tribute to Sir Neil Thorne and all who made the scheme possible. It afforded me the chance to learn at first hand about the armed forces that I would never otherwise have had. As I said, such an experience does not make me an expert, but it gave me an opportunity to hear from the real experts on both a formal and informal basis. It opened my eyes to many issues in respect of the armed forces, which are for another debate.

I wish to draw attention to some relevant points that I learned during my time with the Royal Marines. If we do not treat them fairly today, we cannot expect serving members of our armed forces to have confidence that they will be treated well when they become the veterans of tomorrow. Much work has been done, for example, in tackling homelessness among ex-servicemen, and that is important for those who are vulnerable. However, as Ministers have stated on many occasions, most people settle well when they leave the armed forces. There is the possibility for them to leave the armed forces enhanced by skills and experience and to develop their potential in the wider community, but I was informed by some marines that they could not afford to get on the property ladder because they were not paid enough.

I am acting as an unofficial shop steward on behalf of the Royal Marines. Perhaps we should seriously consider introducing a trade union to the armed forces. I saw at first hand the job that members of the armed forces do and the contribution that they make, for which they should be appropriately rewarded. The Ministry of Defence is modernising the service to increase the opportunities for serving personnel to put down roots and extend the time that they can spend with their families. We need to encourage recruitment and retention, but getting on the property ladder is surely part of the preparation for civilian life. I do not suggest that young members of the armed forces are unique in that regard, but I ask the Minister to consider it as a serious issue.

My second point follows on from that. Preparation for civilian life should be part of the process from the beginning and not an afterthought when the end is in sight. I know that efforts are being made to ease the transition from military to civilian life, and I would be grateful if the Minister provided an update on what is being done to assist serving personnel to plan for the future.

I am indebted to the armed forces parliamentary scheme, but also to the Veterans Agency, the Royal British Legion and particularly Combat Stress for the information and advice that they have made available in their work and campaigns. The situation for veterans today is very different from that of the past. However, that does not mean that everything is rosy. I refer, for example, to an article by Dr. Niall Barr in the first issue of the Royal British Legion magazine, "Forward". It provides an historical perspective on how veterans have been neglected by the state in the past and on how the legion was formed in 1921 to form a veterans' movement, which, as we know, continues today.

Although people do not leave the services now as part of a great wave of demobilisations as in 1918 or 1945, a return to civilian life can be difficult for some people today. They may not leave the services destitute, but they leave as individuals and face loneliness, a lack of support and often a lack of public empathy. Thanks to the efforts of its servicemen and women, British society is insulated from the demands and human costs of war and there remains little real understanding of what they have experienced on operations. Unfortunately, last week we saw a measure of how bad that can be. Let us hope that we never see a repeat of it.

I shall concentrate most of my remarks on ex-service personnel who suffer from mental health problems, what is being done for them, where gaps need to be filled, the contribution made by Combat Stress—the ex-services mental health society—and especially Hollybush house, newly in my constituency. It was formerly in the constituency of my former colleague, the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley, who has gone to the other place as Lord Foulkes of Cumnock. I am indebted to him; he was very committed to the work of Hollybush house. He invited the former Minister with responsibilities for veterans, Ivor Caplin, to visit the house, and I was delighted to be present on that occasion. The Minister was impressed by the work being done there.

I summarily extend an invitation to the current Minister with responsibilities for veterans to visit Hollybush house to see the work that is being done there. I am sure that he would enjoy his visit to Scotland, and I know that the people there would be happy to welcome him.

I should like to recognise the progress that has been made since the appointment of the first Minister with responsibility for veterans. In preparing for this debate, I was struck by the amount of intensive strategic work going on in this area, which appears to differ substantially from the somewhat piecemeal approach adopted by Governments in the past. Previously, problems were addressed as they developed, but the Government are taking a more structured approach and are basing policy—and, ultimately, resources and action—on evidence of real and measured needs. In the past, services for veterans have been delivered by a variety of Government and voluntary sector organisations, often working in isolation. Increasingly, social services are delivered on a cross-Government basis or through partnership between the Government and private or voluntary sectors. It is that partnership that I want to explore more fully this morning.

I question whether we fully support veterans with mental health illness, but there is no question that at least there is a coherent plan, and mechanisms to measure success or failure, what is or is not working. I am sure that that will be widely welcomed throughout the House, but the difficulty is that it will not necessarily convince our veterans who want practical proposals. They are not overly impressed by phrases such as "coherent strategies" or "partnership working"—I suspect that they would have used other expressions in their serving days—that may appear to be nothing more than bureaucratic window dressing to someone who cannot access the treatment that they need.

I would not dare to speak for ex-service organisations, but I can speak from my experience of working with a voluntary organisation that supported women who had been abused and who suffered from post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of experiences that were somewhat different from those of veterans. It is always pleasing when a Government, who have the power to take on board the concerns that an organisation has campaigned on with little recognition for many years, start to take the issue seriously, but it is always done on the Government's terms. It can be difficult for the organisation to comply with consultations on strategies while it struggles to provide a service at the coalface with scarce resources.

Partnership between the Government and the voluntary sector must therefore recognise the authentic experience and the campaigning roles of the veteran's organisations. It is necessary to ensure that jointly funded work does not detract from the Government's responsibility to provide state support for veterans or impinge on the charities' independence. That is a fine balance. I hope that the Minister will inform us that it is being achieved through the Veterans Forum and its various working groups.

I would also be grateful if the Minister could outline how the Government are putting their money where their mouth is. We all applaud the sterling fundraising efforts of ex-service organisations and the support that they get from the public, but what is the role of public money in supporting veterans? How does our contribution to supporting veterans compare with that of other countries? It is often said that a country can be judged by how it treats its veterans. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that last week's events would give the country an opportunity to thank a generation that made so many sacrifices for freedom. However, that generation was not particularly well treated at the time. What of the generations that have come after it and future generations?

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, East) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock (Sandra Osborne) on securing this important debate. I have recently dealt with several cases of the type to which she refers, and I shall be grateful to the Minister for what I am sure will be a helpful response. Does my hon. Friend agree that stress and mental health problems may not manifest themselves immediately or even early on in a person's service career—they may not become apparent until many years have passed—and that they could result not only from having served in areas of conflict but from having been subjected to stress by superior officers, from having been treated as a guinea pig and given inoculations without proper explanation or from having served in nuclear test areas? It is only when people reach the later stages of their life that such events begin to prey on their mind and cause them the mental health and stress to which my hon. Friend refers.

Sandra Osborne: I entirely agree with everything that my hon. Friend said. A well-known feature of post-traumatic stress disorder is that it can affect people many years after the event, even though they were not necessarily aware of a problem at the time. There are a number of contentious issues about how people end up with mental health illnesses following their service. They have been ongoing for many years.

I turn to my main concern, which is to raise specific issues relating to mental health problems associated with combat. Thousands of British veterans still struggle with the horrific psychological effects of combat. Many of those brave veterans face a daily struggle against nightmares, flashbacks, depression and anxiety. That is the brutal legacy of combat experience. As the organisation solely dedicated to helping the veterans recover from their injuries, the society—Combat Stress—provides intensive therapy at three treatment centres. One is in Surrey, one is in Shropshire and the other is Hollybush house in Ayrshire, which is in my constituency.

Hollybush House is vital to Scottish and Irish veterans. It is the only specialist service providing for the psychologically wounded in Scotland. It provides a unique safe environment where experienced staff can use the veteran peer group to help break down the mental barriers associated with post-traumatic stress disorder and other conditions. They can engage the veterans in therapy much more quickly and much more effectively than outpatient national health service appointments can do.

Research by Professor Simon Wesley and the current review of the society by the health and social care advisory service show that the NHS is not well equipped to understand the experiences of those veterans who have the mental health problems of combat-related psychological injury. Interim suggestions for policy have come out of Professor Wesley's King's college scoping study, which was commissioned by the MOD to examine key areas of need not already being met. They included the idea that for people who have left the services, joint work with the Department of Health for enhanced provision of service-related mental health problems was required. Such provision should be in a setting sensitive to veterans' unique needs. I would suggest that Combat Stress and its various treatment centres provide such a setting.

Ex-services people feel disfranchised and have often been fobbed off or pushed from pillar to post when trying to access health services. The reality is that most clients referred to Combat Stress have already done the rounds and have not been helped in the existing NHS system. Their condition is often chronic. They are often unemployed, may have housing problems related to the breakdown of relationships, are dependent on the state benefits system and have not uncommonly left a partner and children in similar circumstances.

It appears that many other countries recognise the fact that to achieve positive outcomes with that client group, a dedicated service is required for them. Hence their Governments also fund them. For example, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and the United States have a different system, where veterans' organisations and hospitals are funded by the Government. In this country, some time ago, money was transferred to the NHS when service hospitals closed in the belief that it would provide services to veterans. It has been left to the ex-services organisations to pick up the pieces.

I do not say that we should lose the partnership approach that we have, or the valuable experience of our long-standing ex-services organisations, but if they are spending most of their time worrying about funding, that affects their ability to provide the service and they cannot expand it, either to accept higher numbers of referrals or to respond to real and measured needs, to use the MOD phraseology.

Many people seem to think that an ex-services mental welfare society will be dealing only with veterans of the two world wars. They tend to see images of shell shock, images from the past. Those are important images but they do not necessarily relate to today's younger veterans.

The society is picking up an unprecedented number of new cases: it had 900 last year and put 500 on its books. The damage caused to veterans frequently requires long-term treatment and is getting more and more complex because of societal changes and the different active engagements of troops. However, many clients are now referred earlier to Hollybush house. Those are the clients most likely to achieve positive outcomes, but they are also the very people for whom funding is not available.

The aims of treatment for these clients should be to provide curative treatment that will enable them to deal with the effects of their symptoms to a degree that allows them to live a more normal life, form relationships and join the work force. However, that cannot be offered, because although Combat Stress has the expertise, it does not have the funding to allow it to provide the level of input necessary to achieve those outcomes. There is a big vacuum at the moment, as it cannot do the outreach work that would complement the work of community mental health teams in the national health service.

As I said, referral rates are rising, and it is logical to expect further increases as a result of the conflict in Iraq. As the Minister knows, the Territorial Army, and reserves in general, were used quite extensively in Iraq, and more TA soldiers are asking Combat Stress for help than has been the case in any other conflict. I have been informed that the issue is causing concern to not only clinicians in Combat Stress but the Army Families Federation and community psychiatric nurses working for the Army. There seems to be a shortfall in help for TA service personnel with psychological problems on return home. As the Minister knows, regular soldiers must attend a compulsory decompression process on return from active duty. They also return to the support of barracks and continued help, if necessary, from the defence psychiatric services.

The TA soldier has the option of the decompression process, but quite naturally most opt to get home as soon as possible, where they immediately become the responsibility of the NHS and the victim of long waiting lists and are dealt with by staff with little or no experience of combat-related psychological problems. It is feared that the current increased referral rate from the TA may be only the tip of the iceberg and that there may be a substantial increase in demand for support from reserve veterans in future. I would be grateful for the Minister's comments on that.

In April 2004, Combat Stress organised an appeal under the direction of Sir Clive Fairweather to upgrade Hollybush house to meet the statutory requirements laid out in the Regulation of Care (Scotland) Act 2001, which comes into effect in 2007. Fundraising for the new wing stands at an incredible £730,000, and the appeal has been supported by almost 2,000 donors and organisations. I know that there is a great deal of local support for the appeal because I have attended several local fundraising events.

In Ayrshire, we are much aware of the fine work done by Hollybush house, but the appeal has had the added advantage of placing the needs of Scottish veterans with combat-related mental health injuries firmly on the map. There is no doubt, however, that without that appeal the closure of Hollybush house was a distinct possibility. We hope that the Scottish Executive will make a contribution to the final budget of £1.7 million that is needed to secure the upgrade. We wait for a decision to be made. The upgrade is welcome, but it has been hastened by the Scottish Executive's care requirements. I believe that it is incumbent on the Scottish Executive to make a contribution.

There is the vital issue of funding for Combat Stress in the light of the new compensation scheme introduced in April. Even before April, Government support came only in the form of possible funding of treatment for any client who has a war pension of more than 20 per cent.

[Sandra Osborne]

for a mental health problem. More than 40 per cent. of the clients did not have that pension, so the society was reliant on using its general fund, which consists of donations from regimental associations, the Royal British Legion branches and other charitable trusts.

Many referrals now come from mental health professionals or primary care providers, but such referrals do not come with any funding attached. The new scheme introduced in April does not have that element to it. The single payment compensation with a lump sum will not necessarily be used to pay for treatment at Combat Stress. When funding disappears with current veterans who receive pensions, it will not be replaced by the new system. Slowly but surely, clients under the new scheme will not be able to be accommodated.

As I have said, 40 per cent. of treatment is already unfunded. The Ministry of Defence appears to be saying that funding for veterans with combat-related mental health issues is a national health service issue, not an MOD one. There is no scheme in place to ensure that the NHS fills the gap. Combat Stress is doing all that it can to raise funds from the public. The Minister knows that it is notoriously difficult to raise funds to respond to mental illness in any circumstance.

The balance of responsibility for funding has been shifted to the NHS. I hope that I have shown that it is well established that it is not realistic for appropriate services to be provided by the NHS. It could be done through partnership with Combat Stress, but that would require public funding. If Combat Stress is doing a job that should be done by the NHS and social services, the Government should allocate funds to the organisation that can deliver the service through a contract for specialist commissioned services or some other mechanism. It is worrying that such a system is not in place.

I realise that there are complications owing to devolved government, but there must be a national agreement, or a postcode lottery will develop, with veterans accessing services only if their local health authority happens to take the situation on board. I have already stated that much has been done by the Government. Successive Ministers with responsibility for veterans should develop a proper strategy for dealing with veterans' concerns. The Minister responsible for encouraging cross-Government co-operation on veterans' issues must solve the funding problem.

It does not make economic sense not to spend money in the short term that would reduce the long-term drains that will almost certainly result both on the NHS and the nation's benefit system should an increasing number of veterans continue to develop chronic, debilitating conditions that go untreated. Hollybush house does a fantastic job with scarce resources. Is it right that it achieves all that while it is heavily dependent on charitable income? More importantly, does the situation show that we value the sacrifice that our veterans have made for their country? I look forward to the Minister's reply.

9.58 am

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock (Sandra Osborne). She made an interesting, well developed and, in the light of the celebrations, parades and so on last Sunday, timely speech. She was right to highlight some of the many issues that affect veterans today: the women's contribution; homelessness, which I will touch on; and the many health care issues that affect those who have served our country.

Veterans have made a huge contribution to our country's history and have shaped the country that we live in today. Many of them survived the horrors of war while their friends and comrades gave their lives so that we could live ours in freedom. As a result, it is extremely important that everyone in this country and beyond recalls the sacrifices of our soldiers past and present and passes on the culture of remembrance from generation to generation. I pay tribute to the work of the many veterans organisations that continue to raise awareness and fight for the rights of veterans and their families across the country. The importance of the treatment of veterans has not always been given the weight that it deserves. With that in mind, I was pleased by the announcement four years ago that all veterans issues, right across the Government, had been pulled together under a single Minister. Following the creation of the post of Minister for Veterans, I look forward to hearing of the work that has been done in the past four years.

Sunday saw marches in Edinburgh and throughout the country celebrating national commemoration day, the 60th anniversary of the end of the second world war. Many veterans paraded down the Royal Mile in Edinburgh amid scenes that were repeated around the country. However, many of those who marched are now in their 80s and 90s, and it will not be long before very few veterans of the two world wars are still among us. Consequently, we owe it to them and to ourselves not to forget their contributions or the lessons that can be learned from them. I am hopeful that we will never again bear witness to another conflict on the scale of the two world wars. However, that does not mean that there are not many important lessons that we can learn from those past sacrifices. Sunday's celebrations should remind us of the triumph of the free world, but also of the horrors of war and the sacrifices of our servicemen and women.

I am sure all hon. Members were as concerned as I was earlier in the year by the apparent lack of awareness among many younger people of the VE-day celebrations. A worrying survey of UK pupils showed that three quarters did not know what VE stood for. Indeed, some thought that it was a music festival and others a venereal disease. It is fair to say that we need to do much more to educate the next generation about the sacrifices and bravery of our war veterans. They have inspirational stories that could encourage young people. I hope that last weekend's commemorative events will have gone some way towards achieving that.

I am sure that the whole House will welcome "Their Past Your Future", the scheme run by the Imperial War museum with national lottery funding. It has enabled students from all over the country to join veterans on overseas pilgrimages to former theatres of war to learn more about our recent history. The last century was one of the most violent in recent history and in the history of mankind. It is incumbent on us to educate the next generation so that they will be inspired to ensure that this new century will be one of peace and tolerance.

Although we must remember veterans from previous conflicts, we must not forget those members of our armed forces who are, as we speak, serving this country in Iraq, Afghanistan, the Balkans and elsewhere. Although the veterans of the two great wars have much to teach us, Government support for veterans goes far beyond that group. We must recognise that the majority of those who leave our armed forces are in their 30s and 40s. Consequently, supporting their transition back into civilian society is a major issue, as the hon. Lady said. Many have serious difficulties finding not only their first job, but a fruitful career for the following 20 to 25 years. We need to ensure that they have support not only when they first leave the services, but throughout the rest of their working lives, if they need it.

On a similar note, many of our soldiers join up at the age of 16 or 17 and therefore miss out on gaining the further or higher education qualifications that many of their contemporaries will go on to achieve. It is important that education does not stop on enrolment and that we equip our recruits with transferable skills and qualifications that will aid their transition into civilian life.

Some years ago, I interviewed a young American veteran who had served his country and had thought that he was also being trained for a job in the medical services in civilian life when his time in the forces was over. When he left the forces, he found out that his qualifications and experiences were worthless because there were not valued in the hospitals to which he applied for jobs. He felt let down, misled and betrayed by his Government. He was fit, able, intelligent and articulate. I interviewed him in a hostel for the homeless and he had his entire worldly possessions with him in one small bag. Hopefully, we shall be able to avoid such situations in this country.

As we heard, the casualties of war are not only those injured and killed in conflict, but those who suffer debilitating after-effects of their time in such conflicts. The Government have failed too many veterans in this regard. For example, recent years have exposed the reluctance of the Ministry of Defence to implement a screening test to detect uranium in the bodies of Gulf war soldiers. Although veterans have been demanding the tests since 1996, only last year did the MOD agree to offer them, by which time many experts say that there was little chance of detecting anything. That is just one of many similar stories. It remains the case that Defence Ministers in successive Governments have tried to play down the significance of a variety of severe illnesses. Those who put their lives on the line for this country deserve better. Such stories provide, unfortunately, an uncomfortable backdrop to last week's celebrations.

Pension provision is another central concern for veterans. Those men and women have spent a large part of their lives defending us and our country and they deserve all the support we can give. In 1973, armed forces pensions were recognised as among the best pensions in the public sector. However, during the 30 years since then, it is clear that they have slipped considerably to the bottom of the scale. We owe a duty of care and responsibility to our veterans and their dependants, and I look forward to hearing the Minister explain what the Government have been doing to reverse that trend.

Many of my hon. Friends have recently been involved in the treatment of the Gurkhas. I am sure that many hon. Members will have welcomed, as I did, the news last year that retired Gurkha soldiers will be allowed to apply for UK citizenship. I am pleased that those deemed good enough to fight and die for us are finally considered good enough to apply for citizenship. I am interested to hear the Minister's comments on the take-up of that scheme and any other help that has been offered to that often overlooked category of veterans.

On a different note, following the widespread public opposition to the recent war in Iraq, we must consider seriously how we deal with veterans of different conflicts. Sadly, it often seems that veterans of what can only be described as more popular conflicts are more widely revered than veterans involved with those conflicts that are less popular in the eyes of the public. For example, the South Atlantic fund did a great deal of work for the veterans of the Falklands war. I am less confident that a similar scheme awaits veterans of the war in Iraq.

The recent disagreement on the treatment of veterans of the Arctic convoys has also led to such complaints. We need to remember that the risks taken and sacrifices made by members of the armed forces are the same, irrespective of the justification for, or public perception of, a conflict. For that reason, although I opposed the war in Iraq, as did my right hon. and hon. Friends, we recognise that having sent our troops into a conflict we immediately have to do all we can to support them. I hope that the Minister will consider those concerns.

I could not speak about the Government's support for veterans without touching on the future of the Scottish regiments. There may well be a case for reform in the Army, but to break the link between the past and present is unnecessary and unhelpful when we all agree that we need to do more to educate people and to remember the sacrifices of our soldiers. At this time, like no other, increasing demands are being made of our soldiers. Surely this is not the time for such reforms.

I am sure that the Minister will have ample time to address the points made. We all owe a debt of gratitude to our servicemen and women, who have given so much to this country. It is incumbent on all of us to ensure that we never forget not just those who gave their lives for their country, but veterans, young and old, in all our constituencies. Their concerns must be addressed by their Government, and we will always remember that our freedom, our democracy and today's debate would not have happened without their selfless actions. They are asking for a fair deal and they deserve nothing less.

10.9 am

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): It is great pleasure to congratulate the hon. Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock (Sandra Osborne), not only on having secured the debate, but on the measured and deeply committed way in which she made her case. She concentrated primarily on mental health provision for ex-servicemen, which I also hope to touch on. However, I intend to range a bit further across the spectrum of veterans' affairs to give the Minister a wider choice of things on which to comment and to help us understand the Government's latest thinking.

I am also pleased to agree with much of what the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) said. He made an important point about veterans of unpopular wars not receiving the same support as those who participated in wars that enjoyed more jingoistic support at the time. I pay credit to hon. Members from all parties who have, in recent years, shown time and again that they are able to distinguish between their own beliefs about whether a conflict should have been entered into and their unfettered regard for the servicemen and women who faithfully carry out the orders of the Government of the day to try to bring about a successful resolution to those conflicts, with the minimum number of casualties and with maximum effectiveness.

It is important that we learn something about the mistakes of the past. We all too often pay tribute to people long after the event and regret not doing the things that could have been done to help them at the time while nevertheless proceeding behindhand in trying to deal with the veterans' problems of today. It is no good always saying, "We're sorry for the mistakes we made in the past", if we go on making them in the present.

Later today there will be a ministerial statement on far east prisoners of war. I understand that the ombudsman has found against the Government on four counts of maladministration of the compensation scheme. The ombudsman's report refers in particular to those people who were interned by the Japanese in the second world war, but were not considered to have a sufficient connection with the United Kingdom to qualify for the compensation agreed in November 2000.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), who set up the all-party group on far east prisoners of war and internees. When I heard about the forthcoming statement I did a quick search to remind myself of all those occasions on which we spoke and argued for compensation for the veterans who had been so sorely afflicted during those terrible years. The debates in which myself and others participated consisted of statements and question sessions on 9 March 2000, 3 July 2000, 7 November 2000—when the then Member for Kircaldy, one of the predecessors of the current Minister, announced the scheme—and on 26 November 2001, when the hon. Members for Luton, North (Kelvin Hopkins) and for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) asked why the criteria for eligibility for compensation for civilians interned by the Japanese in the second world war had been changed.

I asked the Minister at the time why he was defending the indefensible and put it to him that if people were British enough to be interned, they were British enough to be compensated for that internment. He replied:

"I regret that that is not the case. I have allowed a sufficient line of consanguinity to take as many people as possible into the net . . . a line had to be drawn somewhere, and it was drawn in the correct place."—[Official Report, 26 November 2001; Vol. 375, c. 654.]

Evidently, the ombudsman disagrees.

We do not wish to keep replaying such mistakes over and over again. The hon. Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock made a point about so many people who, having faithfully served the country in the armed forces, were finding themselves homeless and without adequate support when suffering the flashbacks of the traumas that they experienced while in the services. Those flashbacks often emerge long after the event.

In part, that reflects the wider issue of the way in which mental health is, in general, treated in this country. There is not the in-patient support that there used to be for people who do not need permanent in-patient residence but who do need periodic in-patient support to keep them on an even keel as a result of a trauma. More needs to be done before servicemen and women who have seen active service leave the armed forces. If the work is done in advance of their departure, it may be much easier to spot people who are at risk of developing mental health problems.

We need to develop schemes to help people who have not been able to get on the property ladder's first rung while serving their country overseas. I know that the Government have been thinking about that. I want to hear how far they have progressed in making it possible for someone who has completed a considerable period as a serviceman or woman in far-flung parts of the globe to have, when they enter civilian life, a financial basis on which to make a start on acquiring a home that will be the base from which they build their future career.

The pensions of members of the armed services have been a matter of great controversy and debate for many years. I do not propose to revisit all the arguments about those still suffering from the pensions trough of the 1970s or those who are still in anomalous positions because of post-retirement marriages. The Minister will have been addressing those issues with some concentration since he took up his post relatively recently. I want to hear what he has to offer to put right a situation that is getting easier to put right year by year, if only for the sad reason that fewer and fewer people are still alive to benefit from a rectification of the disadvantages that were incurred so long ago.

I am delighted to be able to congratulate the Government on the work that they have done in recent weeks and months to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the end of the second world war. The work on the commemoration events in the past week speaks for itself. The Living museum, which I had the pleasure of visiting, was affected for part of its duration by the terrible events that took place last week. Nevertheless, it saw a high throughput of people making the most of the opportunity to see all that is owed to those who fought and won the fight against a much greater, more pervasive and stronger form of totalitarianism than that faced by our society on a small, though deadly, scale.

I was also pleased with the efforts to educate the wider public by bringing future generations into contact with the memories of the veterans' generations. However, when I went to the "Their Past Your Future" exhibition at the Ministry of Defence, I was surprised to see among the exhibits a claim that the late Lord Cheshire VC, who founded Cheshire Homes and was a leading hero of the Royal Air Force bomber command and an observer at the Nagasaki bombing, had, at the end of his life, joined the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and campaigned against nuclear weapons. I had the privilege of being in contact with Lord Cheshire during the 1980s. Although he used to go to Japan to pray for the souls of those who died at Nagasaki, he maintained until the end of his life that the bombings were necessary and that the lives of many thousands of allied prisoners of war were saved by a speedy end to the war so that the well established Japanese plans to murder them could not be put into effect.

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the title of the debate is Government support for veterans, and I ask him to return to that topic.

Dr. Lewis: I am happy to do that, but I believe that that is a veterans issue, because the project's work is about putting the veterans' record before future generations. I was pleased that the Imperial War museum responded to my inquiry and corrected the record.

It is important that we draw the right lessons when we look back on what the veterans achieved for this country. We should draw the lessons that wars are sometimes fought because of lack of preparedness rather than bellicosity and that we owe it to the veterans whose memories we have been honouring that their record is not distorted.

The issue of the award of medals involves the Government and veterans. I understand from people who have held ministerial office in the Ministry of Defence that that always takes up a disproportionate amount of Government time. The Government eventually resolved the Suez canal zone problem by awarding a general service medal to those who had served in that zone in the 1950s and a clasp to those who already had the general service medal and who had also served in other zones, but who were entitled to extra recognition. It was possible for that medal to be awarded retrospectively because the record was examined and the decision was taken to make the award in light of the fact that that had not been considered and rejected at the time.

So, I have a positive proposal to put to the Minister with regard to the ongoing dispute about the awarding of an Arctic star or an Arctic clasp in respect of the Russian convoys veterans of world war two. It has been a long-standing concern of hon. Members in all parties. I have taken the trouble to do a little research in the archives and am grateful to the Cabinet Office historical section for allowing me to inspect the records of the ceremonial department that established the campaign stars and clasps that were awarded at the end of the second world war.

I went through those records thoroughly, and I can assure the Minister that nothing in the records that were presented to me suggested that the question of making a separate award of either a campaign star or a clasp was specifically considered and rejected at the time. Therefore, I think that he should investigate further. Perhaps it would be possible to resolve this last outstanding issue from the second world war campaign medals inventory, by finding out if the same criteria that allowed the Suez canal zone issue to be resolved could also be applied to the Arctic convoys.

The veterans concerned would be content if there were a recognised clasp, such as the clasp that was awarded to those who fought in the battle of Britain, to be attached to one of the existing campaign stars from world war two. A solution along those lines would be acceptable. Something that does not come under the category of an official star or clasp would not be acceptable. It would be a sensible and non-controversial way to resolve the matter without opening up a Pandora's box of claims for history to be revisited and for further medals to be awarded for one reason or another. It is sensible that such awards should normally be made as a result of decisions made reasonably soon after the events.

That campaign has been something of a running sore. There has always been the suspicion that that one theatre of war was not properly recognised, primarily because when those decisions were being taken, the cold war was breaking out. The omission is certainly strange. I put it to the Minister that a resolution is possible.

I should also be grateful if the Minister could advise us on the Government's thinking about the permission being given to veterans to wear medals awarded by other countries as a result of their gratitude for campaigns waged successfully by our servicemen and women. Recently, there has been a certain amount of correspondence from veterans who were involved in the successful 12-year counter-insurgency campaign in Malaya, or Malaysia as it is now known, and I know that the Government of Malaysia are keen to make an award so that veterans understand that their efforts were fully appreciated and valued by the people of that country. However, I also realise that our Government gave a general service medal and an appropriate clasp at the time.

Finally, I congratulate the Government on the heroes return scheme. I know of several people in my constituency who will be taking the opportunity to revisit those theatres where they saw action. In particular, a friend of mine, Mr. Eric Spearing, who served on the escort carrier, HMS Speaker—a carrier that has obvious connections with this House—will be going out to the far east and revisiting those places in which he, as a man of about 6 ft 4 in in stature, somehow managed to participate from the very small cockpit of a very small plane operating off a very small aircraft carrier.

The work that the armed services do is invaluable, especially at a time like this. We all make the right noises about how wonderful our servicemen and women are. The Minister, however, has the unenviable task of trying to ensure that they feel the practical benefit of the Government's support, as opposed to the emotional benefit of the country's support. I look forward to hearing what he has to say about the practical measures that they shall take in respect of service conditions, post-service preparations, mental health support and, when one leaves the armed forces, the ability to start out with a foot on the first rung of the housing ladder.

10.29 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): I must congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock (Sandra Osborne) on securing this debate to address the general topic of the Government's support for veterans. Colleagues will appreciate that this is a wide subject to cover in a debate such as this, but I shall attempt to provide a broad outline of what we are doing to support former service personnel, and the areas in which we hope to make further progress.

[Mr. Don Touhig]

It is a tremendous honour to be the Minister with responsibility for veterans. As colleagues have already said, we owe a tremendous debt of gratitude to those who served our country in the armed forces. They contributed their time, skills and effort; in some cases they sacrificed their health, and in many others their lives, to protect our country and the values for which we stand.

One of my key responsibilities is to ensure that veterans are properly looked after and that they receive the support and help that they need in civilian life. For me, a person who has ceased to wear a service uniform is still part of the service family. It is not quite a case of from the cradle to the grave, but when someone leaves the service they become a veteran immediately, and we must have care and concern for them.

I recently had the privilege of visiting the Royal hospital in Chelsea. That organisation is a great example of how the country values and cares for its veterans. I received a warm welcome, and I know that a warm welcome was given to my compatriot, Katherine Jenkins, who went to the hospital recently and joined in a sing-along with the pensioners. Of course, all Welsh visitors are treated well and are welcomed at the hospital, but I understand that the gentlemen at Chelsea are more interested in getting a return visit from Katherine Jenkins than from me.

All Members are aware of the range of events that took place last week as part of the first veterans' awareness week and the commemorations, in London and across the UK to mark the 60th anniversary of the end of the second world war. The events were a great success and shone out against last week's awful atrocities in London. It is a tribute to the veterans that they once again refused to be beaten and turned out in their thousands to commemorate Sunday's event and to the living exhibition at St. James's park throughout the week.

I am grateful to the Big Lottery Fund, which provided nearly £50 million of funding to support commemorative events across the UK this year, thereby allowing new generations to learn from the experiences of those who lived through those awful times.

To turn to other areas of support, the veterans' programme provides a framework in which we can address and progress veterans' issues. The main priorities of the programme are to ensure that as many service personnel as possible make the transition from service to civilian life successfully and to offer appropriate support to those who have difficulties. I am well aware of the potential risks associated with such a change in work and lifestyle, and I consider it of great importance that we do all that we can to help minimise the risks and ease the transition process.

That is why the Ministry of Defence provides a comprehensive package of resettlement initiatives, including the provision of advice to all who, leave the services, including those who leave early and who, we therefore believe, are potentially more vulnerable to social exclusion. Early service leavers now have a mandatory resettlement brief and interview and access to a service resettlement adviser, who can, where necessary, provide expert advice on employment and other areas of resettlement. Counselling is also provided where that is thought appropriate.

Of course, our work in that area is not complete. We need to know what sort of problems early service leavers experience when facing civilian life, and to this end we have commissioned King's college, London, to undertake research to assess whether a formalised mentoring service might play a part in preventing social exclusion.

Other work is focusing on health and social care, especially mental health care. A problem common to all sectors of society is recognising those most at risk of mental health problems, suicide or deliberate self-harm. There is, for example, no single cause of suicide or deliberate self-harm. Although the service environment can provide many stresses, the evidence is generally that service personnel are not more at risk of mental health problems than the rest of the population.

The services have recognised the need to manage stress in a pragmatic way, to reduce the stigma that can so often be associated with mental health problems, and to educate both personnel and those who can help them to recognise the signs of possible problems at an early stage, so that help can be provided. The same basic requirements apply to those in service and to veterans. I discussed that issue recently with Combat Stress.

A key issue identified is the failure of veterans to access care, perhaps because of unfamiliarity with civilian arrangements or a strongly held belief that civilian health professionals know little about service life. To help redress that problem, we are producing a leaflet called "Looking After Yourself", with which we aim to assist veterans to get help for mental health symptoms and illness in civilian life, which outlines what they should expect.

We also want to raise awareness in the medical world about veterans, and have begun discussions with the Royal College of General Practitioners and the Faculty of Occupational Medicine to explore the scope for introducing material about the armed forces into their training curriculums. I am sure that we all know of cases in which people have gone to their GPs for help and advice. It is important that we give GPs signposts that if such people were in the services, certain boxes should perhaps be ticked in terms of getting extra support or referrals.

Sandra Osborne: I do not disagree with anything that the Minister says—it is important to raise awareness among health professionals—but does he agree that in dealing with veterans' mental health problems, there would be advantages to veterans having contact, treatment and support from people who have experienced service life and to their mixing with their own peer group?

Mr. Touhig: My hon. Friend makes an important point. In a moment, I shall touch on some things that we are considering to see how we might progress on that issue.

The Veterans Agency has produced its first quarterly news letter, which is intended to inform all those who deal with veterans of the type of issues that they face. On their leaving the armed forces, responsibility for the medical care of service personnel passes to the NHS—my hon. Friend queried that. A patient's GP is usually the first port of call; if he thinks that specialist treatment is required, it can be provided. We are currently working with the Department of Health, the devolved Administrations, and other UK health authorities to consider how to enhance that programme. I hope to be able to make a positive announcement on our progress soon, and that will be welcomed.

People who have left the services who believe that their post-traumatic stress disorder symptoms are directly related to their work in the armed forces are referred to the Veterans Agency for their entitlement to the war disablement pension to be assessed. More than 2.5 per cent. of veterans who receive the war pension get it for symptoms associated with stress. Such people are also advised of the work of voluntary organisations such as Combat Stress. My hon. Friend said a lot about that.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving us the opportunity to address and comment on the work of Combat Stress—I know that one of its residential facilities is in her constituency. Combat Stress has a long and distinguished history of providing care to people suffering from mental illness as a result of their service in the armed forces. I visited that organisation's centre at Tyrwhitt house on 21 June to see some of its work. I was greatly impressed with the commitment of the staff and met some of the many clients whose lives would be much poorer without the support provided in the organisation's residential care homes and by its welfare officers.

I reiterate a point that I have made before: no matter how good Government and local government are or think they are, many people's quality of life would not be as good without organisations such as Combat Stress. I pay tribute to their work.

Of course, no area of medicine stands still. That is as true of the understanding of mental illness and its treatment as it is of other areas. In recent years, in particular, incidents all over the world, not least those in London last week, have heightened awareness of the possible psychological effects of traumatic events, and evidence-based best-practice treatments are now emerging. I commend the forward-looking approach of the chief executive of Combat Stress, Commodore Toby Elliott, and his staff, on their work to modernise the services that are provided. They are doing exciting things, and I am greatly impressed by what I learned there.

Combat Stress particularly wants to address the problems experienced by reservists who, like both current and former regular servicemen, can suffer from issues affected by stress. We recognise that that is a problem, and we are working with the Department of Health and the NHS to identify the best way to tackle the issues about which my hon. Friend was concerned.

Combat Stress is also working in close co-operation with my Department to commission a review of its treatment regimes by the Health and Social Care Advisory Service. The review has highlighted the enormous commitment of the society and its staff to the care of war pensioners with mental health problems and has confirmed the value that many veterans attach to their periods of care at Combat Stress centres. It has commended the society's evolving approach over recent years in line with wider good practice and methods of delivery.

At the same time, the review has identified a number of areas where further change is likely to offer new benefits to clients, including, in some cases, the prospect of treatment to cure. Although the review has yet to report formally, I understand that my officials and the society's officers are agreed that it offers new opportunities that must be grasped.

The society, the Department and the Health and Social Care Advisory Service will work closely together to agree how best to review recommendations and to take them forward. We will involve the Department of Health and other ex-service charities where they might also have a role to play.

Since its establishment in 1948 it has been the intention of successive Governments that the NHS should be the main provider of health care for veterans and war pensioners, for both physical and mental problems. War pensioners have priority NHS treatment provided for pensioned disablements, with priority decided by the clinician in charge. That long-established model is entirely in line with the cross-departmental veterans' programme.

My hon. Friend mentioned Hollybush house in her constituency, and said that I would be most welcome to visit. I hope to have the opportunity to do so in the near future. I am aware of the challenges that the society faces in meeting requirements to modernise the centre, particularly the provision of single-occupancy accommodation. I am also aware that the society has approached the Scottish Executive for a grant to support that work. That must, of course, be a matter for the Scottish Executive to decide. However, I fully support the society's movement towards modernisation, and I have no doubt that Hollybush house will play an important part in delivering those changes.

I am aware that my hon. Friend has previously raised questions concerning Gulf veterans' illnesses. I take the opportunity to reassure her that the Government have always given the concerns of the 1990–91 Gulf veterans the highest priority. That important and highly complex issue will continue to receive the close attention that it deserves. My predecessor set out the Government's position on the issue to my hon. Friend in his letter of 18 April, but before I respond to the specific points raised I would remind hon. Members of the Government's approach to Gulf veterans' illnesses issues.

More than 53,000 UK armed forces personnel were deployed in the Gulf in 1990–91. A minority of them are ill, and we want to know why. There is no medical or scientific consensus on the cause or causes of ill-health among some Gulf veterans and insufficient evidence to enable that ill-health to be characterised as a unique Gulf-related illness or syndrome, which is why we and others do not recognise Gulf war syndrome as a medical condition. The term "Gulf war syndrome" is not found in the World Health Organisation's international classification of diseases, which is used throughout the world by physicians and scientists to distinguish diagnosable diseases and their categories. We are not out of step with our major allies on that point.

Despite that, we remain concerned and are continuing with our £8.5 million research programme to try to establish why the 1990–91 Gulf veterans report more ill-health than other comparable groups, although the pattern of that ill-health is not unique to Gulf vetefans. They report the same symptoms and conditions as UK Bosnia veterans and UK military personnel who did not deploy to the Gulf. The only difference is the increased frequency with which Gulf veterans report such symptoms.

I take seriously all claims of ill-health among veterans. I strongly recommend that veterans of the 1990–91 Gulf conflict and of the recent deployment in Iraq attend the Gulf veterans' medical assessment programme if they have concerns about their health. The programme has been running since 1993, and in that time about 3,500 patients have been seen, some more than once. Further details of the programme are available from the Ministry of Defence website.

The fact that we do not accept the term "Gulf syndrome" does not stop Gulf veterans receiving a war pension and attributable benefits under the armed forces occupational pension schemes. Such pensions are not awarded for a list of disorders but for any disablement that can be accepted as caused, or made worse, by service. War pensions are paid on the basis of eligibility rules that are strongly geared in favour of the claimant; a payment will be made unless the Department can show beyond reasonable doubt that an illness or injury arising within seven years of service was not caused by service. Veterans of the 1990–91 Gulf conflict can and do receive compensation in the form of war pensions and armed forces pensions on the same basis as other veterans.

Several points were raised in the debate about homelessness, and I want to mention our work with the Office of the Deputy Prime-Minister, devolved Administrations and ex-service charities to help to prevent and tackle the problems of homelessness among ex-service personnel. Work continues to consolidate a number of projects such as Project Compass, which seeks to help homeless ex-service personnel back into sustained employment; it is a major priority, and I will give attention to it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ayr, Carrick and Cumnock and the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) raised the issue of what the Ministry of Defence is doing to help service personnel to get on to the property ladder. The MOD has long been committed to ensuring that service personnel make a smooth transition to civilian life. The Joint Service Housing Advice Office, which was established in 1992, provides tri-service civilian housing advice to service personnel. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has raised these issues with me, and I will be looking at ways in which we can examine what help, support and encouragement we can give in those circumstances.

My hon. Friend also asked how the Government are putting their money where their mouth is in supporting veterans' issues. I do not know why she sits on the fence; why does she not say what she means? I take her point.

There are many projects for veterans funded by the Ministry of Defence apart from research and supporting projects such as homelessness among former servicemen and prison in-reach. The Department provides £750,000 a year to the challenge fund, which seeks to pump-prime veterans-related projects that address the identifiable gap in existing knowledge or activity. Money is available, and I encourage veterans' organisations to approach the Department if they have projects that require support.

The Ministry of Defence also funds 80 per cent. of the Commonwealth War Graves Commission—about £31 million a year. The veterans' programme is a collaboration between the Government and the ex-service organisations, and much additional funding is therefore provided by other Departments or bodies—for example, £50 million of support has been provided for the commemorative projects by the Big Lottery Fund in the past year.

My hon. Friend also raised the issue of funding and support for Combat Stress. For the past 40 years the Government have funded war pensioners for remedial treatment at Combat Stress's residential centres, and, depending on the numbers who are being supported and cared for by that organisation, support is about £2 million to £3 million a year, which helps and benefits Combat Stress.

Sandra Osborne: I understand that those are important projects that have to be funded but does the Minister recall that I suggested that there is a substantial funding gap and that Combat Stress has to rely substantially on charitable giving? I question whether that signals Government support for the recognition of the serious mental health problems from which veterans suffer. Should there not be more public funding for that?

Mr. Touhig: There are always demands on the public purse for the funding of a host of worthy and important causes. I think that our support at this moment is appropriate. There are always ongoing discussions with organisations such as Combat Stress about the support that they get, and Commodore Elliott is not slow to give me verbal GBH if he thinks that we are not doing enough and not giving the support that we ought. I recognise the difficulty, but there are important ongoing discussions, which I welcome.

My hon. Friend suggested that funding would not be available for treatment under the new armed forces compensation scheme. Her concern reflects a misunderstanding: funding will continue to be available for those with significant mental illness due to service. The precise nature of the arrangement depends on agreeing with Combat Stress on how best to take forward the findings of the Health and Social Care Advisory Service report. However, we have made clear to the society that there will not be any significant changes at this time. We shall wait and see what the report comes through with.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) made the important point that we must pass on the message of the commitment and dedication of the veterans to the younger generation. Last Thursday, I went to St. James's park after the bombings to meet members of the RAF Prisoners of War Association. I was greatly impressed by the numbers that turned up; I had not been certain that many would be able to get through to the park.

One veteran told me that he had got to Victoria station that morning. There were no buses and no public transport—it was chaos. He said, "They kept me as a prisoner of war for four years. That didn't bloody stop me, and this wasn't going to stop me this morning." That showed the spirit of determination of that generation, and we can be inspired by that. In fairness, I do not think that we play down the issues of veterans' health, support and pensions; we are making the right contribution.

The hon. Gentleman was concerned that pensions had fallen behind wider good practice, but the current pensions scheme is one of the most valuable available in the United Kingdom. However, we recognise that in certain respects it has fallen behind good practice elsewhere. That is why on 6 April we introduced a new scheme, which has implemented a number of major improvements, including an increase in the level of death-in-service benefit from one and a half times pay to four times pay, a 25 per cent. improvement in the value of widows' pensions at full career and the introduction of benefits for unmarried partners. These things are good steps forward, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman welcomes them.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Can the Minister say to what extent people have taken up that scheme rather than staying with the previous one?

Mr. Touhig: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that information now. However, I shall look into the matter and write to him and other Members who have attended the debate.

The hon. Member for New Forest, East is right to point out that very often we look back at an issue after a time and think that we should have done something better or different. He focused his initial remarks on the ombudsman's report on the scheme for ex gratia payments to former prisoners of war of the Japanese. As he is aware, I have produced a written statement, to be presented to the House this morning, that responds to the ombudsman's comments. I do not want to trespass on that until it is available to all Members.

I say simply that the ombudsman made some criticisms of the Government and said that we should take certain actions. He suggested in particular that we should review the operation of the scheme. I do not think that that makes any sense; there were 29,000 applications for compensation under the scheme, and 24,000 people—or 83 per cent.—have been compensated. I see no purpose in examining the entire operation of the scheme, although I recognise that its announcement and introduction were not well handled. The Government accept that fully.

I am sure that Members are aware of the issues at the time. There was an urgency and enthusiasm to introduce the scheme as quickly as possible. A number of judicial reviews and issues affected the scheme. In the first such review, the judge commented that a scheme introduced in such haste was bound to have problems. I regret that a number of people who at first thought that they would be compensated will not now be compensated, because of the issue of birth link. I sincerely apologise for that. It was wrong, and the Government made a mistake. I shall be giving some thought to the ombudsman's recommendation that I should do more than apologise and consider some tangible response. I shall refer to it in my statement this morning.

The hon. Gentleman made several points about people moving on to the property ladder, and I think that I have covered them. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is keen that we should consider the issue, and I shall do what I can. I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments about veterans' awareness week, which was a great success and showed the determination of our country to recognise the sacrifices and commitment of a generation that kept us free.

When I knocked on doors a few weeks ago in the general election, and people told me that they were not going to vote, I said to many of them, "We shall be commemorating in July, in a few weeks, the 60th anniversary of the end of the last war. If we had lost that war, you would not have the choice to vote." It is important that we get that message across. We owe the freedoms that we enjoy now to that generation who kept us a free people. I hope that their example will be recognised and carried on by younger generations.

The hon. Gentleman raised the matter of the Arctic veterans and a clasp for them. He said that he had done some research, which is interesting. If he wants to write to me or have a discussion, I shall take his points on board to ascertain whether anything can be done. He also mentioned medals issued to British service personnel by foreign Governments. That is a matter for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, but I shall deal with that procedure in a note to him. I thank him for his comments about the heroes return project, which everyone thinks very worth while.

Dr. Julian Lewis: I have one last point for the Minister. The Veterans Agency has been a success for the Government. There is some talk about merging it with another organisation, and that is a little worrying. Can the Minister throw light on that?

Mr. Touhig: Yes. There is a proposal that the Veterans Agency should be merged with another part of the Ministry of Defence. I have discussed that with a number of veterans' organisations. I am considering various options and comments. We are consulting on the proposal, and I shall make a decision in due course, but I reassure hon. Members that I should not want the excellent work that the Veterans Agency does, through being very focused on veterans and veterans' issues, to be diminished in any way if there were to be a merged organisation. That must be a top priority for any new body that may be set up. I am not in a position to say more now. I am waiting for comments. If any hon. Members who would like information about the proposals want to contact me, I shall make sure that they are given all the necessary information.

I hope that my comments and the programmes that I have outlined demonstrate that the Government are committed to ensuring that the quality of life of our veterans is good and that their service and commitment to our country is recognised. We owe them a great debt, which I know that the whole House wants to honour and repay. It is important that we continue to learn from the past as a country and continue to recognise the huge sacrifices that were made on our behalf. That can be done in no better way than by honouring, supporting and helping our veterans. In my role in the MOD—I am also the Minister with responsibility for the Met Office, by the way, so the good weather is down to me, although bad weather is Ivor Caplin's fault—my No. 1 priority among my many responsibilities will be working with, helping, supporting and encouraging our veterans. I am sure that I shall have the support of all hon. Members in that.

Women and Enterprise

10.59 am

Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): I am delighted to have the opportunity to debate this subject with the Minister, and I look forward to sharing thoughts and ideas with hon. Members and hearing their comments and suggestions.

I start by stating the obvious. There is a clear inequality between the number of men and women who want to start a business in the UK. I want to discuss what that gap means for us as a nation and what the Government can do, and are doing, to challenge and tackle those inequalities. I shall also discuss the reason for the gap. It is evident that that a number of structural and cultural challenges face women who want to start their own business. Again, I shall set out what I think can be done to help them overcome those barriers and conclude by considering the implications of demographic trends on public policy towards women entrepreneurs.

On the differences in start-up rates between men and women entrepreneurs, I take most of my figures from the 2004 Global Entrepreneurship Monitor UK report, produced by Rebecca Harding of the London Business School. Her report states that UK women are half as likely as men to start their own businesses. Around 7 per cent. of women own their own businesses compared with 16 per cent. of men. That inequality is a serious social, economic and demographic issue that needs to be tackled across a wide variety of public policy areas, not just in the Department of Trade and Industry. If half the population is not fulfilling its entrepreneurial potential it affects us regionally, nationally and as UK plc.

A number of Government initiatives are taking place across the country to address that gender gap. The Government's 2003 report "A Strategic Framework for Women's Enterprise" noted:

> "At a cultural level there is a failure to recognise and value the contribution and potential contribution of women-owned businesses to the UK economy."

The Government have taken the important step of acknowledging that there is a problem. The regional development agencies have been working across the country to close the gap. Most now have a regional women's enterprise strategy and many have action plans that set out what they are trying to do for women and who is responsible for delivering to them. Many have a women's enterprise co-ordinator.

I welcome those developments, but we must go further to tackle the enterprise gender gap. We must also set targets from a baseline so that we know when we have achieved what we have set out to achieve. I have not been able to find anything that says what we want to achieve, so I am anxious to hear about that from the Minister. There have been large increases in the numbers of women starting businesses where the regional development agencies have made significant efforts to attract women into entrepreneurship, and I pay tribute to their efforts.

Yorkshire Forward, Wakefield's regional enterprise agency, has researched patterns of small business ownership and found them to be the same as they are in the rest of the country. In south Yorkshire, which was hardest hit by the closure of the coal mines, there is a specific strand of the European Union objective 1 structural fund that exists solely to promote women's enterprise. I welcome that focus on women and applaud the work going on to help those women boost their local economy, create jobs and provide for themselves and their families.

Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): My hon. Friend refers to the work in south Yorkshire. We have the Sheffield community enterprise development unit, more commonly known locally as SCEDU. It is funded by the Learning and Skills Council and objective 1 funding. Its programme "Making a difference" offers a combined programme of business start-up and management training schedules as they relate to social enterprise for women. It is little known that SCEDU is located in Burngreave, which is among the 10 per cent. most deprived wards nationally. It contains within its approximate area seven of the most deprived neighbourhoods of the top 1 per cent. most deprived neighbourhoods—

David Taylor (in the Chair): Order. Interventions should be brief.

Ms Smith: Thank you, Mr. Taylor, for reminding me of that.

What has my hon. Friend learned from such projects about promoting women's enterprise effectively?

Mary Creagh: I am delighted to hear about the excellent work of SCEDU. My hon. Friend raises an important issue relating to social enterprise and what we can do to help women in our most excluded communities. Those women often have all sorts of extra barriers, such as child care responsibilities, very low incomes and no capital for start-up. We need to unleash that potential. We now have 4 million businesses and must bridge the inequality gap. We have to start doing that by tackling all parts of society, which means people in the most deprived areas, too. I certainly welcome and applaud the work that has been done in her constituency.

I spoke to my enterprise agency, West Yorkshire enterprise agency, yesterday. It has started a women's network that brings together women from Wakefield, Kirklees and Calderdale—towns on the contiguous boundaries. It has 777 business women on its mailing list, of whom 172 are from Wakefield. They have set up a monthly networking club to promote their businesses to each other. There is often an information gap among businesses, whether owned by men or women, and people do not know about the products and services that exist in their local area. The West Yorkshire enterprise agency produces a directory of women-owned businesses in the area, which should help to close that gap.

One of the interesting things that the enterprise agency has done is to research the women who have shown an interest but have not started a business. It held a session in Wakefield last year called "What's Holding You Back?", in which it asked women who had attended one of its pre-start-up courses, but who had not gone on to start a business, a series of questions to elicit from them what was holding them back. The research showed that time, finances, current employment, criticism from others, motivation, juggling home and work responsibilities, attitude to risk, fear of failure and lack of support all played a part in those women's decisions not to proceed. Pam Shephard, the enterprise agency's marketing manager, made the good point that women are more likely than men to be open about the obstacles that they face and to be more realistic about their chances of overcoming them. Starting a business is not for everybody. Obviously, people who do not have the requisite skills and abilities should not start one, but we must strike an important balance and ensure adequate encouragement and support to harness potential.

We are fortunate in Wakefield to have some notable women entrepreneurs who are blazing a trail and sharing their experiences with other women. Margaret Wood is the managing director of ICW (UK) Ltd., an engineering company based at Horbury Junction. It specialises in the design and manufacture of glazed units for industrial applications. In 2002, Margaret came second in the national finals for the British female inventor and innovator of the year award for a revolutionary window design that enables windows to be opened and shut simply by pushing on them. Margaret is also the chairperson of Wakefield First, which is Wakefield's development agency, and chairperson of the Mid Yorkshire chamber of commerce local area council at Wakefield. She is a fantastic role model for young women who are thinking of starting up their own enterprises.

Linda Lennon is another inspirational Wakefield business woman. She started her business, Black and White Consumables, from her front room when her first child was born seven years ago. Her office supplies company now turns over nearly £1 million a year from its headquarters in the St. John's area of Wakefield. Linda went from being a telesales operator to winning the Yorkshire woman of achievement award for business last year. The business is still expanding, and Linda plans to take on a further 15 telesales staff as well as adding warehousing facilities to allow faster delivery. That is an amazing achievement for someone who started out with a baby in the bedroom, selling from her ironing board and a telephone in her front room.

Ms Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): There are some interesting role models in the north-west as well. Meena Pathak started work in hotel management in Mumbai and then moved into product development. She is now one half of Patak's, which is famous for its Indian food factory—now the largest Indian food factory in the world—based on the site of an old pit in Leigh, in Wigan borough.

Closer to home, Sue Woodward, the managing director of ITV, lives in my constituency. She recently won a well deserved award in the business category of the winning women awards. She is a rare example of a very senior woman in a media company and she also makes a contribution regionally. She worked on the Commonwealth games, and the citation for her award made it clear that she was an excellent manager of people.

I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that Sue Woodward and Meena Pathak are great examples for enterprising young women to follow. With help and direction from the north-west women's steering group, which was started by the regional development agency, we want to create a culture that encourages more women to start and grow their own businesses.

Mary Creagh: I thank my hon. Friend for raising the important issue of ethnic minority women, who can face many barriers to starting their own business. She gave a good example of how women are often accidental entrepreneurs. I am pleased to hear about what is happening in the north-west because the northern way—the economic development plan for the north—is about bridging the gap between the north and the south, particularly in the north-west, the north-east and Yorkshire and the Humber, which lag behind for small business creation generally. We need to ensure that the three relevant enterprise agencies and RDAs work together so that those women are visible as champions and can be emulated in their districts.

Behind the success stories, there are a host of barriers that those women have overcome. We need to address three main structural barriers to encourage more women entrepreneurs. The first, and most important, is one that counts for every entrepreneur—finance. Particular structural barriers prevent women from getting finance for their business. The Global Entrepreneurship Monitor UK report states that men tend to invest more in start-up capital in their businesses than women do and that women are significantly less able than men to access bank finance. Why is that? The report also says that the fear of debt is cited by both sexes as an impediment to start-up, but is more significant for women than for men.

In our economy, people who start businesses tend to be in employment while doing so. Women are more likely than men are to be in low-paid or part-time employment and mixing employment with child care, so they are likely to be on a lower income. They may be at home caring for children, as in the case of Linda Lennon, and have no income of their own. Obviously a bank manager will be significantly less likely to lend to women who have no income or are on a smaller income. That also means that women are limited to starting businesses with a low capital outlay. That is a further impediment that we need to consider. Such businesses can only be financed organically, through their cash flow.

In my experience, women are less confident about the financial side of their business. They lack the language of finance, and that inhibits selling their business to banks as a low risk. There may also be barriers to informal venture capital for women. They may feel shy or inhibited about asking for help from family and friends. They may be worried about the effect on their personal relationships if they take a loan and cannot pay the person back.

The second important impediment is culture. Schools and careers services do not push girls to think of themselves as entrepreneurs. Women do not have a Richard Branson-style role model to emulate. As we heard, many women are accidental entrepreneurs who start in one career and move to something else when, for example, when their partner dies suddenly and they take over his business, when their husband leaves them and they have to work for the first time, or when they have a child and find that they enjoy the flexibility of looking after their children and being economically active at home.

[Mary Creagh]

I welcome the Chancellor of the Exchequer's commitment to make enterprise week in schools a national event. We need more entrepreneurship education throughout the school curriculum and young people to have greater financial understanding if they are to understand the basic principles of profit, loss, cash flow and borrowing.

A third significant barrier is age. Women are used to retiring earlier than men, even though they tend to live longer. They often retire on meagre pensions without the lump sums that men receive after a lifetime of working. Age brings a double exclusion. Banks are less likely to lend to older people, as they are perceived to be a higher risk. In the population as a whole, two men start a business for every woman who does so, but at age 55, five men start a business for every woman who does so. That figure masks a haemorrhaging of older women's skills and talents. If our birth rate continues to fall and life expectancy continues to rise, that group of potential third-age entrepreneurs is set to grow. It will represent a huge, untapped national resource. As our work force shrinks and ages, entrepreneurship could go some way towards alleviating poverty for women in old age.

It is clear that some people chose to be entrepreneurs and that others have entrepreneurship thrust on them. That is the case for women as well as for men. If we are serious about addressing the gender business gap, we must do several things. First, we must provide better access to finance for women. Secondly, we must ensure that efforts to establish an enterprise culture take particular account of the needs and aspirations of girls and women. Thirdly, we must ensure that the talents of older women are not neglected and that a specific plan is proposed to ensure a long, happy and prosperous old age.

Business failure is the other side of business success, but inspirational women entrepreneurs can act as catalysts for others The Government and this country have a huge prize at hand if we can unleash the talent, technological skill and dynamism of girls, women and older women.

11.15 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Barry Gardiner): First, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) on the enterprise that she showed in arriving at the Chamber this morning. Her office told me that after she could not get on to the tube she took to her cycle, and that after she took to her cycle she had a puncture, and that it was only after she hailed a taxi—I do not know what she did with the bike—that she managed to arrive, breathlessly, in the Chamber in time for her speech. Therefore, she engaged in a considerable amount of entrepreneurial activity to ensure that the debate could go ahead. I also particularly congratulate her on the way in which she presented her argument, and on highlighting such important topics.

I wish to apologise on behalf of my hon. Friend the Minister for Women and Equality; she would have been present to respond to the debate, were she not speaking today at a women's committee of the European Parliament in Brussels. I trust that that is a sufficiently good reason for her absence.

The Government are keenly aware of the importance of the issue of women and enterprise. We believe that there is an economic imperative for developing women's enterprise, and there is a great deal of evidence that women make a significant contribution to their local and national economy; I shall return to that.

A useful starting point to show how the Government have supported women entrepreneurs is the strategic framework for women's enterprise. Substantial progress has been made since the publication of the document launching that in May 2003. The strategic framework was developed to provide a collaborative and long-term approach to the development of women's enterprise in the UK. Its long-term vision is to create an environment and culture that encourages more women to start and then grow businesses, and it aims to ensure that every woman who desires to start or grow a business has access to appropriate help and support. The framework highlights four key areas for action: improving business support services; access to finance, as has been mentioned; caring and child care; and the management of the transition from benefits to self-employment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield asked about the Government's targets and the dates by which they should be met. The quantative targets set by the framework are to be met by 2006 and they are as follows: that women will account for 40 per cent. of customers using Government-sponsored business support services; that women-owned businesses will account for 20 per cent. of the UK total; and that the number of women from ethnic minority communities receiving business support assistance will be proportionate to their representation in the relevant local and regional population. I hope that that also goes some way towards addressing the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Worsley (Ms Keeley).

Ministers have been active in developing the strategy. My right hon. Friend the Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith), in her former capacity as Minister for Industry and the Regions and Deputy Minister for Women and Equality, gave valuable support to promoting the development of women's enterprise. My hon. Friend the Minister for Women and Equality has provided continuity by addressing the second Prowess summit entitled "Building on Success". That was aimed at regional development agencies, with the specific goal of reaffirming RDA commitment to building regional impetus with regard to supporting female entrepreneurship. She also launched the Prowess report entitled "The Regional State of Women's Enterprise in England". One of the report's conclusions was that > "women's enterprise promotion is increasingly being viewed in the regions as a vital untapped enterprise resource, rather than as a means of addressing social exclusion".

That goes to the heart of some of the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield. We have to realise the folly of not tapping the full resources available to us as an economy. If we are able to tap into the untapped resource of female business skills and acumen, it can only bring great advantage to our economy.

I welcome the conclusion of that report as it is the essence of the position that we have reached. Women are increasingly seen as an entrepreneurial resource: an untapped source of great potential and creativity. Their future potential is even greater, and the Government acknowledge that, which is why we are doing more to promote the cause. The Government have pursued their goals for women entrepreneurs through the Small Business Service. Essentially, that approach has been to influence key partners in the regions—principally the RDAs—and to lead that implementation throughout Government. It was interesting to hear the examples my hon. Friend gave concerning west Yorkshire and the work of the enterprise agency there to involve women in enterprise.

We have also tried to maintain pressure on the Business Link network, via the RDAs and related agencies, to encourage the active promotion of services to women and to increase capacity and awareness of women's enterprise issues. We have sought to engage with key private stakeholders to promote and actively engage in the development of women's enterprise, such as the British Bankers Association, British Chambers of Commerce and the Association of Chartered Certified Accountants. We have also supported targeted women's initiatives and networks and worked in collaboration with organisations such as Prowess, the UK's advocacy group for women's enterprise development, on a contract basis, and with a range of other women's enterprise organisations.

RDA's have been encouraged to take a lead in implementing the framework objectives by forming inclusive, strategic partnerships and women's enterprise action plans at a regional level. All nine RDAs are actively developing women's enterprise, and the East Midlands RDA, as well as the northern RDAs, has made the matter a considerable priority. The level of engagement of RDAs has improved markedly during the past six months, as my hon. Friend would acknowledge. External stakeholders acknowledge that the environment of support for women's enterprise development has taken quite a boost during that period.

Mary Creagh: The Minister mentions the East Midlands RDA. How can the Government encourage the other RDAs, which have perhaps not been as enthusiastic about embracing the women's enterprise agenda? What plans does he have to encourage them to ensure that women entrepreneurs who want to start a business anywhere in the country receive the same quality of Government service?

Barry Gardiner: That is a critical point. Wherever women are in this country, we have to ensure that they have equal opportunities and that equal support is made available to them in setting out on the path to enterprise. My hon. Friend the Minister for Women and Equality is pursuing that matter with each of the RDAs, and through my departmental responsibilities and engagement with the Small Business Service we are working through that organisation to the Business Link network to ensure that such provision is in place.

We can provide the quality of support that my hon. Friend seeks in key ways, but because of the devolved nature of the RDAs—and the Business Link service of the RDAs—it has to be done through them after pressure from central Government. It is very much a cascading-down process that ensures that we do not take away the capacity of each RDA to examine the function of its Business Link service and put in place what it sees as appropriate measures for its locality. As my hon. Friend knows, there are clear differences in need in different parts of the country. It is absolutely right that the RDAs can respond flexibly to those needs, but they must always ensure, critically, that the service standard is maintained. We need to see the feedback to ensure that the service is of a standard that is acceptable to the people who use it.

The significance of the development of women's enterprise was reinforced in October last year, when my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced the establishment of a women's enterprise panel to advise on the content of a new action plan to help to achieve the target of 20 per cent. female business ownership by 2006 that was cited in the framework. The panel was also asked to explore options for the establishment of a national women's business council.

The panel submitted its recommended action plan to the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 8 March. The Chancellor acknowledged and welcomed the action plan in his Budget speech. Regional development agencies have been invited to pilot the establishment of a regional women's enterprise unit in one or more regions. The women's enterprise panel has put that recommendation forward as part of its action plan. The panel is due to make recommendations to the Chancellor by the end of July on the establishment of a women's business council. The Government will then decide whether to take that forward.

Mary Creagh: The US has much higher levels of women's entrepreneurship. One of the key things that it has is women's networking and women's business organisations on a huge scale. Does the Minister envisage something like that coming out of the women's enterprise panel, and does he think that it will benefit the development of networking among business women in this country?

Barry Gardiner: Clearly, networking is an essential part of setting up one's own business. It means being able to tap into the experience and resources of others who have paved the way. I am talking about role models, who, like those mentioned by my hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Ms Smith) and for Worsley, set out a path and can then share that best practice with others who come behind. Those role models must be accessible to all. They can be extraordinarily powerful.

The Government recently staged an online event, which highlighted such role models across the UK, to ensure that networking is not restricted by locality but can occur across the net.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): What action is the Department taking with small business organisations, such as the Forum of Private Business and the Federation of Small Businesses, to try to set up women's networks and make them effective throughout the country?

Barry Gardiner: That is part of the response from the women's enterprise panel that we are looking to. My hon. Friend raises the wider question of the Small Business Service as a whole. I hope that he will have heard the remarks that I made about business links and the other means of encouraging small businesses, such as access to finance, which I know he pursues vigorously as the chair of the all-party group on small business. These are critical ways, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield has said, in which the Government, working through the Small Business Service, can support women's enterprise.

I return to what I have called the economic argument for women and enterprise. The case for doing all that we can to boost women's enterprise in the UK is quite clear. It is not simply a matter of equality of opportunity; it is an economic imperative if we are to capitalise on the potential that women have to offer to our regional and national economies. The Small Business Service and its partners and stakeholders are working on capturing and articulating the economic argument for women's enterprise so that coherent, economy-based arguments can be put to those with whom we need to engage further in improving the environment for women's enterprise, particularly through the RDAs and other regional players.

A Department of Trade and Industry publication, "Promoting female entrepreneurship", has been received well by the women's enterprise community. It addresses some of the key points that my hon. Friend raised, such as:

> "Why do some women want, or need, different things from business support programmes?"

These are ways in which we are seeking to do all that we can to support women's enterprise.

On the access-to-finance issue that my hon. Friend rightly raised, the SBS is currently co-ordinating the development of an action plan for access to finance for women entrepreneurs.

Persecution of Christians (South-East Asia and China)

2.30 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am delighted to open this debate and serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Taylor.

It is well known that I am third choice for this debate. The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) originally secured the debate, but he is sadly either in or just out of hospital—our thoughts are with him. I know that my good friend the hon. Member for Buckingham (John Bercow) would also like to have led the debate, but he is busy acting on behalf of us Back Benchers in the main Chamber, so I will let him off on this occasion. I hope also that other Members will drop in, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed).

The issue is important: whether we are a Christian or follower of another religion or none, we should never lose sight of what is happening to Christians in other parts of the world. I thank my good friend Dr. Alan Hobson of Christian Solidarity Worldwide, with whom I have worked closely in raising a number of questions and in previous debates. I also pay due regard to John Prince of the Library, who has produced an excellent debate pack. I hope that, if people do not read the speech, they will at least look at the debate pack, which gives a good overview of what is happening in China and other parts of south-east Asia and which supplements what I will say today.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the issue. Hon. Members will be aware that there is a huge amount of persecution of Christians in many parts of the world. Of course, they are not alone in being subjugated, but I should like to concentrate on their plight. This follows on from a debate three years ago, which looked at the violence against Christian communities in Asia. We will look at part of Asia today, but it shows what is happening and what should not be happening.

When we examine south-east Asia and China, we can find many examples of what is happening to Christians who bear the brunt of persecution for their views. I hope to show that there is action that we can take, and it is good to see my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade present to answer. Although I will spend most of my time talking about the issues, I hope that there will be actions linked to them.

In the previous debate, my good friend the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) made the following observation:

> "If a state will not respect the most intimate beliefs of individuals, it is far less likely to respect other personal rights. Religious liberty can be seen as a benchmark for how well human rights in general are flourishing."—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 17 July 2002; Vol. 389, c. 95WH.]

That remains as true today as it was then, and it is worth reiterating. By standing up for the rights of persecuted religious groups, we also help to tackle other human rights abuses and promote a healthier respect for human rights across the world.

South-east Asia and China are both areas of outstanding natural beauty, and they contain a rich and extraordinary history. There is much to commend the region, but unfortunately major human rights abuses are occurring in a number of the countries in it. Many of those human rights abuses deserve full debates in their own right, but it is important to be realistic about how much we can cover in this hour-and-a-half debate. I shall look at specific countries and specific abuses.

Human rights abuses in China are widespread, and among the most prominent is the persecution of Christians. It is true that Christians in some parts of China fare better, or less badly, than those in other parts. Christians who belong to the state-controlled Protestant and Catholic Churches are tolerated to a much greater degree than those who follow other Christian religions. To achieve that tolerance, however, they must sacrifice some of their beliefs and activities. For many Christians, that is too high a price to pay. These Christians, of whom the most conservative estimate is that there are tens of millions, have decided that forming and running underground Churches is the best way to practise their faith while remaining true to the fundamentals of that faith. That decision should be their right under international law, but the reality is very different. I hope that the hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) will allude to that if called to speak in the debate.

Christians in Vietnam and Laos have long suffered systematic persecution at the hands of the Communist Governments there. Those authorities perceive Christianity as a threat partly because they see it as a foreign religion and partly because Christians tend to give their primary allegiance to God rather than the state. At the same time, however, Christians are very loyal members of those communities and good members of those states. A related factor is that those Governments tend to see all religion as a competitor with the communist ideology for the hearts and minds of their peoples. In the eyes of the dictators, politicians and officials who subscribe to that view, there should be only one winner—the state—so there is brutal repression of views that do not necessarily correspond to the mainline view.

To be fair, I should point out that the situation in Laos has improved somewhat and the central Government there have a more relaxed attitude to Christianity than they used to have. However, local authorities in some parts of the country are still eager to persecute Christians.

There are examples of persecution of Christians in other countries in the region. In Burma, there have been instances of Christians in the Karen and Karenni ethnic groups being forced by State Peace and Development Council troops to destroy their churches and build Buddhist temples instead. There are many causes of the persecution of ethnic minorities by the SPDC, but one subsidiary cause appears to relate to religion.

In the Philippines, although religious freedom is widespread and established, Christians occasionally suffer at the hands of Islamist terrorist groups, such as the Abu Sayyaf Group and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front. For example, in 2003 the MILF attacked a Christian town in M'lang in North Cotabato, killing five people.

Even in Malaysia, which has a long record of religious tolerance, the Iban-language Bible was temporarily banned by the Government in 2003, and four Malays from Kelantan were imprisoned twice, in 1992 and 2000, for renouncing Islam.

In Indonesia, more than 8,000 Christians were killed in violence at the hands of Islamists in parts of the country in the period from 1999 to 2003. I am pleased to note that the situation in Indonesia is now much improved. However, three Christian women have just been arrested on charges of Christianisation in west Java. More than 100 Mujaheddin militants have regularly attended the court hearings for their trial, freely shouting death threats in the court. These incidents are, of course, very worrying.

Today, however, I shall focus on Vietnam. Official ideological opposition to religion in Vietnam remains systemic. The terminology and tone of Government documents and actions on religion show continued Government suspicion of religion in general and Christianity in particular and an assumption that religious people are unpatriotic. I know this from my own dealings with the regime in Vietnam. I was able, with Lord Chan, to go on a lobby—I think that that is a fair description of it, although some would see it as a bit more robust than that. We were outside the Vietnamese embassy. Representatives of the regime refused to meet us, but we indulged in some correspondence. I have the letter here, which I think it is fair to say roundly denounces us for our association with Christian Solidarity Worldwide and for raising certain issues with them—there was not much of a meeting of minds.

Protestant leaders say that the Government plan to eradicate Christianity, frequently stressed by hard-line local officials, continues gradually but steadily. All villages and hamlets have a constant military and/or police presence, which is often used specifically against Christians. The following quote helps to show that. Rev. Tran Mai, general director of the Inter-Evangelistic Movement of Vietnam, says:

"I recommend those who travel to Vietnam and those who serve as diplomats should go to remote villages to see the sport of 'eradicating religion' being played by the Communist Party of Vietnam. They could then see the security police and soldiers playing their special role of living among the citizens who believe in God, sleeping in the house of Christian citizens, spying on citizens who believe in God—how completely strange! In a country that is at peace already the army is still scattered through hamlets and villages. Why? Because of the [Christian] faith, because of Jesus Christ, that's why—because the government wants to obstruct and eliminate the [Christian] faith."

There are many other reports that I could mention. In Vietnam, there are some awful cases of the most direct action against Christians. For example, bulldozers, tractors with ploughs, and saws and hammers have been used to destroy plantations that are owned by Christians. The Government prevent Christians in many parts of Vietnam from receiving international foreign aid for poverty alleviation and for disaster relief. There are examples of children being expelled from school because they are Christians. Anyone who is a Christian believer who buys land, or a house, or tries to cultivate a field, will have a hard time getting local officials to sign the papers. There are also regular and systematic attacks on house churches in Vietnam, as a result of which people are often denied personal ID cards and family residence papers, which means that they are very likely to suffer attack. The security police work constantly against those who profess the faith. There are many examples of house church leaders being put at significant risk because of what they have said and done.

In the central highlands, from September 2002 to date, Government campaigns have forcibly disbanded many hundreds of local churches and have sought to force Christians to renounce their faith. Nearly 300 Christian leaders are known to have been arrested and incarcerated. At least 60 Protestant leaders, including eight regular pastors of local churches, languish in the infamous Ba Sao prison in Nam Ha province; all have been given long prison sentences.

In Dak Lak, a province where travel is restricted for residents and visitors alike, the state recognises only four Christian groups, which meet in the homes of certain pastors. Christian leaders report that there are 439 meeting places in the province, but four out of 439 is less than 1 per cent. The pastors of the four groups supposedly recognised by the state are not even free to visit their own parishioners without getting official permission.

Christian leaders in the province say that the vast majority of the approximately 150,000 Protestant Christians must now practise their faith underground. Worship, teaching, baptisms and the observance of holy communion must be done out of sight of the authorities. That situation is replicated in many other areas.

In Dien Bien province, which is well known because of the 1962 battle that took place there, in which the French were roundly defeated, Pastor Thao Chu Gia reports that in December 2005, the local chief of police, the chairman of the commune and more than a dozen police officers

"arrested us and tried to make us deny our faith and build a spirit altar, worship the spirits and drink liquor. We refused."

He continued:

"After that the police summoned one family at a time and tried to make us deny our faith, and because we would not comply they swore at us and beat us many times. Because of the severe beatings five families agreed to deny Christianity, build a spirit altar and worship spirits."

Police officers and district and provincial Government officials are spreading the word in Dien Bien province that they will completely eradicate Christianity from Vietnam. That situation is matched in Lai Chau province and Hai Phong city.

I shall finish this point and then make some more general points about how Christians are treated in south-east Asia. I have asked a number of parliamentary questions about the subjugation of the Vietnamese Mennonite Church. The incidents have included summoning individual Mennonites to police stations where they are interrogated and attempts are made to force them to renounce their Christianity. A prominent Mennonite pastor, Pastor Quang, was arrested in June 2004 and the state-controlled media began a campaign of vilification against him. Le Thi Hong Lien was arrested with him; the torture and abuse that she suffered in prison led to her complete physical and mental breakdown and even then she was still beaten by police.

Another Mennonite pastor, Nguyen Van Phuong, completed his one-year sentence on 3 March and was duly released from prison. He, too, issued a report about the abusive treatment he received in prison, detailing severe beatings, threats during interrogation and forced labour. All the reports say the same thing: that they are subject to enormous mistreatment because of their faith.

We ask the Minister to talk to the authorities in Vietnam about the unacceptable treatment, and I hope he will respond to that request. Vietnam is party to the international covenant on civil and political rights—the ICCPR. Article 18, which closely mirrors the same article of the universal declaration on human rights, is especially relevant. It states:

"Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right shall include freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of his choice, and freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching."

We ask the Minister to raise the issue directly with the Vietnamese authorities to make it clear that there is documented evidence of mistreatment of people in their community trying to practise their religion, which the Vietnamese have signed up to, and of those who have been arrested as a result of their religion. We should be taking up such cases and telling the Vietnamese authorities that we know what is going on and that they must desist.

In November 2004 Vietnam changed the ordinance regarding religious beliefs and religious organisations, which brought additional fears because the state is institutionalising some of the actions that it can take against Christians. We wish the Minister to take up with Vietnam the implications of that ordinance and the instructions based upon it. That is a concrete action that he can take.

I have used Vietnam as a touchstone, an exemplar of what is happening to Christians in that part of the world. Other hon. Members will allude to Christians in other countries where there are serious problems. This is not just about people's ability and right to profess their faith and in community with others to demonstrate that faith but also about human rights, the right that they should have to know that what they want to do they should be able to do, with support from the state but also with the knowledge that they will receive protection from those who clearly wish to try to eradicate their views. They should certainly not have to fear being attacked by the state.

I am making these points not just because of my religious faith, which is important to me, but also because of my interest in human rights. This issue concerns human rights abuses and it should be as important as the abuses in Burma and Tibet. Those of us who are members of the two groups that campaign on these issues rightly take up what is happening with the authorities involved. When the Chinese or Burmese authorities make statements that try to justify what they are doing, we argue against them and say what is really going on.

I should like the Minister to take up a vigorous stance now on behalf of the Government and consider in particular cases such as that of Pastor Quang, who was arrested and suffers daily subjugation in prison.

We should see Vietnam for what it is. Our duty in this place is to make representations and try to get the regime to reform; it is desperately in need of that.

2.50 pm

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this important debate and I congratulate the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on his excellent opening speech. I should also like to put on the record my congratulations and thanks to my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes), who was successful originally in securing this debate. We wish him a speedy recovery and give him our best wishes.

I want to focus on the situation in China. There are quite a few concerns about human rights abuses in China, one of the most significant of which is religious persecution. The Chinese Government seem to regard religion as a threat to their power. As a result, they place severe restrictions on religious activities and seek to control them. They also seek to eradicate religious activities that are not Government-controlled through the Chinese State Council's religious affairs bureau. Religious groups that refuse to accept the control of that bureau face severe consequences, including, I understand, heavy fines, repeated arrest, interrogation, torture and incarceration in prison or labour camps.

A number of religions face discrimination and persecution in China, including Protestant and Catholic Christianity—other than the official state-controlled versions of each—Tibetan Buddhists, Uighur Muslims and the Falun Gong, whose practitioners have also faced severe persecution, although they do not claim it to be a religion.

I should like to focus in particular on the persecution faced by the unregistered, unofficial Christian Churches, both Protestant and Catholic. Although exact figures are hard to come by, it is estimated that tens of millions of Christians belong to such underground Churches. They regard the official state-controlled Churches as fatally compromised and unable to function and flourish as true Churches. In the state-controlled Churches, preaching about Christ's second coming, his resurrection and miracles—all of which are part of the fundamentals of the Christian faith—is forbidden. That helps to show why the underground Churches feel as they do.

The situation of unregistered Christian groups in many parts of China has worsened since the introduction of new regulations on religion at the beginning of March. As was widely feared, they are being used as a pretext for increased pressure on religious groups that are not registered. A good example of such repression is a recent incident in Jilin province. The crackdown there began on Sunday 22 May at about 5 am when about a dozen Chinese police burst into the home of the house church leader Zhao Dianru and arrested him. His house was searched, even though no warrant had been shown, and he was taken away and detained in Jiutai city detention centre in Jilin province. He was kept there until 6 June, when he was released.

Zhao is a prominent local house church leader who oversees about 18 churches in the area. He was recently asked to join the Government-sanctioned Church three times, but he declined each time. According to reliable sources, his arrest document accused him of using other means to instigate and disturb social stability, but did not mention religion or Church activities. About 20 boxes of Christian books were confiscated during the police raid.

Meanwhile, according to reports, police and public security bureau officers simultaneously raided about 100 churches in the area of Changchun, the capital city of Jilin province, and nearly 600 house church Christians were taken into custody. Most were released after interrogations lasting between 24 and 48 hours. However, at present, about 100 of the leaders of such house churches, including professors at Changchun university, remain in custody in various detention centres.

It is reported that large proportions of the congregations of the independent unregistered Churches that have been targeted are drawn from among university students, professors and young intellectuals. It is thought that the campaign is co-ordinated to rid the university areas of house church influence. Just more than a week earlier, on 13 May, 20 house church leaders were arrested while conducting a Bible training class at Pinglu county, Shanxi province. Among them were two well-known local house church leaders, Pastor Zhang Guangmin and Elder Li. Although most of those arrested were released almost immediately, Pastor Zhang and Elder Li were held for two weeks and one month respectively at Pinglu county detention centre before they were released.

On 24 May, three female house church believers were arrested by four Public Security Bureau officers at Yiyang county, Henan province while visiting a Christian leader's home. Miss Liu Lianying, Miss Xue Haimiao and Miss Zhang Xiulan were all released after extensive interrogation at Yiyang county detention centre. None of them were given or shown any arrest-warrants or release papers. They were accused of attending a religious black hole, which was a reference to their attendance at house churches. According to an eye-witness report, the three women were brutally beaten. Miss Liu Lianying was released before the other two women because the beatings caused her to suffer a heart attack.

Last month, several hundred house church Christians were detained at Xinjiang construction military corps. The corps consists of several large paramilitary units and was sent to the remote north-west province by the Chinese Communist party in the 1950s to suppress the so-called rebellious Muslims, who resisted the communist occupation. After suppressing the Muslims successfully, members of the paramilitary units along with their families were ordered to stay in the area and become civilians. Many have since become Christians and secretly hold house church worship services at their homes. According to a representative of one group of house churches there, the local authority has clamped down increasingly on them over the past three years with punitive measures, such as imprisonment, deduction of welfare payments and arbitrary fines if they were found believing a religion.

A few weeks ago on 24 June at about 8 am, while house church leader Pastor Chen Dongming was leading a church leadership training meeting at his home in Hezhai village in Henan province, more than

[Mr. Stephen Crabb]

50 Chinese police and public security officials raided and searched his house without a search-warrant. They had first surrounded the entire village, as if they were hunting dangerous armed criminals or terrorist suspects. Instead, their target was a harmless, middle-aged Christian pastor who was doing nothing more than trying to serve God. After bursting into the building, the security officers conducted thorough body searches of each of the pastors—both men and women—and then arrested Pastor Chen and others. Private property, including cash, chairs, TVs, books, blankets and rice, was confiscated and carried away by police trucks.

In raids around the same time, about 100 pastors from several major cities in the province were taken away and detained at Qi county detention centre. While most of the pastors were released later the same day after intensive interrogations, nine of them, including Pastor Chen Dongming, remain in jail. One pastor who was released said that they were accused of engaging in an illegal religious gathering.

Meanwhile, even before the crackdowns based on the introduction of the new regulations in March, Christians were continuing to suffer in many parts of China. Among the many Christians in detention, Pastor Zhang Rongliang is a figure of particular concern. He is the leader of the China for Christ Church, which is estimated to have about 10 million members. He is one of the most prominent house church leaders in China and has been featured in Time and Newsweek magazines. He was arrested on 1 December 2004 in Xuhai village, Zhengzhou in Henan province. The arrest was followed by wide-ranging raids on other churches in the area. His family all fled into hiding.

Pastor Zhang, who is 53 years old, suffers from serious diabetes and there are particular worries about his welfare and safety. He had been wanted for his religious activities for many years and has already spent 12 years in prison for his faith during five separate detentions. He suffered severe torture during those detentions and, according to the last report that was received about his whereabouts, it appeared that he was being held incommunicado in the Jinshui area in Zhengzhou.

There are real fears for Pastor Zhang's health and whether he will be able to endure the mistreatment that he is likely to be facing. The likelihood of renewed torture has been increased by his international profile and because he is the leader of a large house church network. The Chinese authorities are afraid of large religious groupings and label them as evil cults. That is done even when the groups are part of mainstream Christianity, with no theological deviation.

The account to which I shall now refer gives a graphic example of the brutal way in which many Christians are treated while being held in detention in China. It consists of a few brief extracts from an account by Liu Xianzhi of a series of interrogations that she underwent between 27 May and 9 June 2001. She delivered the account at a gathering of the National Press Club in February. She could not make public her sufferings much earlier, as following her interrogations in 2001 she was sentenced to three years of hard labour, and she was released only last year. Although her sufferings occurred several years ago, they are still relevant today for two reasons. First, they are based on a recent account, so they have not been in the public arena for long and need to be aired. Secondly, and more importantly, they provide a good summary of the sort of suffering that many Christians are undergoing in detention in China.

Liu was a committed member of the South China Church, and her accusers were trying to force her to incriminate her pastor, a well known Chinese house church leader. Liu says:

"Two men came and held me down by the feet and two others came and shackled me. They told me to run up and down the room. As I ran they all started making crude remarks about me. One of them said that I had slept with Pastor Gong. I was deeply upset to have such a thing said and it cut right into my heart. It was very tiring to run and when I stopped one of them came and took a clothes hanger and hit my toes until they were swollen. Another hit me from the back. As I was trying to move forward one of them stood on my shackles so I fell forward. As I was on the floor another came and took me by the hair and flung me to the wall. I had to walk so much that I started to bleed, leaving a trail of blood on the floor. After a while I really could not move any more. The shackles had cut deep into my ankles causing extreme pain. I still have the scars from these wounds today. Eventually the pain was so unbearable that I could not take it any more and I passed out on the floor."

She continues:

"Two men came and grabbed my shoulders and started to fling me around, dragging the lower part of my body on the floor. They violently threw me to the ground . . . The chief of police said he had orders giving him the authority to do all he could; even beat me to death, and that even if I complained it would do no good. He told me, 'We have dug a ditch outside especially prepared for you. After we beat you to death we will bury you and no-one will know.' . . . He told me that if I did not confess that day he would not let me die easily. I said I would never falsely accuse someone. He used his leather shoes to kick my mouth, saying I was stubborn and would not talk. Then he continued to grind his shoe on my hand . . . When the pain was so excruciating, one of them took my arm and put a pen in my hand and tried to move my hand to sign on a piece of paper."

It is important to put extracts from this account on the record.

The Catholic Church is also heavily persecuted in parts of China—I am referring, of course, to the underground Roman Catholic Church rather than the Government-controlled Chinese Patriotic Catholic Association. The Chinese Government consider the underground Church to be an illegal organisation. Its activities must therefore be conducted in secret. Penalties for belonging to the underground Roman Catholic Church include exorbitant fines, imprisonment, house arrests, beatings and internment in labour camps. Bishops from the underground Catholic Church have been targeted by the Government. For example, Bishop Su Zhimin, the unofficial Bishop of Baoding, Hebei, was arrested in 1996. He escaped and was rearrested in 1997. He was then not heard from or seen for six years. Finally, in November 2003, he was seen by chance in a hospital in Baoding. As soon as the authorities discovered that he had been seen, Bishop Su was spirited away again and disappeared. He has not been seen since. Inquiries to the Chinese Government from various United States Government agencies and non-governmental organisations about Bishop Su's whereabouts and well-being have never been answered satisfactorily.

Bishop An Shuxin, the unofficial auxiliary Bishop of Baoding, was arrested in 1996. He has been seen only once since then, when, several years ago, he was permitted to go home to visit his elderly mother. It is not known where he is today, or even whether he is still alive.

Bishop Han Dingxiang, unofficial Bishop of Yong Nian, was arrested in 1999. He is elderly and in bad health, but he has been kept in detention for the past six years. Bishop Shi Enxiang, unofficial Bishop of Yixian, Hebei, was arrested in 2001. He is now over 80 years of age, and he has been detained for the past four years. Bishop Gao Kexian, unofficial Bishop of Yantai, Shandong, was arrested in October 1999. His whereabouts were unknown until he died in jail in January.

Currently every one of the approximately 50 bishops of the underground Roman Catholic Church is in jail, under house arrest, under strict surveillance or in hiding. One of them was rearrested just a few days ago. Bishop Jia Zhi Guo, the underground Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese of Zheng Ding in Hebei, was arrested by two Government officials at his home on 4 July. He was driven away to an unknown location. The Government officials telephoned him in advance to notify him that he was being picked up. They ordered him to tell people that he was being taken away to visit a doctor. However, he is not currently sick and there is no need for him to visit a doctor. He is 70 years old and was ordained as a bishop in 1980. He was previously in jail for approximately 20 years and has been under strict surveillance for many years. He takes care of approximately 100 handicapped orphans in his home. He has been arrested several times since January 2004.

In September 2004, the prominent Beijing house church leader Pastor Cai Zhuohua was abducted by three plain clothes officers, who were believed to be from the state security bureau. Shortly after his abduction, his wife, sister and brother-in-law were arrested while in hiding. Pastor Cai's wife has a prominent role alongside her husband in the Beijing house church leadership. What was his crime? Pastor Cai had allegedly run a printing business and used it to print about 200,000 copies of the Bible and other Christian literature, while making a profit out of it. Officially, only one publisher, belonging to the officially sanctioned Three Self Patriotic Movement, is allowed to publish and print a limited number of Bibles and other Christian books. The strict regulation does not allow the production of sufficient Bibles to meet the high demand of the house churches. Sources close to Pastor Cai's churches insisted that the confiscated material was solely for internal house church use and that he had made no profit from it whatsoever. The conditions of strict controls on the house churches made such production necessary.

The abduction of Pastor Cai, the arbitrary detention of his wife and relatives, and the use of torture during interrogation to extract a confession indicate clearly that the Chinese authorities did not follow proper procedure during the prosecution of the case. Pastor Cai was finally put on trial a few days ago. The trial lasted only half a day. I understand that the verdict has not yet been announced. The authorities seem to have gone out of their way to be obstructive. Nine lawyers had volunteered to be part of Pastor Cai's legal team, but only five were allowed in court. His family and friends were originally told that they would be allowed 10 seats in the court, but only three were permitted. The US embassy sent an observer to the trial but they were denied access. Only one defence witness was allowed. During the trial, Pastor Cai pointed out that the confession his interrogators claimed he had given consisted of statements that they had written. He had not seen the statements and he was forced by torture to sign. Three other accused Christians at the trial said that they signed their confessions under threat of torture.

The Chinese Government have attempted to fob off criticism by arguing that it is not a religious trial but an economic one. However, as one of Cai's lawyers said:

> "The court should not be used to oppress religion and religious freedoms, but the authorities are always using economics as a pretext to deal with religious and political issues."

The verdict in the case will be announced at some point in the future. Sources say it could be a week or it could be a year. It is believed that the Chinese Government will try to find a time when political fallout from the decision will be least.

The cases that I have described are illustrative, but they are only the tip of the iceberg. They ought to serve as a stark warning to the international community of China's willingness to disregard universally agreed international human rights obligations. The fact that Pastor Cai Zhuohua and his wife are at present languishing in prison, that Bishop Su Zhimin is still unaccounted for, that people such as Liu Xianzhi can be brutally tortured, and that Zhang Rongliang remains detained without charge—in addition to many other cases, known and unknown—sends a stark signal that China has not softened and shows little sign of doing so.

The issue of the North Korean border crossers remains a key concern regarding China's respect for human rights. When refugees fleeing North Korea are caught in China, they are usually sent back to an uncertain fate. China still refuses to accept that they are genuine refugees, despite much evidence to the contrary. Obviously, this is not primarily a case of persecution of Christians. However, even in this instance, persecution of Christians is a subsidiary issue.

A few years ago, Dr. Alan Hobson, of Christian Solidarity Worldwide, travelled to the region and interviewed some survivors who had fled North Korea. Most of them had gone through China. Those who had been caught the first time, and sent back to North Korea by the Chinese, faced severe punishment. However, they said that the North Koreans were particularly harsh on any returnees whom they suspected to be Christians; thus persecution of Christians becomes an issue in the area of Chinese human rights abuses as well. China needs to take seriously the terms of the 1951 UN convention on refugees and start dealing a lot more sympathetically with those who flee the terrible sufferings and human rights abuses in North Korea and end up in China. Despite the Chinese Government's ratification of several human rights treaties, its stated adherence to the UN declaration of human rights and a provision in the Chinese constitution guaranteeing freedom of religion and belief, China continues to commit serious violations of religious freedom and belief.

I realise that the Foreign Office has often taken a robust line on China and that the China section of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has done a lot of good work on taking up the issue of human rights abuses with its Chinese counterparts. However, there is still much to be done. I urge renewed effort to champion the cause of persecuted Christians in China, including the cases that I have raised today, and to impress on the Chinese the importance of allowing freedom of religion in China.

3.10 pm

John Barrett (Edinburgh, West) (LD): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on securing this debate and on his choice of subject. He has a strong and detailed interest in this area, as was shown by the way in which he opened the debate.

On a day when 25 innocent children were killed in Iraq and 20 more children were killed in an attack on a school in Kenya, and in a week when London suffered 50 deaths in an outrageous terrorist attack, it is clear that throughout the world persecution and attacks are taking place on people of all religions and of no religion. Today we are concentrating on the persecution of Christians in south-east Asia and China, and it is sad to say that there is persecution in many other regions of the world.

During the past few months in the lead-up to the G8 summit, the Make Poverty History campaign has understandably resulted in an international debate centred on Africa and the need for international effort in that region. During the previous Session we debated attacks on Christian communities in Africa. However, the hon. Gentleman has done us and the House a service by reminding us of the continuing need for this country, working with our allies, to help those suffering from violence and persecution elsewhere in the world—in this case, south-east Asia and China.

I come to this debate remembering that the persecution of Christians in Asia was one of the first issues that I had to look into after being elected in 2001. Days after arriving in Westminster I received a detailed letter from a constituent, who wrote specifically on the plight of Indonesian Christians in the Malucca islands. I had not come across that issue before, but the more I looked into it, the more appalled I became. It did not take much research to realise that that problem was not isolated in those islands: it affected countries throughout south-east Asia.

It should be noted that although today's debate has focused on Christianity, this problem is not isolated to that group. There is a catalogue of evidence showing that Buddhists—especially Buddhist monks—are facing imprisonment and violence, and that problem is not isolated to one country or region. This problem should concern those of all religions and those of none.

Article 18 of the United Nations universal declaration of human rights clearly states:

"Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance."

That is a clear and definitive statement that should be respected and followed, yet in many parts of the world—particularly in south-east Asia—respect for freedom of religious practice and expression is not happening.

This issue is far from being confined to one country, as previous speakers have mentioned. In China, despite a constitution that states that citizens should enjoy total religious freedom, the Chinese Government have continually attempted to restrict all religious practice to Government-authorised religious organisations and registered places of worship. The regulations, which were introduced earlier this year, have in many ways simply been used as a means of attacking those religious groups that are not registered with the authorities. Hundreds of Christian leaders remain imprisoned, churches have been raided and many followers have been forced into hiding.

Similarly, in Burma, where almost 2 million of the population are Christians, the only people allowed the freedom to practise their religion are those who are registered. Religious publications are censored, and it has been illegal to print translated Bibles. One Burmese army commander, after attacking Christian communities of Karen, was quoted as saying:

"I do not respect any religion. My religion is the trigger of my gun."

In Vietnam, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Stroud, there continue to be major restrictions on Christian practices, religious schooling and even the charitable activities carried out by religious organisations. When some groups seek to register their church through the official channels, their church is raided and their meetings are labelled illegal. There remains a general and profound distrust of, and fundamental opposition to, religion in principle in Vietnam.

In Laos, there is ongoing Government-organised persecution of Christians, helped by the wording of the country's constitution, which allows the authorities to declare Protestant Christianity its foremost enemy.

A recent report by Aid to the Church in Need covered its investigations into persecutions in China in 2004. The report was covered by Zenit, the international news agency, which said the following:

"'During 2004 religious freedom suffered substantial and systematic violations in China,' the report observed. The Beijing government permits religious activity only by registered associations. It conceives of religion as being in the service of state security and the nation's progress. Thus, freedom of worship is not an innate right for people but a concession by the state.

New national laws on religion led to little" or no

"real improvement: the statutes contain provisions allowing the government to arrest and imprison as common criminals those acting outside the controlled organizations.

Yet, churches continue to attract ever-greater numbers of followers throughout the country. As well, conversions to Christian groups have increased among professors, intellectuals and students.

During 2004 there was a series of arrests of clandestine Catholics practising their faith outside the recognized associations. Arrests, intimidations, compulsory participation in indoctrination courses and interrogations have been reported in" a number of regions, including

"Fujian, Zhejiang, Inner Mongolia, Henan and . . . Hebei.

In North Korea, over the last 50 years about 300,000 Christians have vanished . . . Believers are obliged to register in organizations controlled by the Communist Party. Those who fail to comply face frequent, and brutal, persecutions. Religious freedom has yet to go global."

Another report by the same news agency described how the destruction of Catholic schools throughout Asia has become the new trend, and is aimed at suppressing religious freedom. The director of AsiaNews said that

"those influenced by religious fundamentalism . . . are no longer content with suppressing individuals; they destroy all objects and buildings linked to freedom of worship".

Those buildings are not just churches; they include schools and the homes of Christians. The aim is not just to silence the expression of faith but to prevent all social cohesion within Christian communities.

I appreciate that it is easy to document the problems. In many ways, it is much more difficult to come up with the solutions. When I was preparing for today's debate, I visited the excellent website of International Christian Concern, which lists in some detail the problems faced by Christians in south-east Asia. I noted that it provides a list of recommendations. The first suggested course of action in each country is prayer for the Christians affected. I practise no religion but respect the rights of others to do so, and I hope that the Minister will do more than just pray. I hope that he will do all that he possibly can, working closely with officials in his Department and others, to put pressure on the foreign Governments who at best allow the attacks and at worst orchestrate them.

In addition, all help must be given to those fleeing persecution, many of whom are living in camps on country borders and creating a new humanitarian challenge. I appreciate that, in many cases, the UK Government's power to influence such matters can be limited. There is no magic wand to be waved, but those difficulties should not prevent the Government from speaking out in the strongest possible terms against such atrocities or from applying as much pressure as possible on the affected countries and their Governments to change attitudes and bring about swift action.

Where the Government do have influence and scope to make a real difference is in the assistance of those who flee their own country because of religious persecution and who face challenges in a new land. I have asked the Government before about the border between Thailand and Burma, over which many Burmese people have fled, where they have lived in refugee camps. It is imperative that all help required by those people is forthcoming, whether that is food aid or, more probably, housing and medical equipment.

Will the Minister update Members on what action the Department for International Development is taking, both by itself and through the European Union, to help other displaced people within either their own or neighbouring countries? Access can be difficult, but when the UK has an opportunity to help, it would be good to know what help is offered and provided.

Many people will listen closely to the Minister's remarks today. He can be assured that he will receive strong cross-party support for the measures that he and his Government take to address the problem. It is not a new problem nor something that can be solved overnight. However, in the 21st century, violence against innocent individuals whose only wish is to practise their faith peacefully and without fear of oppression cannot be allowed to continue.

3.21 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): May I take this opportunity to welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Taylor, and say what a great pleasure it is to serve under your chairmanship?

I also welcome the Minister and add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew), whom I am almost tempted to call my hon. Friend. I congratulate him on securing the debate and on his well thought-out and well researched contribution. He was modest enough to say that he was third choice as proposer of the debate. I am sure that, in the Westminster Hall book, he is always our first choice.

I join my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) in recognising the trauma of the illness suffered by our hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes). We wish him a full and speedy recovery. He will be incredibly disappointed not to be with us today, but the hon. Member for Stroud has done justice to the debate. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire on his contribution. The fact that we have had such a good and positive debate across the parties means that we can bring the subject of persecutions on grounds of faith to a wider audience.

I am sure that everyone will join me, particularly in view of the events last Thursday, in recognising the significance of the good relations and tolerance that we enjoy in our multicultural and multi-faith society. I pay tribute to, and pause to recognise, the work of the Church of England, the Catholic Church and all Christians, particularly considering that we heard yesterday that the perpetrators of last week's atrocities were home grown and came from not far from my constituency. We all stand four-square behind the Prime Minister, offering cross-party support to show that all faiths are able to stand firm against the threat of terrorism and threats to any or all faiths in this country.

Tolerance of other faiths, religions and creeds is a hallmark of modern society and benchmark of any parliamentary democracy. It is important to recognise the right of individuals to enjoy life's freedoms without fear of persecution or violation of basic human rights, and the right to worship remains a fundamental human right. The Conservative party condemns the oppression of individuals on the grounds of religious belief. As the official Opposition, we deplore the persecution of any faith and the prevention of any individual from lawfully practising their religion anywhere in the world. We monitor closely any curtailment of such a basic human right in China, North Korea, Vietnam and other parts of south-east Asia, not to forget those African countries and regions, such as Zimbabwe and Darfur, that have been discussed in previous debates.

I welcomed the announcement of my hon. Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary on the establishment of a human rights group in the Conservative party. We are dedicated to publishing an annual audit of the human rights and foreign policy development records of various Governments around the world. It will be carried out in an informed and transparent manner.

Regrettably, human rights abuses are not confined to south-east Asia and China. Last month, my hon. Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary spoke to a Zimbabwean priest whose parish is at the heart of Mugabe's operation, "Drive out the trash". The priest said to my hon. Friend:

"Tell people what is happening in this country. We need the world to know about our plight."

The long history of abuses and persecution on the grounds of religion is deeply depressing. The Library prepared an excellent supplementary note for this debate. It states:

"Religious persecution in this part of the world"—

south-east Asia and China—

"has been a human rights issue for many years."

I had not previously been familiar with Wikipedia. Its entry for the persecution of Christians in China in the 9th century states:

"Tang Wu Zang (of the Tang dynasty) ruled from 840 to 846. Known as a Taoist zealot, he first suppressed Buddhism in China for its perceived excesses. He then attacked all other "foreign" religions, including Christianity. Nestorianism, the only Chinese Christian branch at that time, was virtually wiped out in China."

An entry about more recent times states:

"When Jiaqing Emperor of China declared the close door policy, Christianity suffered the first drawback. After the Opium War, Christians became a target of hatred, and many Christians were killed in the Boxer Rebellion."

Regrettably, the persecution of Christians in south-east Asia, China and other parts of the world has been going on for many centuries, but it is right that we bring it to the light, as the hon. Member for Stroud, my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire and the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) have done this afternoon. It has been an excellent debate, and we have had a good discussion of the issues. I hope that through this debate we can bring those harrowing tales to the attention of the wider world.

I would like to praise and recognise the work of Christian Solidarity Worldwide, which has had a large hand in preparations for this debate. We congratulate it on its work and on the thorough research that it does in bringing issues to the attention of the wider public.

I would also like to pay tribute to the work of the Foreign Affairs Committee, particularly its fourth report, which was completed in 2005. The Library took from that report quite a few examples of multiple persecutions in China and Vietnam, and also quoted a long extract from the excellent US State Department's report on human rights. Those extracts set out the limits of religious freedom for all religions—not just Christianity—in the countries that we are discussing. In China, for example, Buddhists, Muslims and Christians have all suffered restrictions in recent years, and particular attention has been given to the Falun Gong, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire referred.

I want to take the opportunity to ask the Minister what work our Foreign Office does. I am sure that he is familiar with the United States of America's State Department's annual religious freedom report. That report has documented cases of persecution of Christians in the region, particularly in China and Burma, which are the main Government offenders. There are also examples of human rights abuses by the Vietnamese Government. In Indonesia and the Philippines, Islamist terrorist groups are responsible for most persecutions. That shows, in the words of the Prime Minister today, that Islamic terrorism has gone on in many countries for many years.

With your permission, Mr. Taylor, I will leave the Minister with an extract from that excellent US State Department report at the end of the debate and ask him to comment on the well documented cases in it from the Foreign Office point of view.

The Minister will recall that, when his Government were elected in 1997, the then Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), spoke about ethical foreign policy at length and at every opportunity. We hear little mention of that now. I am interested to hear what audit of abuses the Government carry out, how regularly audits are done—is it on an annual basis?—and what organisation the Government use. It is a source of some disappointment that Human Rights Watch, which has done some excellent work, has not reported on the persecution of Christians since 2000.

I also ask the Minister whether he is minded to act on the request made by his hon. Friend the hon. Member for Stroud to make representations to the authorities in China and Vietnam and to urge them to respect human rights in their entirety. In particular, the right to worship and to practice one's faith should be recognised.

I welcome the excellent debate and the contributions that we heard and place on record our condemnation of human rights abuses wherever they occur, particularly persecution on the grounds of Christianity or of any other faith.

3.32 pm

The Minister for Trade (Ian Pearson): It is a pleasure to serve under your chairmanship, Mr. Taylor. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on securing the debate. The fact that he was third choice, which he admitted, does not in any way detract from the erudite and eloquent way in which he made his contribution. I also offer my best wishes to the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) and hope that he makes a speedy recovery.

I welcome the opportunity to set out the Government's position and to respond to the points of concern that were expressed by hon. Members in the debate. I share hon. Members' deep concern about the persecution of Christians in south-east Asia and China. I recognise that it is an issue that hon. Members and many people in the United Kingdom feel deeply about. I have been a Foreign Office Minister for about two months and from my mailbag I already know about the strong interest that hon. Members have in the subject. First, I will set out some general observations.

Promotion of human rights, including freedom of thought, conscience and religion, lies at the heart of our foreign policy. We condemn cases where individuals are persecuted because of their faith or belief, wherever it happens and whatever the religion of the individual or group concerned. Persecution is frequently counter-productive. Rather than crushing religious belief, it often has the opposite effect and inspires people. For example, the Chinese Christian Brother Yun, while suffering in prison in Burma in 2001, saw himself as a seed

"ready to spring to life and to produce a harvest that will feed many."

It is, in my view, important not only to condemn persecution but to take action on a case-by-case basis. A large number of cases have been raised and I will refer to some of them. I will ask for further information on the others so that we can take them up. We raise our concerns in relevant international forums such as the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. We raise specific cases of religious persecution both bilaterally and with our EU partners. We take every opportunity to urge states to promote tolerance and mutual respect and to protect religious minorities against discrimination, intimidation and attacks.

In general, we believe that dialogue with individual countries, wherever possible, is the best way to achieve our goals. Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials, both here and overseas, work closely with representatives of religious groups and non-governmental organisations, such as Christian Solidarity Worldwide. I pay tribute to them and acknowledge the work that they do in this field.

I want to discuss how that works in practice and mention some of the specific cases that have been raised by hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud set out a number of alleged instances of persecutions of Christians in Vietnam. I share his concerns over any instances where individuals are persecuted or victimised for their faith. We are particularly concerned about the situation of the many unofficial churches in Vietnam, which can be the focus of abuse and mistreatment, particularly by local officials.

I assure hon. Members that human rights, including freedom of religion, is firmly on the agenda in our relations with the Government of Vietnam. We have an open and frank dialogue with Vietnam over human rights, including freedom of religion, both bilaterally and with our EU partners. For example, on 22 March my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Paisley and Renfrewshire, South (Mr. Alexander), raised the issue in this very House with the President of the Vietnamese National Assembly.

As part of our regular EU-Vietnam human rights dialogue, on 7 June the EU, including the UK, pressed the Vietnamese Government on freedom of religion, restrictions on religious organisations and the situation of Protestant groups. We have urged Vietnam to guarantee in practice the right of all religious groups to practice their faith freely in a community.

I believe that international pressure, including by the UK and the EU, is having some positive effect. Vietnam is now moving in the right direction on religious freedom. The US ambassador for international religious freedom, Ambassador Hanford, has recently recognised that and there is now positive engagement between the US and Vietnam on the issue of religious freedom. The Vietnamese authorities have recently eased restrictions on officially recognised Protestant groups and granted recognition to a number of new congregations.

Relations between Protestant groups and the authorities have shown a modest improvement. For example, the new ordinance on belief and religion published last November, and the prime ministerial instruction on Protestantism in February, are steps forward. We hope that they will lead to the recognition of more Protestant groups, so that those groups can worship free from official harassment. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud that the implementation of those new regulations is a key issue.

The EU list of prisoners and detainees of concern enables us to raise specific cases with the Vietnamese authorities. Seven of the 17 cases on the list are religious figures. So far in 2005, nine persons on the list have been released. We welcome that, but we will continue to press the Vietnamese Government for progress on the remaining cases on the EU list, as we did most recently on 7 June. Pastor Truong's case, which we are well aware of, was raised. We share the concerns that have been expressed in the debate over his treatment and are particularly concerned at reports that he has been given drugs. At our suggestion, he has recently been added to the EU list of prisoners and detainees of concern. His case was raised on 7 June. We have also asked to meet him and are awaiting a response.

My hon. Friend also raised the case of Miss Le Thi Hong Lien. We welcome the Vietnamese Government's decision on 26 April to free Miss Lien. We are aware of reports that since release she has faced further harassment, but is still free. We continue to monitor her case.

We remain in touch with the Vietnamese authorities about Pastor Quang's case and those of his Mennonite colleagues, such as Pham Ngoc Thach. Our request for attendance at Pastor Quang's appeal in April was denied, but we will continue to monitor and raise his case. My hon. Friend argued that the EU should have been stronger on the case of Pastor Quang. I assure him that we have ensured that the case is very closely monitored by the EU, and the Vietnamese authorities are well aware of our concerns and interest in the case. We hope that the positive developments that we have seen in recent times will continue.

I shall now turn to the case of Christians in China, and I address the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud and the hon. Members for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb), for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett) and for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh). The UK Government are concerned about the freedom to practise religion in China and follow developments in this area carefully. We raise our concerns at every appropriate opportunity.

As hon. Members will know, the Chinese state constitution permits freedom of religious belief and we acknowledge that the number of people practising religion in China, including Christianity, has increased greatly in recent years. Reports suggest that there are more than 140 million official religious believers in China and that some 21 million people practise through official Protestant and Catholic churches. However, it is very clear to us that the Chinese Government and the Communist party want to control strictly religion in China. That is done through a number of mechanisms: state registration of all churches; state approval and vetting of all religious personnel; and strict controls on the publication of religious materials. In our view those and other sorts of controls seriously undermine, and in some cases effectively deny, the freedom to practise religious belief in China today.

[Ian Pearson]

We receive regular reports about the harassment of unofficial Christian groups in China—many such cases have been mentioned today—that cause us grave concern. In September 2004, Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials raised concerns with Chinese Government officials about the mass arrests of unofficial Protestant church leaders in Xinjiang, Kaifeng, and Wuhan and about the detention of several members of the Baoding diocese clergy.

Of course, sometimes people who are detained by the Chinese authorities are released quickly, but others are held for long periods and are sentenced to terms of re-education through labour or sent to prison. We have received credible reports of torture and abuse of such people in detention. Chinese officials tell us that people are never arrested for being religious believers and that a person must always have done something else to warrant punishment, but in our view there are people in prison in China for doing things that we consider to be the peaceful and legitimate expression of their religious beliefs. Chinese Catholics who, for example, recognise the authority of Rome rather than the Chinese Communist party should not, in our opinion, be harassed or imprisoned.

We have raised, over the years, a number of religious cases of concern with the Chinese authorities, including most recently that of Pastor Zhang Rongliang. Foreign Minister Li and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary spoke about this case during his visit to China in January. We continue to urge that Pastor Zhang has access to a legal adviser of his choice and, if he has to stand trial, that the trial should be open.

The hon. Members for Preseli Pembrokeshire and for Edinburgh, West referred to the new regulations on religion that China introduced in March 2005. The regulations reaffirm restrictions on religious practice and maintain the requirement for all religious groups to register. Penalties are set out for non-compliance. There is an appeals mechanism that may allow local authorities that take a particularly hard line on unofficial believers to be challenged. However, our assessment is that those regulations are aimed primarily at limiting and controlling the development of religion. We do not expect that the situation of unofficial religious believers will improve.

The hon. Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire raised a number of cases, and I shall refer to some of them. We are aware of the case of Jilin province: indeed, Christian Solidarity Worldwide notified the Foreign Office of it. We are monitoring the situation, and our embassy is making inquiries about the incident.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the situation of Pastor Cai Zhuohua, who leads an official church and appeared in court on 7 July accused of illegally printing more than 200,000 bibles. He has been charged with illegal business practices, and the case has been adjourned without a verdict. Again, we are closely monitoring that case. We had 10 religious cases drawn from different backgrounds on the list of individual cases of concern that we handed to the Chinese Government as part of the UK-China human rights dialogue in June. The cases include that of Bishop James Su Zhimin, which was also raised by the hon. Gentleman.

We monitor the situation in China carefully, and we raise incidents and cases with the Chinese authorities, through the human rights dialogue, through ministerial activity and through our support for EU activity. We are always willing to consider action when we have specific information. My officials have heard his speech and the particular cases that he raised. We shall require further information, and I am sure that they will approach either him or Christian Solidarity Worldwide about these matters.

Mr. Drew: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for giving way, and for the kind offer that he has made. Will he also make a special effort for the North Korean Christians who have made their way to China and who are always under threat of being returned to North Korea? I know that the six-party talks are largely about security issues, but North Korea must understand that it must have a realistic approach to human rights. One way to ensure that is to put pressure on China.

Ian Pearson: I understand entirely what my hon. Friend says. I raised the issue of human rights when I visited China last week and spoke to the Vice-Foreign Minister. Coincidentally, I had a meeting with the ambassador of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea only this morning, and I made strong representations to him about general human rights issues and about how they treat their people.

One case brought to our attention by NGOs is that of Jiang Zongxiu. She was allegedly beaten to death in police custody on 18 June 2004 after she was arrested for handing out bibles in Guizhou province. It is clearly unfortunate that Jiang was arrested at all, but one positive aspect of the tragedy—if there can be a positive aspect—was the openness with which the Chinese official press reported her death. The UK Government welcomed that openness and the steps taken later by the Chinese Government to tackle torture. However, as I mentioned in a recent debate in the House on Tibet, more transparency would help to transform the situation for vulnerable prisoners in China and for the policemen and the prison warders who look after them. Our experience in the UK has shown that transparency helps to improve the situation radically, and we hope that China will bear that in mind.

I want to assure the House that the UK Government regularly raise concerns about the freedom to practise religion in China. On 6 June in London, at the most recent round of the UK-China human rights dialogue, which is a bi-annual, high-level Government exchange, we had an exchange about religion. We shall hold our next human rights dialogue with China in the autumn, when we lead the EU-China human rights dialogue.

Ministers and officials also raise human rights concerns, including religious issues, with Chinese counterparts at every available opportunity. I did so last week. I have raised our concerns with the Chinese ambassador to the UK, and we shall regularly press China about its progress on the ratification of the international covenant on civil and political rights, which contains provisions about freedom of belief, freedom of assembly, and the prevention of torture.

Miss McIntosh: What audit do the Government carry out? How dependent are they on non-governmental organisations rather than the resources of the Foreign Office? I have listened carefully to what the Minister said about his discussions with individual countries, and they are very welcome. However, what audit do the Government separately carry out?

Ian Pearson: I shall answer the hon. Lady's question, which she raised during her contribution, but I shall talk first about other issues that have been raised, such as those of Laos, Burma and Indonesia.

Our contacts with the authorities in Laos are limited; relations are covered by our embassy in Bangkok. However, we regularly raise with the Laos authorities our concerns about the persecution of Christians. Only last month a representative of the British embassy in Bangkok raised the issue with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Vientiane.

We also regularly raise the situation of the Hmong people with the Laos Government; most recently, that was done by an official from our embassy in Bangkok. Like the UN Secretary-General, we welcome reports that those Hmong people recently coming out of remote areas have been treated humanely, and we call on the Laos Government to continue to provide the necessary humanitarian assistance to them.

A number of hon. Members raised the situation in Burma. I agree that there remain instances of restriction on the right to exercise freedom of religion in Burma, and we have condemned that in successive, highly critical UK and EU-sponsored UN resolutions—most recently in April's United Nations Commission on Human Rights resolution on Burma, which expressed grave concern at discrimination and persecution on the basis of religious or ethnic background.

We are very concerned that offensives continue in Karen state, despite ongoing ceasefire talks with the Karen National Union. The Burmese Government are well aware of our concerns about human rights abuses in the ethnic minority areas. Most Burmese Christians are able to follow their religion relatively freely, but their freedom of assembly and expression are severely curtailed, as is that of other groups in Burma.

Our views on the human rights situation in the country are extremely well known and we will continue to press the Burmese Government to improve human rights. However, our simple trouble is that the Burmese authorities show no great willingness at all to listen to the representations that we and others make. We will continue to work with our EU partners and throughout the international community to promote national reconciliation in Burma so that all faiths there can live freely. We shall continue to put what pressure we can on the Burmese authorities to ensure that they address the issue of human rights, as they are clearly not doing at the moment.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West and my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud raised the issue of religious freedom in Indonesia and the case of three women recently arrested there. Members of the British embassy in Jakarta are looking into those reports. We have not been able to verify them so far, but will continue to look into the case. Together with our European partners, we are in regular dialogue with the Indonesian Government and we encourage them to ensure religious freedom, to maintain law and order and promote reconciliation in areas of conflict.

We have regular contacts with NGOs, including Human Rights Watch, on the human rights situation in China, and we take their concerns very seriously. They have a part in the UK-China human rights dialogue in that we give them feedback on how that dialogue goes.

The hon. Member for Vale of York raised the question of what auditing we do and gave the example of what is done in the States. We produce an annual human rights report, which is an extremely well researched and thorough document, drawing on a wide range of reliable sources, not just the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and our embassies and consulates. Last year it ran to more than 400 pages. This year's human rights report is due to be published this month. I can assure hon. Members that it covers religious persecution in south-east Asia and China, as well as human rights abuses in all other parts of the world.

Let me finish by assuring hon. Members of the seriousness that the Government attach to human rights abuses in south-east Asia and China. We take every appropriate opportunity to raise human rights abuses both bilaterally with the relevant countries and working with our EU partners and through all relevant international forums. We have a proud and strong track record when it comes to raising human rights issues, and we will continue to do that while we are in government.

Development (Basingstoke)

3.56 pm

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): I initiated this debate because the problems associated with development are an important issue facing my constituency today, and it truly resonates with many other communities throughout the south of England. It was also an important issue during the general election campaign. There was overwhelming concern that house building plans are not necessarily achieving the Government's objective of providing affordable housing and that the scale of their development plans and what they are imposing on Basingstoke, as well as throughout Hampshire and the south-east, are leaving local services struggling to cope with the extra demand. That concern has also been somewhat heightened by a recent South East England regional assembly consultation on further increasing the Government's house building targets in the south of England.

Basingstoke is a great place, and I can understand why more people want to live in my constituency. Location is everything, and Basingstoke is in the right place, being near the capital and the European markets. It is one of the bigger employment centres in the south of England, and it retains an attractiveness as a place to live and a place in which to work and set up a business. Growth has been a good thing for our communities, but at a pace that is sustainable and set by local people with the best interests of Basingstoke at heart. There is a fine line beyond which overdevelopment becomes a burden to communities if investment in local services is not forthcoming. So, we have a responsibility to ensure that services receive the investment they need to cope with that change.

Deep concern has been expressed that, in the past few years, the switch from local control of development to centrally determined house-building targets might be forcing the pace of house building in the south-east beyond what is sustainable within our community. We are starting to see worrying signs of overdevelopment, and the funding of services is simply not keeping pace with that change. I initiated the debate today to highlight that and to call on the Government to change their approach. I also want to reassure my constituents that the Government will listen on how they want their community to develop.

As the Minister will be aware, house building targets are set by central Government. Basingstoke is building 800 houses a year. That number is significantly higher than that determined by my local authority as being required to meet the needs of local families and to ensure the future prosperity of our important business base. More than 6,000 houses are being built throughout Hampshire, which makes my area one of the highest developed in the country.

The impact of overdevelopment manifests itself in many different ways, and there is an ever-present threat to the local environment, be it farmland or countryside. At the moment, there is a particular concern about rural communities to the south of the M3, which are remaining in what has been designated the western corridor by the south-east regional authority. The Minister will be aware that that is a high-density development zone. We will continue to protest about that and challenge it, but I want to focus today's debate on the Government's targets for house building and their effects on local services.

The Minister will be aware of the Roger Tym report, which identified a deficit in infrastructure investment of £8 billion across the south-east of England. Hampshire county council has examined it and has inferred that there is an infrastructure deficit in our county of £1 billion. That means there is a shortfall of £1 billion in spending on the roads we use and on the public transport, schools and water supplies that we need.

For my constituents, that means we have overcrowded trains and a lack of money to support other forms of public transport. That leads to ever-increasing congestion on our roads. I was recently told that we will have the honour of being the first county in the country to have two cars per household. I imagine that the accompanying congestion will have to be considered.

Separately from that, the health care system in north Hampshire—indeed throughout Hampshire—is approaching a perilous state. This year, there is a £40 million shortfall in health care funding in Hampshire, which means a £10 million shortfall for my primary care trust. The Minister will be only too well aware that north Hampshire receives only 80 per cent. of the national average of health care funding. What does that mean for my constituents? It simply means that, although we are still building 800 houses a year, we have no money to build any new doctors' surgeries. There is no money now, nor will there be in the foreseeable future. That is causing deep concern among GPs and their patients.

We are fortunate in Hampshire because we have what I believe the Government term an excellent authority. I find Hampshire county council excellent as well. We are perhaps experiencing a shortfall in funding for some services, but Hampshire has been considering ways to help us out. From its own resources, it has found some £15 million to invest in a new secondary school in Basingstoke to replace the John Hunt of Everest school. We very much welcome that, because we need to ensure that our schools are being built where the new development is. I thank Hampshire county council for the support it is giving Basingstoke in that.

All too often, however, we find that promised improvements in services are not forthcoming. I will outline two brief examples, the first of which is Chineham station. Chineham is a prosperous area and a strong community in my constituency. Part of the development there was to include a station to serve not just the large and vibrant residential community, but two significant business parks—Chineham and Hampshire International. Some years on from that initial promise, we are still waiting for the station to be built.

The other example is a new development in Sherfield park involving some 800 new houses. Quite rightly, my predecessor, Mr. Andrew Hunter, insisted that within that new development a new primary school should be located. Indeed, the developers set aside land for that use. Unfortunately, I have heard in recent months that that land has been released and will not be used for a new primary school now or in the future, because it will be built on for residential purposes. That is deeply disappointing, because it could have provided an opportunity to improve the infrastructure of the area.

All too often there is a lag between building houses and building the necessary services. For example, in a ward in my constituency, one resident in four is aged under 16. It was rightly agreed that money should be set aside to build youth facilities, but several years after the residential development, those youth facilities have not been built.

Most worryingly, the Government's objective of affordable housing is not coming to fruition. There has been investment in Basingstoke to provide more access to affordable housing and shared ownership, but house prices have continued to rise and homelessness continues to be a key issue. The objective is not being met as the Government anticipated when their house building targets were established.

I hear local businesses express concern about the loss of business land to residential use. Business is an important part of the Basingstoke community, and a number of service sector businesses are concerned that if we continue to lose land from business use to residential, that could tip the balance against the success of our local community.

Similarly, if the Government are setting targets and forcing the pace of development, they must ensure that there is investment in services for people who live in the area. It seems, however, that those targets may not be as sustainable as was originally thought because local services are being stretched to the limit. It is inconceivable that we should consider increasing that building rate if the situation persists. The Government rightly set a benchmark for communities to be sustainable, and I look forward to hearing the Minister's views on how Basingstoke fits into that model.

My constituents have voiced their concern to me and to the South East England regional assembly through its recent research study, which shows that the majority of Hampshire residents have called for a reduction in house building. That is surprising. Why have they done that? Perhaps because they are not seeing the necessary progress in affordable housing or are experiencing local overstretch in GP services or congestion on the roads. They are not seeing the necessary investment and are questioning sustainability.

I believe—many people agree—that we need to do more to increase our investment in local people and the skills that they hold locally, rather than just import new people to meet the needs of local employers.

My county has more than £1 billion of deficits and is facing an infrastructure crisis in Basingstoke. The Government must address that issue directly. We know that SEERA is due to make new announcements on the next round of Government house building targets for the south-east, so perhaps this debate is timely. The Minister may find it useful.

In advance of discussing serious recommendations today, perhaps the Minister will put my constituents' minds at rest and give some guarantees about listening to the people of Hampshire and what they want for the future of their community. More than two thirds want a reduction in house building targets. People in Hampshire know what is best, and the Government should consider giving more responsibility back to local people. They should also consider reviewing the funding for affordable homes and do more to value the character of our towns in the way we do as residents.

The Government should give some guarantees today to fill the infrastructure gap that I identified and to ensure that future development is truly sustainable. I look forward to hearing the Minister's assurances on those issues.

4.10 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): I congratulate the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) on securing the debate on such an important issue for her and her constituents. I hope that I will be able to answer her questions. When I cannot do so satisfactorily and to her liking, I hope that I will at least be able to give her some arguments to justify the Government's policy.

It is right and proper to start with some broad-brush policy issues, because how we plan for development such as housing—the hon. Lady concentrated on housing and infrastructure—is fundamental. We thus recognised the need for a faster, fairer and more flexible planning system—in short, a better planning system that addresses many of the concerns and paradoxes that existed previously. That is what the new Planning and Compulsory Purchase Act 2004 seeks to achieve. We have constantly emphasised that planning needs to facilitate development, which, as she said, must be sustainable and inclusive.

We need also to tackle the economic, environmental and social needs of our communities, and I hope that we can agree on the policy objectives. The hon. Lady clearly does not agree with the practical implementation and I shall try to address that. The fundamental question is why development is needed in Basingstoke and in the south-east generally. We must address the need for housing. It is not the Government as such who are putting the south-east under development pressure. Our actions are reflecting that pressure, which exists for a number of reasons. The important question is how those pressures are best managed.

The hon. Lady's council, Basingstoke and Deane council, has an excellent attitude towards housing planning. It is proactive and encourages developers, and it wants affordable housing and growth. I welcome that approach. It is making progress on delivering housing in the district, and several meetings have taken place with the Government office for the south east, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and council officials about that.

However, there is no doubt that we have not been building enough homes generally. In the wider south-east, build rates have been significantly lower than those planned for, but need is increasing because the population is living longer and more people are living alone. The affordability of homes is also a serious problem. According to the latest available figures, there has been a 160 per cent. increase in house prices in the hon. Lady's constituency and there is pressure for housing for key workers. An important part of the infrastructure that she rightly identified involves providing homes for the people who work in the essential services.

The pressure for housing is not because of the population increase in the south-east, but because of how people choose to live their lives and the fact that they are living longer. Given the increase in average house prices, which are running ahead of estimates, it is obvious that those who suffer most are those on lower incomes, yet when in opposition many hon. Members campaign against proposed new homes in their constituencies. The hon. Lady mentioned public opinion, referring to the numbers opposed to new home building. I have no doubt that if such a question were asked, that answer would be given. However, public opinion would have a different slant if the question was, "Do you think that house prices are too high, and do you feel that your children will be able to stay in your area and buy a home there?"

Let us consider the results produced by asking the question, "Do you want continued or increased economic growth?" Public opinion surveys across the south-east of England show that 43 per cent. of the public want economic growth to continue at current levels for the next 20 years, that 26 per cent. want increased levels of growth, and that only 25 per cent. want there to be less economic growth.

I understand why the public in a particular locality might not wish there to be what is perceived as overdevelopment.

Mrs. Maria Miller: Let me clarify my point. I am not arguing about building houses. As the Minister pointed out, there has been great diligence in respect of building houses in my constituency. The point is that Basingstoke is not getting sufficient investment to ensure that the people who move into those houses, or the people who are already resident there, are able to continue to enjoy the quality of life that attracted them to the town in the first place. That is what I want to address, rather than the need, or lack of need, for houses to be built.

Mr. Woolas: I understand the hon. Lady's point, which I suppose she would sum up as, "Don't kill the goose that lays the golden egg." In other words, if development happens in the wrong way, the reasons that attract people to live in a place will be removed. I accept that, but I am trying to establish the fundamentals of why this is taking place. It is incumbent on any Government to address them. Fifty years ago almost to the month the Conservative Government of the time planned to build 125,000 houses across the south-east of England under town and country planning legislation. That was opposed vigorously by Labour Members and the arguments employed were exactly the same then as they are now.

Justine Greening (Putney) (Con): The Minister raises an interesting point. It is incumbent on all Governments, regardless of their political hue, to examine policies, such as that of Wandsworth borough council, which is called "Hidden Homes". It focuses on existing council housing stock, and addresses whether there is space within it to create fresh housing stock that is more cost-effective to build because there is no need to erect an entire building from scratch. Doing that often tackles antisocial behaviour problems—old garages might be converted into new flats, for example. It is incumbent on all Governments, and especially on the current Administration, to look at ways of using existing housing more effectively to prevent building on green belt-land when that is not necessary.

Mr. Woolas: I understand what the hon. Lady says. If I can finish laying out the policy framework first, I will then address her particular point.

The housing market in the south-east is tighter than it has ever been. The region's vacancy rate of 2.3 per cent. is the lowest in the country; the national average is 3.4 per cent. The south-east is also below the Government's empty homes target and the level that is necessary to allow flexibility in the housing market.

What about future housing numbers? Let me establish the background before coming on to the main point. The regional spatial strategy has the purpose of addressing long-term housing needs in a sustainable way. The South East England regional assembly comprises representatives from local authorities, social, economic and environment partners. It is currently preparing the south-east plan to cover the next 20 years—to take us from 2006 to 2026. Local authorities from across the south-east, including the county councils, are engaged in the process. I mention the county councils because there has been controversy about their role. The preparation of the south-east plan involves a statutory process that is clearly set out in legislation, regulations and national guidance. That framework includes extensive consultation, which is built into the process, including an examination in public held by an independent panel. In finalising the plan, the Government will need to take into account all views expressed during that process and the recommendations made by the independent panel. I hope that that goes some way towards assuring the hon. Member for Basingstoke that her views and those of her constituents and other stakeholders—I think that that is what we call them nowadays—will be listened to during the process of the plan.

Clearly, communities are, as the hon. Lady said, about much more than just housing. We will need to work together across the public, private and voluntary sectors to ensure that the new housing development that she talked about is supported by the right infrastructure, facilities and services. The Government have made significant investment in infrastructure in the south-east overall. However, I am aware that the South East England regional assembly and others are concerned about the future provision of infrastructure, and the hon. Lady reflected those views today. Infrastructure is an important element of the south-east plan, and we are in constant dialogue with the assembly about that key point. We clearly want to make the best use of existing mechanisms and to improve on them where necessary. We also want to make the processes for identifying infrastructure potential and requirements and for investment decision making more open and transparent.

I know that in Basingstoke there have been particular concerns, and the hon. Lady mentioned many of them. They include waste water, and she mentioned transport infrastructure in particular. Thames Water is working with the Environment Agency and the regional assembly to model and examine the impact of house building on water quality and supply, which is obviously an important part of the infrastructure. Again, that will feed into the south-east plan. In relation to transport,

I understand that the Highways Agency objected to developments set out in the Basingstoke local plan. That was examined at the local plan inquiry, and I gather that the inspector who held that inquiry is due to report in autumn 2005.

Some of the points that the hon. Lady raised about infrastructure are recognised. Although there has been investment, there are gaps to fill to ensure that the housing development taking place has the services to back it up. Her point is recognised in Government planning policy guidelines. That has been one of the big changes over the past few years. She mentioned affordable housing in particular.

Mrs. Maria Miller: The Minister says that there are "gaps to fill" in investment in infrastructure. Perhaps he could clarify whether the Government intend to fill those gaps and fund that?

Mr. Woolas: I commend the hon. Lady for asking the obvious question. However, the Government cannot fill all the gaps. The way in which—[Interruption.] To be fair, the Government have, as I outlined, put significant investment into infrastructure in the south-east, although I am not surprised that she asks for more. I commend her for doing so because her job is to represent her constituents.

During the process of the 20-year plan and the process of the local plans that have been brought forward already, her main concern about whether such points are being listened to has been taken on board. However, all councils across the country, in growth areas and non-growth areas, argue that they need more money for infrastructure development. I have never yet met a councillor or a Member of Parliament who said that they had more than sufficient money for infrastructure investment.

To get the full picture, we have to take into account the investment that has been made in health, education and other public services. Although the hon. Lady says that new schools and health centres are required but not available, the main drive on infrastructure predominantly comes not from increases in population, but from housing development to reflect changing lifestyles. However, that is not to say that there is not some pressure on population, as she outlined.

On affordable housing in Basingstoke, failure to deal with the availability and affordability of housing will have serious knock-on effects for the more vulnerable residents. Nearly 100,000 resident households are housed in temporary and/or overcrowded conditions. In the borough of Basingstoke and Deane, there is a need under the assessment for 534 affordable housing units per year alone for those unable to afford or rent their own home. The issue is important. House prices are rising significantly. The gross lower quartile annual pay in Basingstoke is £14,082 compared with an average Basingstoke terraced house price of £218,000 in the first quarter of this year. Even a 50 per cent. share in a house in Basingstoke is not affordable for most people. We must deal with that huge problem.

The problem is similar for key worker housing. A £725 million key worker living programme will be targeted to help more than 16,000 key workers in London and the wider south-east by March 2007. The aims of the programme are obvious, and 50 per cent. of the key worker living programme is providing new-build options through both shared ownership and intermediate renting. The hon. Lady is saying that she wants those affordable homes and key worker homes and that she does not object fundamentally to the development. Her concern relates to her perception of overdevelopment and the infrastructure gap.

The hon. Lady asked for guarantees that the Government will listen to the points that she and her constituents make. I think that I can give her guarantees, but not in respect of all the answers that she requires. I believe strongly that the centrality of our 20-year plan and the consultation programme on the need to carry stakeholders forward together is being dealt with. While accepting that she does not want Basingstoke to lose its attractiveness because of such developments—I confirm that it is a very attractive place in which to live—and despite the problems that she has outlined, the alternative of allowing either a laissez-faire attitude towards development or restricting housing and infrastructure development would make those problems even worse. There is an element of trying to move forward together with her local council, the county council and the South East England regional assembly to ensure that we square the circle.

I have tried to address all the points. I am conscious that I have not been able to give specific answers about infrastructure investment. That was not because I wanted to avoid such important questions, but because I believe that the process that is in place for the development and consultation will solicit the answers. I hope and expect that, at the end of the period of consultation, she will have achieved satisfactory answers to her questions.

Under-age Sales

4.29 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I am pleased to undertake the debate this afternoon and to do so under your expert chairmanship, Mr. Taylor, especially in the knowledge that you, too, have taken a personal interest in such matters. The subject that I want to raise is of great importance, not only to the 2.7 million shop workers in the country, but to all members of the public who have a real stake in the security of shop workers who must operate the laws on under-age sales. I am grateful to the shop workers' union, the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, and to the "No ID No Sale" campaign for the materials that they have given me for this debate.

I am pleased to see that a Minister from my old Department is responding to the debate. This is the first opportunity that I have had to place on record my congratulations to her on her appointment, and my good wishes for her success in the important and rewarding responsibilities of her post. The fact that we were in some doubt as to whether the Minister responding to the debate would be from the Department of Trade and Industry, the Home Office or the Department for Work and Pensions illustrates an important aspect of the question of under-age sales. Different Departments are involved, and it is crucial that there is properly joined-up collaboration between them in addressing the issues related to under-age sales and enforcement.

In recent years, in response to public concern, there has been much debate and legislation on antisocial behaviour, on health concerns about smoking, alcohol and solvent abuse, and on the dangers arising from the sale of knives. We are all concerned that tobacco, alcohol, solvents and knives do not get into the hands of the wrong people, and that includes young people. When public debate demands action and Parliament legislates on such matters, it is important to remember that the people who have to put the policies into practice are the front-line shop workers. They are the ones who have to deal with abusive and threatening customers, and who face fines of £500 or higher if they make an under-age sale. I believe that, in placing those responsibilities on them, the state has a real duty to give them every support in carrying out a task that is often difficult and uncomfortable, and sometimes dangerous.

USDAW has produced an excellent and chilling report entitled "Life on the Frontline", which makes clear how exposed shop workers are. The report is based on a random sample survey of 660 shop workers over a seven-day period in June 2004. It revealed 887 incidents of verbal abuse, including being spat at, sworn at and assaulted; 224 threats, including threats to kill, stab, punch and burn shops down; 107 cases of violence, including slapping, kicking and being attacked in the street; 48 incidents of sexual harassment, including lewd and suggestive comments and touching; and 32 incidents of racial abuse, including racially offensive insults and threats.

The most common triggers of violence, threats and verbal abuse included the refusal to serve age-restricted products, requests for proof of age, the apprehending of shoplifters, and the refusal to serve alcohol to drunken customers. I particularly want to focus on the first of those triggers—under-age sales. The "Respect for Shopworkers" campaign has been meeting MPs to discuss that issue today.

As we all know, it can be difficult to assess a young person's age, and too many people become abusive or threatening if they are refused a sale. In enforcing the law, many trading standards departments conduct "sting" operations to catch out shop workers making under-age sales; there are severe penalties for those who are caught and convicted. To avoid prosecution, the seller must take "all reasonable steps" to avoid serving under-age customers, so, if they have any doubts, they must ask the age of the purchaser. If they are still even slightly unsure, they must ask for proof of age, and if no valid ID is produced, they must refuse the sale.

Shop workers do their best to comply with those requirements, but they are in a vulnerable position, as the reports in the front-line survey show. One shop worker reported:

"I refused a young lad alcohol and the next day I got a bit beaten up for it."

Another said:

"When I refused to sell a young fella drink, he hit me", and another said:

"I was told I would be 'cut by their mates' because I refused to sell a bottle of beer."

Such experiences of people being abused, spat at, threatened and subject to sexual harassment or racial abuse are utterly unacceptable but all too common. What is more, the problem seems to be getting worse.

According to figures from the retail industry, reported incidents increased significantly last year: verbal abuse increased 109 per cent. to 146,000 cases, threats increased 161 per cent. to 127,000 cases and violence increased 17 per cent. to 19,000. Some of that may be due to a welcome greater readiness to report what is happening, but no one could dispute that there is a serious problem. Faced with this problem, it is vital that employers, local authorities, the police and the Government fulfil their responsibilities to help and protect shop workers, who are exposed to these dangers in carrying out what are, after all, statutory responsibilities.

Much else that the Government are doing—increasing police numbers, tougher antisocial behaviour measures and the forthcoming Violent Crime Reduction Bill announced in the Queen's Speech—will help to tackle the problems about which I have been talking. However, I should like to mention three specific measures to strengthen protection for shop workers on under-age sales, a factor in many of the incidents that I would like the Minister and her colleagues to take up.

First, it makes sense to have a robust, single, national age identity card scheme to take the guessing out of age-related sales. A number of such cards are in use at the moment and their very proliferation and reliability—some can be downloaded and made up from the internet—cause problems for shop workers. USDAW recommends only the cards that carry the pass hologram, such as the citizen card. As an example of what can be achieved, collaboration in Swindon between the council trading standards service, the police and local businesses, which promoted the card and "No ID No Sale" materials, succeeded in more than halving under-age sales of cigarettes and achieved a target of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister along the way. I ask the Minister to pursue within government the adoption of a robust standard card.

Secondly, such a card needs to be backed up by entrenching a culture of "No ID No Sale", which is supported not only by USDAW, but by retailers, the Association of Convenience Stores and the Tobacco Manufacturers Association. Will the Minister take up the need for a high-profile advertising and information campaign to make it clear that young people will not be served if they cannot produce their age identification card? If that were backed up by signs in shops and other materials, it would strengthen the position of shop workers in trying to ensure compliance with the law.

Thirdly, I am sure that the Minister agrees that we need to ensure that retail employers, local authorities, the police and the courts work closely together to bring to justice those who abuse, threaten or assault shop workers and give them the penalties they deserve.

The Government have done much to strengthen powers against antisocial behaviour, including parenting orders and acceptable behaviour contracts, as well as antisocial behaviour orders. We need those measures to be fully deployed, and we need to work with the shop workers and employers who are prepared to give evidence to challenge and defeat abusive behaviour whenever and wherever it occurs.

As I said at the outset, in carrying out their responsibilities on under-age sales, shop workers are acting and putting themselves at risk on behalf of the whole community. They need and deserve support through a robust age identity scheme, a campaign for a culture of "No ID No Sale" and effective back-up from the authorities. I look forward to a positive response from the Government.

4.39 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Mrs. Anne McGuire): I echo the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) in welcoming you to the Chair, Mr. Taylor. You will appreciate that as a Scottish MP, I have a particular interest in being under your guidance this afternoon.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend on raising the important issue of violence against shop workers. I thank him for his kind words, and recognise that he served with some distinction as Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. He has taken considerable interest in the subject throughout his political career, not just this afternoon. It is appropriate that we are discussing this on a day when the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers is highlighting violence against shop workers.

I should explain why a Department for Work and Pensions Minister is responding to the debate, so that there is no confusion. As the Health and Safety Executive is responsible for chairing a cross-governmental committee on this very subject, and as the DWP is the Department responsible for the HSE, I am delighted to have been afforded the opportunity of responding to the debate, which is on such an important topic.

It is a sad fact that, as a society, we can be faced with violent behaviour in pursuit of our everyday work. Sadly, as we tragically discovered over the past few days, we have to face terrible violence as we go to work, too. Violence is a disturbing problem for society in general, but it does not have to be tolerated under any circumstances, as my right hon. Friend highlighted.

We know from the 2002 British crime survey that there are about 849,000 incidents of work-related violence every year. We also know that some workers are more likely to experience violence than others, including those who work with, or deliver a service to, the public, such as shop workers. These employees work on the front line of their businesses and organisations, dealing with members of the public every day. They can face exposure to drug users and angry or disgruntled customers. As my right hon. Friend said, the behaviour is often caused by refusal to sell age-restricted goods. They are also often faced with those under the influence of alcohol or those with a medical or psychiatric problem. Often, the employees are in low paid front-line jobs, and some may resign themselves to accepting verbal and physical abuse as part of their job, although they should not have to.

Everyone has the right to go about their work without fear of physical assault, intimidation or verbal abuse. Such incidents often have serious consequences for victims and their families, and there are real financial costs to employers. Violent incidents can cause very real distress and emotional trauma. In extreme cases, people can be seriously injured. Indeed, as my right hon. and hon. Friends know, and as you know, Mr. Taylor, one of our colleagues in this House faced such a situation only a few years ago, when he was seriously injured and one of his staff was murdered.

The scale of violence and abuse faced by shop workers is a serious concern, but there is much that we can do, working with others, to reduce it. The Government welcome USDAW's initiative to promote the safety and well-being of shop workers. The abuse faced by shop workers is not merely anecdotal, but has been related in hard facts by my right hon. Friend.

We recognise the problems that shop workers face in correctly identifying the age of people who wish to purchase goods with restricted sale. We recognise the need for many people with influence and responsibility to play a full part in tackling the problem. The Government have been working hard to ensure that a series of measures and initiatives are put in place. We have introduced £50 on-the-spot fines for under-18s trying to buy alcohol—a fine scheme that is currently being piloted in certain areas of the UK. As well as the £50 fine for the over-16s and under-18s, there is also a £30 fine for those who are under 16.

As my right hon. Friend mentioned, we are also looking at the proof of age standard scheme, which will give retailers confidence that ID cards bearing the pass hologram are genuine. From September, retailers will be able to give a clear message to young people: if they have no pass, there is no sale. The proof of age standard scheme is a British Retail Consortium umbrella initiative that certifies cards to confirm that they are genuine. The card issuers will have until September to complete certification, and the introduction will follow an accreditation by the Trading Standards Institute. The scheme is replicated in other parts of the United Kingdom, such as Scotland, with the Young Scot card.

[Mrs. Anne McGuire]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I welcome my hon. Friend's recognition of the value of the pass scheme. Does she agree that entrenching the "No ID, no sale" culture is an important part of the initiatives, and that a Government information and advertising campaign to back that up would help to buttress their welcome introduction?

Mrs. McGuire: I agree with my right hon. Friend that we need to make the scheme part of the culture so that we give confidence to shop workers, in particular, and deal with the problem of when young people cannot prove their age. I shall consider how the Government can promote the September initiative. I want to discuss some of the ways in which we can work together to ensure that we provide shop workers, employers and employees with the confidence to refuse the sale of age-restricted goods.

As my right hon. Friend also stated, police and trading standards officers carried out sting operations in almost 1,000 licensed premises, targeting more than 4,000 troublemakers with fixed penalty notices, and confiscating alcohol from more than 1,800 adults and juveniles. Supermarkets and large stores have taken several specific actions. For example, Asda employees have been empowered to ask for proof of age from any customer buying alcohol who does not appear to be at least 21—not 18, but 21. To deliver that change the company has produced a comprehensive training package for employees.

However, we must recognise that the most vulnerable are small shopkeepers and workers in those smaller premises. There must be help for them. The Association of Convenience Stores has helped to produce a cross off-licence industry "Responsible Retailing Guide", which was sent to more than 30,000 convenience stores in May.

I think that my right hon. Friend will agree that parents, friends and young people themselves must take their share of the responsibility. It must be recognised that retailers work against a backdrop of seemingly more widespread acceptance among parents and other adults that children drink alcohol, and that they sometimes drink to excess. Schools and the public can and do play a useful role by reporting persistent under-age drinking and the purchasing of alcohol, and by reporting gangs of youths who try to intimidate and threaten shopkeepers into selling age-restricted products. The police can then deal appropriately with persistent young drinkers, whether they are individuals or groups.I know from my experience in my constituency that it can take a bit of peer pressure from other members of the community to ensure that adults do not buy alcohol to give to people who are under age.

The way in which employers organise their work and discharge their responsibilities is also important. There is a duty on all employers to ensure the health and safety of their workers. That duty extends to acts of violence and abuse against them. Together with their employees, employers must assess the risks likely to arise from work activity, and put in place measures to control those risks as far as is reasonably practicable. The legislative framework that exists to control the sale of goods to protect vulnerable groups is in place for a good reason. It is accepted that with the responsibility for selling such goods, there is also a need to consider the implications when the sale is refused. Refusal can result in a confrontation.

The Health and Safety Commission recognises that it must adapt to the changes in our society and to the changing workplace. We must find relevant and innovative ways to help employers deal with work-related violence. That is why the commission has introduced a new draft strategy for the future. It sets out an approach that will carry through a programme of real change and, equally importantly, a strategy more relevant to the needs of the workplace in the 21st century. The new strategy recognises that the Health and Safety Executive and the local authorities cannot do it all by themselves; they need the support of stakeholders and stronger links with them. For example, managing workplace violence effectively means engaging with the interests and responsibilities of a number of different bodies, both across Government and in the wider working environment. That is why the HSE chairs a partnership group to take this important work forward. The group meets regularly and comprises stakeholders from across the Government, the TUC, the CBI, local authorities, the Federation of Small Businesses and specialist charities such as the Suzy Lamplugh Trust.

The new HSC strategy signals its intention to understand and value more the contribution that others can make to health and safety. An excellent example of that, highlighted by my right hon. Friend, is the tremendous work undertaken by USDAW through its "Freedom from Fear" campaign. The HSE is collaborating with employers, local authorities and the police, as well as with the Health and Safety Executive's own stakeholder group on work-related violence, to raise awareness of the levels of violence that shop workers face and to promote the message that violence will not and cannot be tolerated. The campaign has been a success. I congratulate USDAW on that and give an assurance to my right hon. Friend that we will build on its good work.

The commission's strategy will also consider ways of working together with local authorities, who are enforcement partners in the majority of retail premises. The aim is to make a greater impact on health and safety to develop more effective ways to get the advice and support to those who need it—the employees as well as the employers. The HSE encourages employers to manage work-related violence as they do any other health and safety issue. It has published general guidance to help employers tackle work-related violence and for the retail sector it has produced specific, practical guidance on how the problems and causes of violence might be tackled.

Training people to deal with difficult and confrontational situations is crucial. We cannot empower workers to react confidently in situations unless they are given the right support and training—training that raises awareness and understanding of the problem, and training on how to read the signs, assess a situation and defuse potential incidents. The importance of training is emphasised in the HSE's guidance and highlighted in a series of case studies on managing violence in small businesses that can be found on its website.

As my right hon. Friend is aware, the commission embarked on a challenging three-year programme in 2001 to help raise awareness and develop further guidance, particularly in sectors most at risk, such as the retail sector. Under that programme, the Health and Safety Executive has published two sets of case studies to help smaller businesses manage the risk of work-related violence. It has also funded the development of new national occupational standards in the management of work-related violence.

The programme was taken forward in partnership with key stakeholders, including small firms organisations. The HSE is now building on the momentum of this programme. The stakeholder group, for example, is looking at the problem of work-related violence, and I assure my right hon. Friend that one of its priorities is to look at work-related violence in the retail sector with a view to developing, promoting and sharing information and good practice with the aim of making that information more accessible.

Finally, I thank my right hon. Friend for securing the debate. I reassure him that the Government firmly believe that working in partnership and developing stronger links with stakeholders is the most effective way forward for tackling the problems of violence and abusive behaviour towards workers. The HSE's future initiatives to tackle workplace violence will be designed to reflect the key principles of the HSC's new strategy for workplace health and safety in Great Britain. In developing its work, it will encourage stronger links with others who have an interest in, and knowledge of, the issue, including the trade unions. It will continue to work with enforcement partners in local authorities for an increased impact in raising awareness of the issue and how to manage it. Perhaps most importantly, in light of the comments made by my right hon. Friend, we are committed to developing a more effective way to get advice and support to those who need it—those on the front line: the shop workers.

Question put and agreed to.

[SIR JOHN BUTTERFILL in the Chair]

Elite Sports

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Tony Cunningham.]

2.30 pm

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): I am very proud and fortunate to be the first Minister for Sport in 60 years to stand before hon. Members and say that London will play host to the world's greatest sporting event—the Olympics. It was just a week ago that we flew back from Singapore. Unfortunately, we flew to a London that was very sad, but we brought back good news for London and the country.

By any standards, securing the right to host the Olympics is an outstanding achievement for a nation. It is a tribute to the extraordinary dedication and imagination of all those involved that they took the project from being a dream to becoming a reality. I pay tribute to Lord Coe, Keith Mills, Mike Lee and all the teams. They have been immense. As was said in the House the other day, tribute should also be paid to all the Opposition parties, because our unity of purpose was a clinching factor in convincing members of the International Olympic Committee that we were serious and that the whole nation was behind us.

I also pay tribute to Barbara Cassani, because, as many people have said, she has been missed out. Had she not put together the company that she did and brought together some of the personnel to whom I referred, we would not have done as well as we did. Halfway through the process, after she got us on to the shortlist, she had the courage to say that somebody else should take things forward, and Seb Coe then ably led the team from thereon in. The bid was the culmination of several years of hard work, commitment and investment and it reflects our commitment to not only elite sports, but sport in general.

Our thanks also go to the IOC, because, in the end, its members showed the confidence in the United Kingdom to award us the bid. We were up against some pretty fierce opposition. The other four bids had a tremendous amount to commend them to the IOC, and any one of the five on the shortlist could have produced a first-class Olympic games in 2012.

There were powerful reasons why we wanted to bid for the Olympics and the Paralympics in 2012. Indeed, the Paralympics are coming home, because the first such games were held at Stoke Mandeville in 1948. I hope, and know, that we will put on a first-class Paralympics again.

The games are the pinnacle of international sport and have an unparalleled ability to inspire, to mobilise and to excite people in their millions. Indeed, we saw what happened when it was announced that the bid would be coming to London and the country. We saw the pride up and down the nation.

The performance and success of our athletes at the games, and indeed of athletes from around the world, will motivate our young people to become involved in sport and remain involved in it for the rest of their lives. That is why it is important that we invest in sport at all levels and provide individuals with opportunities to strive to become the best that they can.

The national lottery should not be forgotten in all this, because it has played a significant role. I pay tribute to those involved in it for the support that they have given sport. The lottery has taken many people from the playground to the podium. It has also enabled us to target funding at our top athletes by introducing the world-class performance programme. That funding has ensured that athletes can train and perform at the highest level. It has helped athletes to pursue their sport while in employment or full-time training. As a result, we have come a long way since the disappointing haul of medals that we had—or did not have—at the Atlanta Olympics. The UK can, and now does, perform at the highest international level.

Since the Atlanta Olympics, there has been increased investment in each four-year Olympic cycle. At Beijing in 2008, our elite athletes will benefit from the biggest investment in elite athletes that has been made to date.

We will continue to make use of first-class training facilities and, indeed, the superb support personnel at those facilities. We have already seen the difference that that investment can make in the performance of our top athletes in recent Olympics and Paralympics. From 36th in the medal table in Atlanta, we went to 10th at Sydney and Athens and in the Paralympics we moved from fourth in Atlanta to take second place at Sydney and Athens. I believe that the increased funding that has been made available for the Beijing cycle and the no-compromise investment strategy that has been adopted by UK Sport will enable us to attain increased medal success at the games. We should make no mistake about it—people talk about lifting the bar, and the bar at the Beijing Olympics will be lifted considerably.

At elite level, it is not enough to stand still. Every country is constantly striving to do better and we must do more than simply match that. The status quo is not an option. The spread of medals in Athens was quite interesting. I think that 76 countries achieved medal status. That base is expanding, which is welcome. That is why we now look to tomorrow's stars. We must be rigorous in identifying talent and nurturing it to its full potential. An approach called the talent development pathway is helping to identify and to develop sporting talent from the playground to the podium.

Our athletes need to be supported at every step of their evolution from talented youngsters to elite performers. We all know—I know it as a father and a grandfather of two—the pressures on young people today. Many diversions are put in front of them. That pressure is significantly increased if they have talent, and there is a need to combine their pursuits with starting and maintaining a career or course of study. It is important that those things be married together. That is where Gifted and Talented has an important role, focusing on improving the identification of talented young athletes, as well as the support and provision for them.

[Mr. Richard Caborn]

If we are to realise our sporting potential, we must have a system that supports our talented youngsters through that critical period. The talented athlete scholarship scheme, known as TASS, and the 2012 scholarships fit into that. The programme bridges the gap between junior representative sport and world-class levels. TASS will enable our athletes to maximise their sporting potential, while continuing further and higher education and—this is important—employment. There may be many young people who are talented athletes who may not be academically brilliant or bright, and will not stay on in education. We need to make sure that the talent of those who leave school earlier to take up apprenticeships is not lost, and that those people have access to all the facilities.

The 2012 scholarship is a strand of TASS. It is designed to fast-track the 12 to 18-year-old group to elite sporting programmes such as UK Sport's world-class performance programme. That programme will ensure that outstanding talent, which might previously have been lost for ever, is nurtured, supported and developed. The programme builds on the partnership formed between education and sport. Education establishments have always been important contributors to our sporting culture. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to our schools and further and higher education establishments, which play a significant role in supporting sport at all levels.

The investment that we are now making in giving every child two hours of quality physical activity or sport every week from the age of five to 16 is starting to pay dividends in many varied ways. That is emerging clearly from the report by Ofsted. Moving from that base to a further two to three hours a week of extra-curricular activity will be important. We want to ensure mass participation in physical activity and sport, and to identify the talent that comes through.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I join the Minister in praising the work of our schools and I agree about the importance of the two hours of physical recreation in schools that the Government are pressing ahead with. Does he agree—I am sure that he does—that we need also to focus on the current high drop-out rate? The latest figures suggest that about 70 per cent. of young people will stop being involved in any form of physical activity when they leave school. We must deal with that.

Mr. Caborn: Very much so—we are doing that. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are investing £60 million through the governing bodies to develop sports clubs. We are encouraging the club-school link, whereby we can ensure that sport is played not only in school but afterwards. Evidence is emerging of the benefits of exposing young children to more than two or three sports. It is argued that the more sports children are exposed to at school, the more likely they are to enjoy those experiences and to carry on participating in sport after they leave school.

One problem is that some sports have been male-dominated. That is true of football, but it is less so now. The film "Bend It Like Beckham" encouraged a lot of young women and girls to play football. About 1.5 million girls and women are registered with the Football Association. Football is the fastest growing participation sport among girls and women. We must offer young people access not only to facilities but to a number of sports. Through the links with the top four governing bodies and others and the multi-sports club approach, we will begin to address the 70 per cent. drop-out rate.

The further and higher education sectors are leading the way on TASS and the 2012 scholarships. The Government believe that TASS and the 2012 scholarships provide the bridge between raw talent and the finely tuned athlete, and are key to elite sports. Our aim is to increase participation in sport and physical activity, especially through the education system, and to identify and nurture talent under TASS and the 2012 scholarships. TASS will receive Exchequer funding of £12 million over four years, and the 2012 scholarships will receive £3 million over three years. We are looking into how we can invest more.

I want our most talented athletes, from whatever walk of life, to follow in the footsteps of our great athletes such as Kelly Holmes, Amir Khan, Ben Ainslie and Bradley Wiggins, who will compete in Beijing in 2008 and in future Olympics and Paralympics.

We have already enjoyed significant success with athletes who have been supported by TASS and the 2012 scholarships—about 1,100 have participated in TASS and 200 or 300 have been awarded 2012 scholarships. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) will be aware that Shelley-Marie Rudman and Amy Williams, whom I met at Bath university, won gold medals at the world university winter games in January—Britain's first gold medals since the games began in 1960. They told me that what we are doing helped them with their achievements.

More recently, TASS bursary recipient Andrew Kennaugh was a runner-up in the 2005 boys doubles at Wimbledon, and Oliver Fisher, who has a 2012 scholarship, has been selected for the GB and Northern Ireland golf squad for the Walker cup. At 15, Oliver is the youngest athlete to represent Great Britain in the competition. On behalf of all hon. Members, I congratulate them on their achievements and wish them every success.

A number of athletes on the TASS programme will represent England at next year's Commonwealth games in Melbourne. We hope to see them on the podium realising their dreams.

It is not enough simply to identify talented people and support them individually through sports governing bodies. We must also ensure that our top and aspiring athletes have the appropriate training facilities to enable them to compete and to deliver success at the highest level. That is why we have invested heavily through Sport England in the English Institute of Sport. We have a nationwide network of facilities and support services for our high-performing athletes.

There has been significant capital investment in the development of those facilities, with Sport England providing more than £175 million from lottery funding. The network consists of nine regional hub sites based at various locations, including dedicated centres and universities. The hon. Member for Bath will know that Bath and Loughborough are probably the two leading universities in that area.

Mr. Don Foster: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caborn: I thought the hon. Gentleman might say that.

The institute is providing for Olympic and Paralympic sports, and our athletes will have the opportunity to take advantage of first-class training facilities and services. Make no mistake—it works. Six to eight weeks before the Paris world athletics championship, which took place a year before the Olympics in Athens, Kelly Holmes went to the EIS in Sheffield, and she says that that made the difference between being good and being the best. She took silver in Paris and went on to take double gold in Athens, which is the difference between getting good support and the very best. That is what the EIS represents—probably the best in the world. We want to continue to build on that.

Examples of the facilities available to our athletes include 50 m swimming pools at Bath and Loughborough. They are fantastic to visit. As I said, I was in Bath a couple of weeks ago, and I went also to Loughborough. I saw kids from the local community, probably with their schools, training in the same place as aspiring athletes and, more importantly, world-class athletes. The inspiration that the youngsters get from swimming in the same pool as a gold or silver medallist is fantastic, and that is shared across the sports—on the track, in the swimming pool and in the gym. That is also happening at the athletics facilities in Sheffield, Manchester and Birmingham, and at the Manchester velodrome.

That is in addition to the iconic stadiums at which top competitors already perform, such as Lords, Wimbledon and the soon-to-be-completed—thank God—Wembley. Furthermore, following the success of the London 2012 bid, our athletes can look forward to competing in several major new facilities, not only in the lower Lea valley, but across the whole of the United Kingdom. For example, there is the aquatic centre, velopark, hockey arena, indoor sports arena and main stadiums, as well as the canoeing centre.

It was interesting in the press conferences in Singapore to talk about our innovation in building sports facilities. We will build an 80,000-seater stadium in the east end in the lower Lea valley, which will be converted into a 25,000-seater stadium dedicated to athletics. However, if we then want to hold the Commonwealth games and increase the capacity to 40,000, we can do that. Let us contrast that with the stadiums in Barcelona and Sydney. Neither has an anchor tenant and both are a financial liability, particularly on the sporting purse.

Unfortunately, that has happened in several cities where the Olympics and other major events have taken place, and there has not been the legacy that the International Olympic Committee wanted. One of the most compelling parts of our Olympic bid was our innovation, part of which I have described. Another part is that, of three arenas, two will be temporary and can be moved to other parts of the UK. Not one facility built for the 2012 Olympics will not have an after-use, either with an anchor tenant or having been moved elsewhere in the UK.

It is an exciting time for our engineers, whether they are construction, mechanical or electrical engineers. Their challenge is to lead the world not only in design but in usage of the facilities.

Mr. Don Foster: I agree with the Minister, but will he acknowledge that, if we are to get real benefit from the technological development and building work, we need to ensure that people in this country get the contracts for the work? Does he acknowledge that there is an urgent need to work with the Department for Education and Skills to ensure that the right skills training is taking place, so that we have people with the relevant skills to win those contracts?

Mr. Caborn: I hope that the Learning and Skills Council is moving in that direction, and not just for those schemes. About £1.5 billion of investment is being made in sports facilities in London alone. One need only look at what is being done at Wembley, at Wimbledon—where they are putting a roof over Centre court—and at Ascot, where £178 million is being invested in the race course.

We have some of the best designers and architects in the world. However, the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right to say that to put up the buildings we will also need other skills. I hope that the regeneration of the east end will be a true regeneration, and that it will be regenerated by the indigenous population constructing those buildings, and not by imported labour.

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): I thank the Minister for his assurances about the investment that will be made in the east end of London. However, may I ask him about my own constituency of Hove? In my constituency, we hope within the next few years—if planning regulations permit—to have a new swimming pool designed by Frank Gehry, the architect of the Guggenheim in Barcelona, with a less than Olympic-sized swimming pool, plus a new premiership-style football stadium at Falmer. Can the Minister offer any hope for my constituency that we will be able to share in the training opportunities and the investment that will reach London?

Mr. Caborn: I hope so. In Athens, 202 teams participated in the Olympics, and one assumes that the figure would be roughly the same for the 2012 Olympics. Many of those teams came to the host nation some weeks, if not months, before the Olympics. We will therefore be looking to identify suitable holding camps. For example, the British team had a holding camp in Cyprus for many weeks, if not months, before the Athens Olympics, and spent a similar time on the Gold Coast, which is in north-eastern Australia, prior to the Sydney Olympics. There will therefore be great opportunities for the British regions. In fact, this evening at 5.30 pm, I will be meeting Sir Charles Allen to discuss the regions to try to ensure that the regional development agencies, the regions and their sporting infrastructure are positioning themselves to take advantage of the opportunities that will be available. We will be looking at that with the Olympic company to ensure that we give assistance.

[Mr. Caborn]

I have talked about real estate, but the EIS is much more than that. It not only provides world-class facilities, but ensures that athletes have access to the best in support services, principally sports medicine and physiotherapy, along with sports science and strength and conditioning work. These days, that is important. We have been disappointed on many occasions by there being far too many injuries, and by the fact that it has taken a long time for the athletes with those injuries to get back on to the park or the playing field. I hope that that is now changing, due to the type of back-up for our athletes in which we are investing. The provision of such services is a vital part of an athlete's training programme to ensure that they are in the optimum condition to compete. For this financial year, more than £10 million has been provided to the EIS company to deliver those key services.

One issue particularly close to my heart, which threatens severely to damage the integrity, image and value of sport, is that of performance-enhancing drugs. Taking banned substances is cheating—there is no other way to describe it. We want our young athletes to know that they can compete and win without resorting to taking drugs. Our Olympic athletes are role models. We cannot be proud of sporting success unless we are certain that it has been delivered cleanly and on merit.

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): Some years ago, in 1988, I did a film for Channel 4 about David Jenkins—a 400 m runner—and drug abuse. I urge the Minister to push for compulsory drug testing of all athletes for 2012.

Mr. Caborn: As my hon. Friend knows, I am a member of the foundation board of the World Anti-Doping Agency. I think that the majority of athletes who win medals will be tested automatically. There is no doubt that the key to ensuring that we have drug-free sport is random testing. The one thing that athletes fear more than anything is the knock on the door and somebody asking for a sample. They do not know when or where it will come, but it is a deterrent that is important for the integrity of the wider code. While I do not disagree with my hon. Friend, I would still say that the best way to eradicate drugs is to increase the number of random tests. However, testing is expensive, so we are trying to get more resources for the World Anti-Doping Agency to ensure that that can happen.

The UK can be very proud of its anti-doping programme. As my hon. Friend said, it is some time since he was involved, but we have been at the forefront of the campaign. As the UK's national anti-doping organisation, UK Sport has carried out some 29,000 tests across more than 40 sports in the past five years, and I am pleased to say that only 1.5 per cent. of tests—that is still 1.5 per cent. too many—resulted in adverse findings, demonstrating that the vast majority of our athletes are competing drug free.

An anti-doping policy cannot, however, be simply to say no to drugs. We need to back up our strict liability rule, and athletes committed to competing cleanly must be given support and access to the best advice. Bad decisions, as we know, can cost them their jobs, their reputations and their lifelong dreams. If we do not educate them and their support personnel about permitted substances, we will put them in a difficult position.

Therefore, we need not only to say that strict liability is not negotiable—it is not—but to provide good education and back-up information for athletes and those who train them. The World Anti-Doping Agency has outlined the importance of education in the fight against drugs in sport, and the responsibility of each country's anti-doping organisation to develop and to implement an educational programme. Thanks to the work of UK Sport, our athletes have received anti-doping education by a variety of means, including booklets, workshops and guidance on UK Sport's website and e-mail service.

UK Sport's drugs information database is the most comprehensive and up-to-date sports drug information service available to athletes and support personnel in the world. UK Sport has recently launched an innovative scheme, the anti-doping education programme, "100% me". It is the first to be accredited by WADA, so, again, the United Kingdom and UK Sport are leading the way. The programme provides the information and resources that current and future athletes will require to help them to make informed choices as they strive to become the best in the world. "100% me" will raise the profile, both domestically and internationally, of the positive and innovative work that UK Sport does to help our elite athletes to achieve success while remaining free from prohibited substances and methods.

In conclusion, if we want to see British athletes on the podium in Beijing, and then in London, with medals around their necks, we must show the partnership and purpose that the bid team showed in achieving the gold medal of bringing the 2012 Olympics here. It has been pleasing in the past three or four years that all the sports have come together, as have the British Olympic Association and EIS, with a sole objective: to produce more world records and more medals, wherever they may be. That effort has coalesced around UK Sport. It is good to see UK Sport as the single body heading the structure. I hope that that will continue. I encourage the BOA, the EIS and other responsible bodies to join the partnership with UK Sport. That is the direction in which we should be moving.

The Government want to be seen to be playing a supportive role in relation to sport. That is why we positioned ourselves behind the bid team and, to an extent, it is how we won the bid. We should do exactly the same when we work with UK Sport and the other constituent bodies that will deliver the infrastructure for elite athletes. We need to ensure the same strong partnership, determination and focus from now until Beijing in 2008 and London in 2012. UK Sport's one-stop plan has brought clear business planning to UK governing bodies. It will ensure that we can make progress in tandem with those governing bodies, and it will aim to assist them to deliver more medals.

I firmly believe that the system of support that is in place, together with the overall investment that we will make in our elite and aspiring athletes, will ensure that they continue to enjoy success at the highest international level. However, we cannot be complacent. As I said, the challenges are great. The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and I continue to review the structure of support and to consider how best we can ensure that we deliver the best for our young people and elite athletes. At the elite level, there is often a fraction of a second between first and second place.

As London has been awarded the honour of hosting the 2012 Olympics and Paralympics, we must use that opportunity to do everything that we can to ensure that our athletes are the most highly skilled, trained and cared-for athletes in the world. Only with the best preparation and planning will we be able to realise the dreams of the finest talent that we have in this country.

3.1 pm

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): Today is a particularly appropriate day to have a debate on elite sports, coming as it does a week after the success in Singapore and a day before the Department of Culture, Media and Sport publishes the London Olympics Bill. I am sure that we all look forward to its Second Reading next week.

On behalf of the Conservative party, I congratulate the Minister for Sport and Tourism on the part that he played in bringing the 2012 Olympics to London. I am well aware of how many contacts he has through his work with the World Anti-Doping Agency, and how much work he did in Singapore. It was clear that the lobbying that he and his Department did played a large part in the decision, and I thank him for it.

It is my view and that of my party—indeed, I would be surprised if this view were not reflected on both sides of the Chamber this afternoon—that the decision to award the 2012 Olympics to London will mark a watershed in the relationship between Government and sport. There are five main reasons for that.

It has been clear in recent years that sport is moving up the list of Government priorities. Again, I pay tribute to the Minister for the part that he has played in that. All of us who believe in sport would say that that is a good thing.

We are now at the stage where the promises made during the bid process must be delivered on. Quite properly, as a result of that bid process and the decision a week ago, public expectation has risen enormously, and it remains an unfortunate fact that the public will probably judge us not only on how we stage the games but, to put it brutally, on how many medals we win.

The seven years between now and the 2012 Olympics is a very short time in which to deliver the games and to do all that we can for elite sports. We must start now if we are going to get it right and deliver on the many promises that have been made. This will affect all of us in the political process.

I shall put five issues to the Minister, using the key theme that London 2012 has changed the whole map of sport, particularly elite sports. I do so, I hope, in the spirit of the cross-party support and co-operation that has characterised the bid thus far.

The first issue is funding. Since I returned from Singapore, it has been obvious to me that the existing lottery funding streams will soon be under considerable pressure. We already know that £1.5 billion is required from various sources to fund the 2012 bid.

Already on Tuesday, the performance director of UK Sport said that an extra £20 million is needed for the world-class performance programme, on top of the £47 million that UK Sport already has. There is also pressure from UK Sport and others to deliver that funding over a longer time—eight years, or two games' worth. Sports bodies outside the Olympic movement are already slightly agitated that the funding will be concentrated on the London 2012 Olympics and that they will lose out.

The expectation is enormous. If anyone doubts that, I draw their attention to remarks by the Prime Minister on Wednesday when asked about Olympic facilities in Wigan:

> "We are determined to ensure that the legacy of the Olympic games will accrue not just to the benefit of London, though a whole area of London will be regenerated. As a result of our success, there will be sports facilities all over the country."—[Official Report, 13 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 833.]

That is quite an undertaking. It is a huge blank cheque and, as I say, expectation is high. If we accept that, it becomes clear, as we look at the pressure that lottery funding will be under, that the lottery cannot fit that bill. In this new era, post-Singapore, what discussions has the Minister or his Department had with the Treasury over the funding package necessary to deliver on the considerable promises made during the bid process, not just for the London 2012 Olympics but across sport?

Secondly, I want to raise the question of the structure of sport. I do not think that that will greatly surprise the Minister. When he took office, he made some fairly uncomplimentary remarks about the organisation of sport in this country. Only a year ago, on 11 July, the Secretary of State described it as "a nightmare". Everyone here knows how complicated the organisation of sport is. When the four sport consortiums appeared in front of the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, they complained at some length about the seven different funding streams.

I notice that the director of performance at UK Sport, Liz Nicholl, following a meeting at the British Olympic Association on Tuesday, complained about the five different funding streams. If The Daily Telegraph is to be believed, she said:

> "The management of the investment in sport should be through one body."

Does the Minister believe that the structure of sport is fit to deliver in 2012, or, indeed, in 2008? If, as he suggested on the day that he took office, that is not the case, what is he going to do about it? It is my view, and that of a number of people to whom I spoke in Singapore, that pretty radical surgery is needed.

Thirdly, I want to raise the issue of the impact of devolution. There seems to be wide agreement that, if we are to succeed in British sport, a British philosophy must drive it. I know that that is an extraordinarily complex political issue, but if we are subsidising athletes who compete against us that has to be nonsense. Four athletes in Northern Ireland competed in Sydney 2000 for the Irish team; we gave them the grand total of £18,200 of English money to compete against us. At the Athens Olympics, another seven drew £35,715 out of our budget to compete against us. That is pretty ridiculous. I notice that the British Olympic Association described devolution recently as the > "single biggest challenge to the sustained success of British sport".

The core issue must be the attitude of the home country sports boards.

[Hugh Robertson]

My own view is that devolution is young enough. I do not underestimate the difficulties for a moment, but there must be some way to put the appropriate measures in place to ensure that home country sports boards do not focus on their own success at the expense of British sport. Does the Minister have any views on that and what steps has he taken to tackle the issue?

The fourth question is that of school-club links. I congratulate the Minister and his Department on the progress that has been made on school sport. Specialist sports colleges are proving to be a success—there is no doubt about that—and school sports partnerships likewise. The Youth Sport Trust, which I visited just before the election, is a fantastic organisation.

There are, of course, still issues with school sport. No one would deny that. The child obesity rate remains the worst in Europe. The two-hour target, although participation is going up, is still only for those in a school sports partnership who have responded to the survey. That takes the figure down a bit. As the Minister's last written answer to me revealed, of the £750 million pledged in 2000, only £106 million has been spent. We will need to do much better than that if we are to deliver in 2012. However, like the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), I suspect that the biggest problem we face is the drop-out rate after school. The people I spoke to in Singapore recently were clear that the school-club link is vital in overcoming those problems. Getting clubs into the schools more effectively would ensure that people were picked up while they were at school as well as after they left. What plans does the Minister have to further the work that is being done and to develop those links?

Finally, I pay tribute to UK Sport for its work on drug testing, which is pretty much the Minister's specialist subject. It has done well, but with the award of the 2012 Olympics, I ask whether an excellent legacy would be for Britain to be acknowledged as the world leader in anti-doping. As I said, I acknowledge the work that is already going on, but there must be a conflict between drug testing and promoting elite athletes. Does the Minister have a view on the matter? Does he think that a suitable legacy for 2012 would be a wholly independent anti-doping agency, separate from UK Sport?

I finish my speech where I started. Again, I pay tribute to the Minister and to his Department for the work they did to bring the Olympics to London. It is the most fantastic opportunity for sport. If we are to make the most of it, it must mark a sea change in the relationship between Government and sport.

I ask the Minister to address the five points that I put to him on funding, structure, the impact of devolution, youth drop-out rates and school-club links and doping. The seven years between Singapore and the start of the London Olympic games in 2012 seems a long time, certainly in parliamentary terms.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I almost called him my hon. Friend because of our sporting links; in debates of this sort, that is only right. Although he rightly focused on the seven years until 2012, does he agree that there is a danger of our forgetting 2008? We need to be sure that we do well in Beijing.

Hugh Robertson: The hon. Gentleman is right. I suspect that there is a danger coming our way in 2007. There is euphoria and a huge sense of purpose behind the whole business at the moment, but if we are honest we know that the track and field stable is bare. Achieving some of the targets that have already been set for medals in Beijing will be quite an undertaking, especially if the Minister is right in saying that the bar will be raised considerably in 2008. If, two or three years hence, the 2012 project is bogged down in any way—for instance, if there are delivery problems and the costs look as if they might rise—just when we are going through a sticky period in track and field, it is likely that public support for it will drop, as often happens in the middle of a project. We must all guard against that. The hon. Gentleman made a good point.

Seven years seems a long time at the moment but, as hon. Members know, the reality is that it will be a considerable challenge to deliver the success in elite sports that this country requires over that period. As I said, I hope that the decision in Singapore marks a watershed in the relationship between Government and sport. The difficult thing will be to deliver it.

3.13 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): The way in which cross-party unanimity played a part in the build-up to our being awarded the Olympic and Paralympic games 2012 has become apparent during the debate. It will also become clear from what I say that there is a fair amount of cross-party unity about what we are doing now and what needs to be done.

I apologise to you, Sir John, and to the Chamber for echoing some of the points that have been made in the two preceding speeches, but I begin, as did the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), by saying how delighted everyone should be about our success, despite having to come back to a London devastated by bombs. That should not take away from the huge achievement of the 2012 bid team. We should continue to give our thanks and praise to Lord Coe—I note that one newspaper has labelled him "Lord of the Rings"—to Sir Keith Mills and to the rest of the 2012 team.

Equally, we should acknowledge the enormous work done in Singapore and before by the Prime Minister, by the Secretary of State and, as others have said, by the Minister himself. I congratulate the Minister and thank him for the enormous work that he did in helping to win such a fantastic opportunity for sport, tourism, culture and much more, not only in 2012 but in the intervening seven years, which will give us the chance to showcase what we can offer the world.

I join the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent in praising the Minister for his work with WADA, particularly in the few weeks preceding Singapore, and his latest initiative to seek money from pharmaceutical companies for education and research into anti-doping. He has already successfully persuaded some companies to part with money, and I wish him well in persuading others to do so. He is right to ask them to become involved in education and research but not in anti-doping activities. To do otherwise would create the potential for a conflict of interests.

As others have said, winning the 2012 Olympic and Paralympic games means that sport in the UK is now operating in a different landscape. It is crucial that we use that change, that new opportunity, to ensure that we do well in Beijing in 2008 and here in 2012. We can be proud of what we have already achieved. We won 30 medals in Athens, which was two more than we won in Sydney and 15 more than we won in Atlanta in 1996. It is not only in the Olympics that elite sportsmen and women are doing well. I pay tribute to Ellen MacArthur, who recently broke the record for non-stop solo circumnavigation. Many other examples could be cited. Expectations for sport in the UK are rising in the lead-up to 2012.

It must be acknowledged that that success comes at a considerable price. UK Sport invested more than £70 million in the British Olympic team for the Athens games. I do not want to be mercenary, but that works out at £2.35 million per medal. For Beijing, we have a target of 47 medals. More would be even better value for money, but if we achieve that target, it will have cost £1.6 million a medal. However, funding is important not only for elite athletes in the build-up to the Olympic games and other important sporting events, but for the work necessary to support grass-roots sports, from where will come the elite athletes of the future.

As the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent said, many bodies are involved. When I was given the job of speaking on behalf of my party about sport, I asked someone in my office to dig out a map of how things work. We cannot place a map on the record, but it is pinned to my office wall to remind me how incredibly complicated are the linkages between the welter of bodies involved.

As the hon. Gentleman said, the subject has been referred to recently by a number of people. I reflect on the words of one representative of the Rugby Football Union when he was giving evidence. He talked about the urgent need to find ways to simplify all the different funding streams. As the hon. Gentleman noted, the Secretary of State herself has said that the plethora of bodies and the plethora of links between those bodies are a nightmare.

The Minister was right to highlight some of the good work that is being done by the different bodies. He did not make much of the world-class performance programme, which is doing some phenomenal work. It is doing not just the work that people intuitively think it should be doing, which is supporting individual athletes, but so much of the additional work that is necessary to support the athletes, such as coaching, sports science and medical back-up, ensuring that there are opportunities for acclimatisation and providing the appropriate training facilities. It is one of the many bodies that are working hard.

If we are discussing all bodies and all the funding that they provide, clearly some difficult choices must be made. It is easy to put in more and more money, and I acknowledge that we cannot just call for more money, even though more money would be welcome. It is worth reflecting on the fact that, during the 2001 to 2005 summer Olympics cycle, UK Sport gave £70.4 million to 17 Olympic sports, including badminton and softball, supporting an average of 480 athletes.

UK Sport's total investment for the next four-year cycle, 2005 to 2009, is scheduled to go up by 7 per cent. to £75 million, but at the same time it plans to support 160 fewer athletes. It is taking a different approach that targets specific medals for the Beijing Olympic games in 2008. By doing so, it means that several sports will lose out. For example, we have discovered that gymnastics, triathlon and judo will not be beneficiaries of the increased funding.

Derek Wyatt: Is there not a dilemma? If one is talking about elite sports, one must be ruthless. Either the sport is elite, or it is not. It is elite if gold medals are won in it, such as in rowing or in cycling, which then receive more money. If those sports do not deliver, it cannot be the fault of the Government, it must be the organisation.

Mr. Foster: I entirely agree. Tough choices must be made, and that is what UK Sport is doing. We must recognise that as a result, however, some sports will lose out. We must ensure that, through other means, not necessarily the elite sports programmes, of which there are perhaps too many, we continue to recognise the importance of other sports. Giving evidence to the Culture, Media and Sport Committee, the RFU representative said:

"More medals and national pride, and more players and national health, are two separate elements, which can feed each other, but are fundamentally distinct areas."

We must understand that, and we shall have to make tough choices. UK Sport is right to make them, but I hope that we shall find other ways of supporting sports that, as a result of such decisions, may lose out.

Several sports may lose out because the IOC changes the list of sports that are deemed to be Olympic sports. After we left Singapore, the IOC continued its deliberations, and baseball and softball were dropped from the IOC programme. I say not entirely tongue in cheek to the Minister that we have an opportunity to select one additional sport for the 2012 Olympics. My hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) would not forgive me were I not to suggest to the Minister in a gentle way that, now that darts has been accepted as an official sport because of my hon. Friend's untiring efforts, we should consider choosing darts as that sport. By saying that, I have paid a debt to my hon. Friend. I will leave it to the Minister to respond appropriately.

The hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent rightly pointed to the issue of where the money will come from. We must be clear that there are concerns about future funding support for our elite athletes. We know that the amount available through the national lottery has decreased. That money is, to some extent, being made up for by a modest increase in funding from the Exchequer.

As there is pressure on the other aspects of sports funding because of the introduction of the Olympic lottery game, we need to be sure that we do not reduce the support and funding for our grass-roots sports activity while we try to find the money that we urgently need to ensure that we can deliver the games in 2012.

[Mr. Foster]

I join the hon. Gentleman in asking the Minister to give us his thoughts on how the overall package of funding from the national lottery, in its various guises, will pan out. I share the hon. Gentleman's desire to hear more from the Minister about the Department's plans for helping to simplify the complex map to which I referred earlier. The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport has described that map as a nightmare.

I also pay tribute to the Minister for a number of the other schemes that he has been responsible for establishing. TASS is crucial. It is doing phenomenal work. The addition of the 2012 scholarship to that is vital. I was delighted that he praised the work that is going on in schools and drew attention to the crucial link that is being developed between local community sports clubs and local schools. That link was long overdue, but it is happening and it is to be welcomed. I also welcome his comments about the importance of making available in our schools a wider range of sporting opportunities for young people through the club-school link.

Only by giving a wide range of opportunities to young people in school will we ensure that they can find a sport with which they feel comfortable, which they enjoy and a passion for which makes them want to carry on doing that sport after they have left school. As I said in an intervention, it is particularly disturbing that the 70 per cent. drop-out rate has remained constant for a number of years. We must break that, not only to help us to find elite athletes for the future but because of the other side of the issue about sport that is so important: tackling this country's obesity time bomb. The link between club and school will, I suspect, be one of the key elements in helping to break those disturbing figures.

I am grateful that the Minister referred to the important role that the English Institute of Sport plays in helping to develop some of our athletes. One of the many things that I picked up and which I heard about more than I expected to when talking in Singapore to a number of our elite athletes and sporting heroes, was the issue of coaching. Many of them displayed a clear desire for us to find ways to improve coaching facilities and provide support and training for coaches. I welcome a number of the schemes that have started. It is clear that, if we are to have success with our elite athletes, they need the best in terms of medical support, sports science and so on, but in particular they are keen to have improved coaching facilities.

The Minister was kind enough to refer to the university of Bath and the sports activities that go on there. I pay tribute, of course, to the hon. Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) and the work that he has done at Loughborough—the two of us seem to be a double act on these occasions. The Minister will be aware that Bath university has a coaching programme as part of its university degree activities. There is an urgent need for him, perhaps working with his colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills, to see whether it is possible to help to develop that programme.

The Minister will be aware of the wonderful work that is already going on at the sports training village based at the university of Bath; he was there recently. He will know that it is a purpose-built, world-class training facility. It already provides a training home for some 300 British elite athletes. Fourteen sports have chosen to base some or all of their training programmes in the city, and people there are looking forward to further investment to keep them ahead of the international competition. I hope that they will receive Government and lottery support as they seek to move forward to provide the best and perhaps even get further ahead of Loughborough in terms of the facilities on offer—that is a battle that the hon. Member for Loughborough and I will have separately.

Winning the Olympics provides a fantastic opportunity but, as others have said, much remains to be done to turn that opportunity into reality. We must ensure that the promise that we made to people throughout the United Kingdom—that every part of the United Kingdom would benefit—is delivered on.

I end with the other hope on what we will achieve. The Minister said that it was a dream that has now been turned into reality, but what I remember most was watching the presentation to persuade the IOC to back London for the games. Above all, that presentation said that what we aspired to do with our bid was to give a dream to young people not only in this country but around the world. So the dream is not over. We must ensure that the work that we do over the next seven years builds up that dream not only for every person in this country but for many around the world.

Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): I was not quite sure what the tenor or scope of this debate on elite sport would be, but I am glad that I have attended it. When the Minister said that he was very proud and referred to the first time in 60 years, I thought that he was going to say that this was the first ever debate on elite sport. He did not say that, but I do not think that there has ever been a debate on this issue in the history of the House, so this one is good and timely, coming just after the success of the Olympic bid. The debate would have been just as interesting if we had lost the bid, because then we would also have had to rethink what we were doing. In any event, it is good to be here.

Sport has been part of my life. It might be difficult for people looking at my body today to appreciate that, but I was a top-class rugby player and I was also the leading long jumper in the United Kingdom at under-17 and under-19 level. Sport has changed my life in many different ways. I have to admit that I was even on the coaching staff at Bath university.

Let me give one or two reactions to what hon. Members have said. At the moment, sport is out of kilter politically. We have said that the Olympics provide a great opportunity, but we can get rid of the bar charts, the flow charts and the management speak that tell us what sport is only by coming together and demanding a Secretary of State for Sports. Given the Olympics in 2012, we have the chance to do that over the next four years.

It is important that we merge Departments and include health education and sport at school. Most of us have spoken about sport and school, but the poor Minister has no real control over that, although there is a joint committee in the Department for Education and Skills. That is one problem and why one Department on its own would help. I cite the example of what is now the Department for International Development, which used to be under the thumb of the Foreign Office until it was separated and which now has a bigger budget than the Foreign Office. That would not have been possible if international development responsibilities had not been de-merged into its own Department. If we want elite sport, we must have elite Government Departments too.

Rowing and cycling are our best sports—I touched on that in an intervention on the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster). We were outstanding at judo and the martial arts in the 1980s and early 1990s, but for some reason they have slipped. Those sports are not in the big five that the Minister mentioned—rugby league, rugby union, cricket, tennis and soccer—but they do not need to be, because they are so brilliant in themselves. However, I ask the Minister to consider whether those sports demand skills that the others do not.

We are not that brilliant at soccer or rugby, we have not won a world cup at cricket, and as for tennis, let us not go there. We have not had a woman win Wimbledon since 1977—in fact, I do not even think that a woman has gone further than the third round since Sue Barker and Virginia Wade in 1977. There is something fundamentally wrong, so I wonder whether the big five could learn something from rowing and cycling.

When we say culture in this country, we mean opera or literature, but not sport, although I think our society is on the cusp of a real change. Sport is beginning to nudge the opera set, the literature set and the media set, and the Olympics give us the opportunity to push that boat a little more. There has been a cultural lag, but the Olympics give us a wonderful chance. Having seen the Commonwealth games for a week, I know that I shall be at the Olympics every day. I cannot believe that we will have the opportunity to see the Olympics.

I commend my co-tenant, the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson)—our constituencies are next door to each other—for raising the big issue of funding. It has been raised before, but I will keep going. We have the 12p in the lottery pound, although we still do not know whether we get it back for the Olympics. I accept the hon. Gentleman's point that we will not have enough money. Securing the funding might be difficult because the DCMS is not seen to hold its own against the Treasury. Therefore—I shall be shot by the Whips for this—I wonder whether it would be helpful for a joint Olympic group to come to the House with the ministerial team and give a presentation to Treasury civil servants.

Might it be possible to float the idea of an Olympic bond? I think of Patrick Carter's thinking outside the box as chairman of Sport England. When we think about the audit of need, we find that most counties and metropolitan boroughs do not have very many good Olympic facilities. As has been mentioned, 202 teams are coming, but when push comes to shove only about 35 teams will set up camps in the United Kingdom, for swimming, tennis or whatever else. However, we do not have the facilities in our counties or metropolitan boroughs to host so many teams. If enough countries liked the bid, 60 or 70 might come, for a range of Olympic sports, and we would be overwhelmed. As a result, those teams would look to France, Germany or Italy to take them and we do not want them to go there—we want them to come here.

We are in an interregnum, during which we are not sure what will happen next. I know that the London Olympics Bill will arrive on Tuesday, but I am not sure that it will contain such detail. I cite the example of Kent county council, which is my senior authority. We have no Olympic facilities in which we would want to host a team from America or Australia. I asked Sandy Bruce-Lockhart, the Conservative leader of Kent county council, whether it would be possible to put together a group comprising a team from the South East England Development Agency, a team from Locate in Kent, a team from the Kent ambassadors—the business group—MPs from Kent and Sandy himself, so that we could better understand what we need. More than that, and since all MPs will be involved, could we have some sort of Olympic challenge day? The Minister could speak, and perhaps Seb might be asked. Would it be possible to do that in October or November?

We are struggling. My little constituency of Sittingbourne and Sheppey has the best windsurfing facilities in the world, but it has no hotel, and there is no chance of building one that could host windsurfing teams from around the world. Not only that, we would need a post-use for the hotel, so I start to think that we could bid for a specialist sports school for water sports. Then I ask whether the hotel could be used as classrooms afterwards and whether there would be some way to attach it to a school. When one gets to that sort of detail, one must ask the International Windsurfing Association whether it can host the teams. It is confusing to have to go through the international organisations for all the Olympic sports before we get to the national organisations or the Olympic bid. One can understand why most people find it complicated. Could the Minister could put together a challenge day so that we can better understand what has to be done?

There is no question but that the Olympics are exciting. Everywhere I have been in my constituency, people are really excited. They are also excited by the tourism opportunities and the infrastructure and all that will come with the games. I asked about sports schools during the statement in the House last week. Is there a ban on the use of the word "Olympic"? Could we have Olympic sports schools that would become hubs for the sports? There are eight sports schools in Kent. It would be great if we could say to them, "Tomorrow you can change your name to Olympic sports school." Such schools could be used during the next seven or eight years to build up confidence and expertise and get kids involved. That would be such a fantastic thing to do.

In my spare time, I am a trustee of TimeBank, which has been charged with the volunteers programme for the Olympics. In fact, we were charged with it before the Olympics were awarded to London. Hon. Members might like to know that every four seconds someone registers to volunteer. We have been going only a month, but 15,000 volunteers have already registered. That is spectacular, and I am sure that we will get 70,000.

The buzz around the Olympics bid was extraordinary, and it was there all the time. We had a debate on the Olympics about a month ago in this Chamber, and one could feel the change at that time. One could feel the change in the team and in the confidence of Seb and everyone else. They deserve more than a pat on the back. They have done brilliantly well, and so has everyone who supported them.

[Derek Wyatt]

Let me finish with an idea about the extended school hours initiative. My local authority, Kent, has been given £10 million for out-of-school activities from 8 o'clock in the morning till 9 and from 4 or half-past 4 till 6. As that money will not go very far in the largest authority in the country, I wonder whether the Minister could come up with an initiative to involve clubs and bodies that would like to do coaching in the schools during the extended hours.

We could be even braver and pick up on points that have been made in the past two years and that the hon. Member for Bath made again about obesity. I hear people gasp when I say that my children get reports with marks of, for example, B-plus, D-minus or A in their subjects, but for sport, the report says "Tries hard". It does not give hand-eye co-ordination or body-fat measurements.

I know that there are issues about whether one should include a body-fat measurement, but could a voucher scheme be offered to parents and children who need to take care? For instance, if my son were to get a B-minus in maths after getting an A-plus the year before, he would get a note that his parents would have to sign to agree that he would take extra maths—bless him, he does not have that trouble. Why can schools not offer extra physical education, salsa dancing, rock climbing or whatever if they are needed to develop good behaviour and good sporting techniques in children? It would be a useful challenge to come up with a way to build the Olympics brand and include it in out-of-school extra activities.

Everyone else has said well done to the Olympic bid team, which has done spectacularly well. As I said, we have the most amazing opportunity for probably the first time since 1948 to galvanise sport in our society.

3.44 pm

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): I thank the Minister both for the successful bid and for the investment that the Government have made in schools in Hove and Portslade. I draw his attention to an area of sporting activity that is popular in my constituency: the use of the sea for sailing, surfing, windsurfing, kite-surfing and kite-buggying. Those are fast-growing sports. Indeed, extreme sports are the fastest-growing area of sporting activity in the country. The world championship kite-surfer is a British athlete, yet he and many others found that when they were schoolchildren—he is only 17 so that is not long ago—individual sports such as kite-surfing and tennis did not get the same funding as the team sports mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt), including rugby, football and netball.

Individual sports are difficult for young people to pursue to a county or regional level. I appreciate that the very best tennis players are given additional help, but the middle-level players, such as my son—perhaps I should declare an interest—find it difficult to explore the sport without private funding or sponsorship. Although the initial outlay for extreme sports is very high, at least the sea is free. In the case of tennis, though, it is difficult for young people to find a level without playing with opponents of a similar standard and belonging to a tennis club. I appreciate that 70 per cent. of the schools in the school sports partnership have tennis as a major sport, and use of the facilities at schools will increase after the extension of school hours, but I would like an assurance from the Minister that participation in those sports will be free to all and that they will be open not just to those who can afford them, but to those who would have to request help with funding, which, as I am sure he is aware, is not something that parents like to do.

As I know from experience as a school governor, an educator and a parent, participating fully in tennis is difficult without professional coaching, extended hours for tennis and the funding to move around the country to participate in competitions. Young people find that enjoyment and local success in the sport is difficult unless they have financial backing. Even in many of the clubs that young people can join if they have financial backing, participation is difficult because they are designed primarily as leisure facilities. Perhaps they are seen as places to play an elite sport—in the wrong sense. In other words, they are aimed at over-25s and people who enjoy playing tennis rather than those—particularly the young—with a hard competitive edge. Young people need to feel valued and welcome. The Lawn Tennis Association has tried to address the issue many times, but it has significantly failed and has not yet coped with the elite aspect of tennis, particularly at county and regional level.

I urge the Minister, if possible, to put more money into individual sports for young people and to ensure that the guaranteed two hours of sports a week include individual sports as well as the team sports that raise a school's profile and improve its reputation in the immediate area. I beg him to put as much effort as he did into darts into sports that young people in particular find most exciting, such as extreme sports and surfing—the sports of the sea that are so important to my constituency. I hope that elite sports will include the sports that young people find exciting and challenging—sports that are not seen regularly on television or watched by millions of people, but for which people in my constituency have a lot of passion. My hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey mentioned that an elite sport is a sport in which we win medals. Surely the fact that we have a world championship should ensure that kite-surfing at least is seen in that way.

3.50 pm

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): I apologise for not being present at the beginning of the debate; I was trying to return as quickly as possible from participating in the best elite sport that I have ever been involved in—representing the House of Commons and House of Lords tennis team at Wimbledon this morning. This is the first report to be made. Unfortunately, we lost gloriously. I think that someone did take a set, but it is, I am told, the taking part that counts on such occasions. We certainly took part, if nothing else. To follow on from the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Ms Barlow), it was a fascinating example of differences in experience—in this case, my experience of the tennis that my son plays on a hard court in my constituency compared with the glorious facilities at Wimbledon. That is one of the reasons why today's debate is important.

The debate is rightly focused on 2012, the excitement of last week and what we can achieve. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) said, elite sport is present all the time. It is not as if no one will do anything between now and 2012 when we will focus all our attention on it. This country has world champions; I am sure that many hon. Members have one or two in their constituencies, and in a range of sports that do not get great national attention.

Netball is an example. We have the netball centre at Loughborough university, and we are fourth in the world at netball. Because it is not an Olympic sport it does not get the profile that it deserves. Admittedly, we are fourth and would like to do much better, and I am sure that many other sports could also benefit. However, as the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) said, there are difficult choices to be made in funding elite sports.

I shall discuss some issues that have already been touched on in the debate, and shall pay some tributes, in the light of the position we have come from and where we are now. The hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) rightly highlighted the number of medals that we won in 1996, and how many we anticipate winning in Beijing and after that in 2012 in the UK. I was given a joke to use at the Labour party conference, although I never got to use it, after the 1996 Olympics when we came back with only one gold medal—the joke was about it being typical of the country in those days to win a gold medal for going backwards faster than anyone else.

Derek Wyatt: It is a good job my hon. Friend did not use it.

Mr. Reed: That is right. That is why I said the joke was given to me, rather than being my own. However, it symbolised the difficulties at Atlanta and how difficult it was to compete at the international level.

Since then it has been interesting to talk to elite athletes about the difference between Sydney and Athens. My friend Jonathan Edwards won a gold medal with a worse performance than he gave when he did not win one. Sometimes the focus on winning gold medals is counterproductive; someone can perform worse than they might on another occasion, but if everyone else does that too, they may still come away with the gold, not even having achieved a personal best. We should think about whether success is measured in gold medals, personal bests or even world records. There are many ways of measuring how we are doing at elite level.

There are areas in which we are having difficulty. Track and field have already been mentioned. I am afraid that most people regard the Olympics as track and field, and that people focus their attention on that, rather than on other sports at which we may do particularly well, such as sailing, rowing and cycling—in which we are currently winning our medals. That presents difficulty for us, in relation to reaching elite level, and not just in 2012. We do not want to come away from Beijing without securing a decent number of medals. The danger is that the people who will be performing in Beijing are already in a world-class performance programme. We will not find them suddenly in school. Some may emerge late, and I hope that there will be many opportunities for that to happen, but, in reality, we shall be working with the pool of talent that we have now.

I am sure that those hon. Members who are lucky enough to have constituencies where parts of the English Institute of Sport are situated, and who know some of the 150, 120 or 200 international athletes on our campuses and towns, are very proud of our achievements. However, everything can rest on one day's performance. I am very proud that Paula Radcliffe is one of my constituents. We all know about the great hope: she was guaranteed a gold medal at the Athens games, but one day's performance can change things quite significantly.

We know from Sir Clive Woodward's performance on the Lions' tour to New Zealand over the past few weeks that someone can go from hero to zero very quickly in sport. I will not dwell on the Lions' performance, but they were supposedly our best prepared and best trained team and they had gone out there with as many back-up staff as players. I note that there are several Welsh colleagues present, and they will have their own reasons to explain why we were defeated. None the less, we provided the best and allegedly had the most elite players in that particular sport, but we still managed to come up short. Therefore, although it is right to talk about funding and other issues—and I shall come to those later—we sometimes simply need to have the right people, in the right place, at the right time. At the end of the day, that will have an important impact on our performance and our readiness for the Olympics, because not only a lot of preparation, but a lot of luck goes into these things.

The hon. Member for Bath and I seem to be shadowing each other in these debates, and we have a great common interest in these issues, because we have the facilities on our doorsteps. Seven or eight years ago, however, there was very little at Loughborough or Bath, although the universities both had great reputations, based on what they had supposedly done in sport. Now, Loughborough university consistently sweeps the board in the British Universities Sports Association championships. I first went to watch sport with the chancellor on a Wednesday afternoon, and of the 60 games in which the university took part, it won 57 at first, second and third-team levels in every sport. The vice-chancellor was disappointed that we had lost the other three games, but that shows the standard that was expected.

When one looks at the facilities, however, one sees that the elite swimming squad was swimming in a 25 m pool built in the 1950s—strangely enough, it was built for the old Loughborough college by my father-in-law, who was involved in property at county hall. One crucial point, which has been mentioned already, is that, because of the coaching that we had at Loughborough, swimmers came to the university not only from across the United Kingdom, but from the Swedish squad—we were producing medals out of a very old, defunct 25 m pool, which is still there and is still used. That demonstrates again that there has to be a combination of not only facilities, but coaching and the right athletes, who must be in the right place, so that they can be identified and can get through. There is, therefore, an element of luck, but we can only build on that luck by putting in place the right facilities, the coaching and all the other support that goes with that.

We are very lucky in what we now have in Loughborough. Some £35 million has been spent on the campus over the past four or five years. That has attracted other facilities, and I am grateful that the cricket academy has its home there. A great deal has been learned cross-sport, and athletes in many sports have learned from each other simply by being in the same training rooms and the same athlete break-out areas and by using the same performance centre. All those things have enabled sports to learn from each other, and that will make an enormous difference.

Clearly, as part of the 2012 games, Loughborough, Bath and parts of Sheffield will be hoping to host major teams. The Chinese, for example, have visited the Loughborough and Bath campuses to look at the facilities, and I am sure that they have made favourable noises to both. Negotiating hard is a good Chinese technique, and they have raised expectations on both campuses. However, simply the fact that teams at that level would be willing to locate in our towns and are impressed by our facilities demonstrates how far we have come in eight short years.

I was on the Loughborough campus last Friday and I will be there again this week. I get a real buzz just from being there, from seeing the athletes, the work that they do and the facilities and from knowing that we are giving them the best opportunity. Seb Coe and Dave Moorcroft were at Loughborough in their early days, and when one talks to them about the facilities and opportunities that people have now, they go watery-eyed.

The reason, however, why we have had to make such changes is that the rest of the world has moved on, too. If we are to keep a level head on expectations, we must realise that, 20 years ago, very few people were competing in some of these sports, particularly at elite level and in the Olympics. Now, Ethiopian and Kenyan runners are running not only for Ethiopia and Kenya, but are being bought—literally—by middle east states and running for them. When our athletes come to the 5,000 m or the 10,000 m events, they often find themselves running against well honed and well trained athletes who can take positions one to 10 quite easily. Our heritage in middle-distance running has suffered somewhat as a consequence.

We must recognise that some of these things go in cycles. We have had excellent middle-distance runners, and we have had enormous 400 m squads and sprint squads but things shift over time. We put a great deal of pressure on young athletes, particularly the 18 and 19-year-olds who have to decide whether to go to the world junior championships or to the Olympics to learn their trade. Athletes, like the rest of us, learn from their mistakes. It is necessary to have enormous confidence—almost arrogance—to believe that one is No. 1 in the world. It is a British trait not to like such arrogance and to laugh at people who say that they are the best in the world and then fail. Other nations seem to be able to recognise that such an attitude is a positive attribute when it comes to sport.

As others have said, the time differences that won us the five gold medals in track and field at the Athens Olympics were, when added together, less than half a second. By the time that athletes get to the Olympics, all the preparation that they have done in the years since their talent was first identified in a junior club can boil down to a 100th of a second—there is a nose-hair's difference between winning and losing. We must ensure that we do not put enormous pressure on people; we must not only allow them to think that they are the best in the world, we must give them the facilities to be the best.

Loughborough is a fantastic facility. I spoke about what we have been doing in Bath and at other places because we have lagged behind. Loughborough was already doing well in the 1950s—it had swimming pools and other facilities—but we rested on our laurels for 30 or 40 years. We seemed to win medals almost by accident rather than by design. Although we have fantastic facilities, such as those in Sheffield and in Bath, we must keep an eye firmly on the ball, and modernise and update them. Otherwise, when we get to 2012, some of them could begin to look aged.

Some of the science that we learn in the next seven years needs to be incorporated into the work that we do in those places. For example, the performance centre at Loughborough university has strange-looking pieces of equipment that were specifically designed by athletes who wanted to replicate a particular muscle group or action. The machines have been built on the campus; they are not available anywhere else in the world. We have to develop such equipment all the time, and we need to stay ahead of the game. We need funding for ongoing support, even for capital projects in places such as Bath, Loughborough and Sheffield. I always mention Sheffield because I hope that we will be looked upon more favourably as a threesome than if I ask yet again just on behalf of Loughborough.

EIS is working, and so is UK Sport, but I come back to the problem that each of us has mentioned.

Mr. Don Foster: There is much that I would like to say about Bath in response to the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but I think that he knows it well enough. In passing, our winter sports facility has a wonderful bobsleigh training facility that he does not have in Loughborough.

Does the hon. Gentleman agree, however, that the Minister was right to reflect that a number of our elite athletes will not have the benefit of having gone to university? In Athens, 70 per cent. had been to university. We anticipate that by the time we get to Beijing, it will be as many as 85 per cent. Therefore, it is crucial to develop links with our universities. It is equally important to develop and add to good facilities such as those in Bath.

Mr. Reed: This is a crucial issue. In America, the collegiate system is almost the elite path. We have not designed anything like that. We do not have one unified system. When I went to university and, I am sure, when the hon. Gentleman did, only 7 or 8 per cent. of people went, so that was clearly the wrong route to use for sport. There were times at certain universities, probably even at Loughborough, when people would not have gone there other than for the sport, and they have managed to survive on the back of that. I am sure that Oxford and Cambridge did that, too. Some of their rugby teams looked like remarkably good rugby teams, but not like particularly good groups of academics. However, university was always a narrow path to sport.

The unique thing about Loughborough—I am not sure about Bath and Sheffield—is that we have a specialist sports college attached to the university, with accommodation. I would say to my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey that it is possible for a sports college to develop to such an extent that it can afford accommodation on site. We have some of the country's best non-public fee-paying tennis players based not only at the university but at the college. It is not necessary for them to be in higher education, but it is necessary for us to look at the accommodation and other facilities that we provide for those not going to university. They do not have to be at Loughborough university to benefit.

That brings us back to the structure problem. Each Member has talked about it, and, like others, when I came into post as a chair of the regional sports board, I asked for a map of funding streams and how things fixed together. At that stage, there were 57 funding streams to the region. A lot of that has been simplified, and I pay tribute to the Minister for playing a part in that and many other changes in Sport England. However, one still creates a horrendously complicated and compiex chart if one tries to understand how sport fits together.

If a constituent or club in my constituency asks how to get hold of money to do x, y and z, I find it extremely frustrating to give them a list of names and addresses, depending on the sport, that has at least seven or eight partners on it as a starting point. At that grass-roots level, we need to have just a single point of contact, even if it then draws down from others. We would not want to get rid of many of the bodies—for example, we would not want to abolish Sportsmatch. Individually they all seem good, which is part of the problem. I found in my discussions before the election and before the bid was finalised that most bodies—UK Sport, Sport England and the British Olympic Association, for example—all agreed that there needed to be a unified funding mechanism and that things should be tidied up. I suspect that the problem is that each thinks that it should run that mechanism at the expense of the others.

Now is the time for a mature debate—that is the politest way to put it—and some hard decisions. The bodies have had to make some hard decisions about the sports and individual athletes they fund, and it has been tough on sports such as triathlon, which is also based at Loughborough. However, the Minister, the Secretary of State, and possibly the Prime Minister have to take a grip. Over the summer, they have one opportunity to get everything right. It will be tough choice. I am glad the Minister is in that position of making it, but there is a golden opportunity. There is a unification in sport whereby people are willing to make a big leap. When there is nothing to win or to gain, people tend to hold on to what they have. However, as there is a golden prize of doing well in the 2012 London Olympics, I get the sense that sports administrators are willing to take a leap of faith and back the Minister in whatever decisions he takes to simplify and unify the system.

Having said that funding is not the be-all and end-all, I will also put my bid in for additional funding, although its stability is just as important. Most people can work on a little less if they know exactly how much they are getting for a longer period. The way that we currently fund sport relies largely on the lottery. That has worked well, and the Minister again deserves praise. He is finally sorting out a four-year funding period, so at least between each Olympics we have a rough idea of what we have for the funding period. However, I think that the period should be much longer. We always reach the point straight after the Olympics in which we ask whether we did well enough or whether we can scratch around to make a large enough investment for next time. Stability is crucial.

It was reported this week that UK Sport has asked for an additional £20 million a year to make a crucial difference. I know from some of the notes that I have received that that figure is roughly what it wants, and it sounds reasonable from my experience of what has been done in the past and what it could do in the future.

Finally, we should look at whether we reach the stage in which Exchequer finance plays a greater role in the funding of sport in this country. Fortunately, in 1998–99, Exchequer funding was doubled, although doubling not very much to not much more has not made a substantial difference compared with the losses seen in the lottery take. We know that the figures have reduced, although they reached a plateau and have perhaps risen in the past 18 months, which is good news. With the potential of an Olympic lottery, there may be a danger that we see a reduction as people switch between the two.

I have never bought a lottery ticket. I usually blame such things on my strict Methodist upbringing, but it is actually that I am mean and I do not like parting with money. However, I will be tempted to purchase Olympic lottery tickets. I know that I would be excited to buy into something worth while. People might also like the idea of a bond. I hope that the Olympic lottery generates additional funds, rather than reducing available funds.

As the hon. Member for Bath said, it is important to think about those sports not placed among the elite through UK Sport. One of the benefits of hosting the 2012 games is that we might enter teams for sports such as volleyball, in which we have traditionally not done well or in which our teams have not participated. We should take another look at some of those sports. We may have to make choices. We may not want to send a volleyball team to the 2012 Olympics simply to be humiliated in our own country. However, it is possible in those seven years to make a substantial difference.

The Americans did not have a particularly fantastic record in volleyball over the years, so rather than looking for people who could be trained to become volleyball players, they looked for those who had the physiology to make good volleyball players—for instance, people who played basketball or other similar sports. The rest is history: America went on to do well in the medals table.

With a concerted effort, with a great plan, with the backing of the sports' national governing bodies, with funding from UK Sport and with funding through our support for specific sports, it is possible for those who have not done well in the past to achieve great things. We know from the medals tables that the host country always does better per medal, per funding and per participant. It is a golden opportunity.

We also need to manage our expectations. It has been quite exciting over the past couple of weeks to see young children talking into microphones or attached to a camera crew saying, "Yes, I'm going to be the next 800 m champion." However, when we work out the age groups of those individuals, we can often see that they are not going to be ready to win medals in 2012.

[Mr. Reed]

We need to tap into that enthusiasm, but it must be done with a sense of realism. The last thing I want is for 2012 to be a fantastic success—and then nothing. There will be a dip, just as we see with school sport; there is great participation until the children are 13 or 14, particularly among girls, but it then drops. The same happens with Wimbledon. For two weeks, there are no free tennis courts; for the other 50 weeks of the year, they are all empty. We must tap that enthusiasm and ensure that it feeds into grass-roots sport, but we must also identify talent so that we have a pool of people to go forward to the many other things happening before 2012.

We have concentrated on 2012 and even Beijing, but there are also the athletic world championships, the Lions tour, the rugby world cup in 2007 and the football World cup in 2006. We have some fantastic opportunities even between the Olympics for participants to shine in the major sports, but there are loads of world championships in the minor sports. In fact, we have hosted about 50 world championships since 1997. We sometimes think that we have failed unless we can host the Olympics or the world championships in the major sports, but we have won most of the bids that we have put in for world championships. We have a proud record.

I do not know whether he was paid to say it, but Federer said that Wimbledon was the greatest tennis tournament. Indeed, we say it ourselves. None the less, we have a worldwide and growing reputation for giving elite performers a chance to participate here. We have moved on since the troubles with Picketts Lock, Wembley and so on. We now have a system in place that recognises what needs to be done to win the hosting of such tournaments. Again I congratulate the Minister on his part.

I know from my discussions with elite athletes—not only those at Loughborough but others whom I know—that they all have their own way and their own path to success. Many have achieved it despite the system rather than because of it. Whatever is said today and whatever we do to create a perfect system, it still may not work for some—yet even they can come through. However, the two key themes highlighted by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent, which we must get right before 2012—if we do not, we will suffer badly—are funding and structure. I look forward to hearing about the Minister's plans, his negotiations and the assistance he may need to increase funding. I look forward more importantly to the plans he has to improve the structure of sport and the speed with which we can deliver not just for our grass roots, about which we like to talk most of the time, but for our elite athletes, who we would love to see, to cheer and to support in London in 2012.

4.15 pm

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): I apologise for not being present in the Chamber at the beginning of the debate. I was in Committee and had intended to attend the debate, but I was held up. I was sitting in my office watching this debate on the monitor, when I heard an exchange between the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) and my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt), which encouraged me to get down to the Chamber toute de suite to pass comment.

The hon. Member for Bath mentioned judo. Today's debate is entitled "Elite Sports", rather than "Elite Athletes". To the hon. Gentleman's credit, he made that distinction. My hon. Friend pointed out that funding should follow success, and that there was success in certain sports at the previous couple of Olympics. If funding follows success, however, there is a tiny danger that we will, in the most benign way possible, create a conservative formula. Of all UK medallists at the 2000 Sydney Olympics, 80 per cent. had attended private schools. That statistic radically improved for the 2004 Athens Olympics, but it was still 40 per cent. If we do anything before 2012, and we could do many things, we should sort out the fact that such a low proportion of our Olympic medallists attend state schools.

There is a gamut of reasons why private schools do as well as they do. One could argue that they take sport much more seriously, that they have historically had more money to invest in sport, and that, as a consequence, many private schools have the most fantastic facilities. Arguably, the best example is Eton and its rowing facilities, which are absolutely marvellous, and it produces the most fantastic athletes.

I agree that there should be a link between the sports of Olympic gold-medal winning athletes and funding, but the link should not be absolute. There is a danger if funding follows medals. When gold is won by a rowing eight who are marvellously good-looking, super-athletic and hugely articulate young graduates, they are all over the television when they return to the UK and, needless to say, the size of rowing as a sport in Britain and the space that it takes up in our national consciousness becomes huge. Meanwhile, some judo man or woman who gets a bronze medal, who does not come from the same educational or social background and who is not as televisual does not have the same impact.

That is the only point that I want to make, but, as you would expect, Sir John, I should like to extend it. We ought to be very careful about the idea that funding should necessarily follow success. Between now and 2012, the Olympic agenda, as much as any other Government policy, should be a social agenda. There is a great deal on which we can all agree, such as how much we should increase spending on sport and how we can achieve enormous amounts as part of the richness of our national culture and in all sorts of other ways, but I say to Government Members in particular that we must remember that a social agenda permeates all our policy, and the Olympic agenda is part of it. That might sound like I am trying to create a gap in the all-party consensus, but I am not. I would be hugely disappointed if, as a consequence of how we fund sport through the Olympic lottery, the current lottery or Government funding, we were to celebrate a huge clutch of medals in 2012, but we were to miss the fact, as most people do, that people have a much greater chance of being successful in the Olympic games if they attend a private school. The reality is that the vast majority attend private schools.

I am in no sense being critical of private schools; in fact, in many ways the state school sector can learn a great deal from them. One of Scotland's finest Olympic gold medallists, Chris Hoy, attended a good private school in Scotland. If one has the talent, there is a natural inclination to do well, and one will attend a well funded private school where sport is taken seriously.

However, if funding simply follows success, and historically success correlates closely with social class, there is a grave danger that we will be justifying a sports funding programme that perpetuates the class divide.

To put my credentials on the line, I was never marvellous enough to be the best sportsman in England at any sport, but I was once the Scottish judo champion, admittedly not in the most shining year for Scottish judo. So, I have a sense of how hard sports people work.

Some sports are less celebrated. The idea of an elite sport may be vaguely acceptable as a technical category for accounting and funding, but the term "elite athletes", which my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) and the hon. Member for Bath used, makes more sense. People in minor sports face challenges that are often missed. For example, if someone declines in performance in a minor sport for a year or two, they are finished. They probably earned no money from the sport anyway. Someone who plays a team sport can move around the team and if they are hugely talented take part over many years in Olympic games. I think of rowers, many of whom are highly talented. They can sit in a four, an eight, a coxed two or a coxless two. There are many options. In minor sports—I call them that although it is a pejorative term, as it is the one by which they are normally referred to—that is not an option.

There is a correlation between social class background and the sports that people take part in, particularly for sports such as judo. The British Judo Association may pull me up for making this point, but judo is taken up primarily by people from working-class communities. I was the British student champion, so I know that there is a strong student base in the sport, but the great majority of people attending judo clubs throughout the country—and there are many of them—come from working-class backgrounds.

My single point, which I have greatly extended over five minutes and which I reiterate one final time for the Minister—he might want to say whether he agrees with it—is that the Government's social agenda extends to the Olympic games. When we consider funding formulas, be they using the Olympic lottery, the special lottery, the national lottery or other aspects of Government funding, we must take into account people's background. It affects which sports they take part in and the possibilities that they have to reach the Olympic games.

4.22 pm

Mr. Caborn: I thank all hon. Members for their contributions. They have been incredibly positive. Sport is one of the things that brings people together. When the IOC was here and we were trying to present our case forcefully, which we did successfully, one of the highlights occurred at No. 10. I sat round the table at No. 10 with the IOC committee and the evaluation team. On the other side were the leaders of the Opposition parties—the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) and the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Lochaber (Mr. Kennedy)—and the Prime Minister in the chair. They all sang from the same song sheet. I thought, "Five or six weeks before a general election, what else could bring all those people together to sing from the same song sheet?" Sport did that—hostilities broke out five minutes later, but at least sport had that effect for that period.

It was also interesting, as the IOC team was going from London to Paris, that a question was asked about the trade unions. A strike was about to take place in Paris. I flicked a note to the Prime Minister saying that Seb Coe was the only Tory who had ever addressed the TUC. I think that that is right. Anyway, it was the information that I had been given, so we all had a good laugh at Seb's expense. That showed the power of sport, and how it can be used to unite people.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk (Mr. Joyce) talked about minority—or minor—sports. When I was in Salt Lake City I had an opportunity to do some curling. I did not do it very well, because I forgot to let go of the stone and went with the ruddy thing down the ice. None the less, it was amazing to see how many people watched that final. I cannot remember the figure, but it was huge—about 9 million. Probably 99.9 per cent. of that viewing audience had never watched curling before, but they got behind the team. It is incredible how sport, even what is by any definition a minority sport, can lift a nation.

It is fantastic that we have the Olympics, but as hon. Members have said, that event will not happen in isolation—make no mistake about that. When I was given my job as Minister I was told that sport had to be fundamentally reorganised to deliver Government policy on health, social inclusion and education, that it was an asset that was being massively underused, and that there had to be a root-and-branch reform. That is what we are doing. We have gone through the school structure to deliver first two hours of sport, then two to three hours beyond the curriculum, which I hope will lead to five hours of quality physical activity for every child.

We are not doing that because it is good for sport per se; one of our main targets is to reduce obesity among children under 11, because type 2 diabetes in young people has increased by a factor of four since the 1980s. That is a time bomb. There are practical reasons why we want to get the nation more physically active and playing more sport; that will deliver on the health agenda, and prevention is better than cure.

We know that every time a kid goes off the rails and has to be put in secure accommodation, it costs taxpayers £100,000 a year. It would be better to keep those kids doing judo, boxing and so on. I am deeply involved with Brendan Ingles in Sheffield, who has certainly kept more kids out of jail than any probation officer. On a Saturday morning 100 of the roughest and toughest kids are at his gym—and they all learn discipline, because when they go into the boxing ring they are on their own. They have to have respect for their bodies, so they cannot take drugs and so on. That addresses the social exclusion agenda, too.

For the first time we are measuring the impact of sport and physical activity on academic attainment levels. When sport is at the centre of a school's ethos there are fewer exclusions and less truancy, and academic attainment levels rise. It brings discipline and gives young people a focus. That is a wide agenda, which is why the Government are investing in sport to deliver their policies, and the two hours' commitment, the further two to three hours of sport, and club-to-school links contribute. It is also why we are investing in coaching structures, introducing the level 5 certificate or grading and putting in 3,000 community coaches to encourage talent identification in secondary schools through TASS and the 2012 scholarships, and linking that to the EIS. That will produce one of the most sustainable sports structures probably anywhere in the world. It will be exciting both to have mass participation and to deliver the elite agenda. Much more needs to be done, and many changes will be needed. However, the agenda for sport has been taken up and is being used effectively.

I shall go through the specific points that have been raised, because it will be interesting to consider them against that background. On funding for the Olympics, I know the arguments about the 12 per cent. betting tax, but that is a matter for the Treasury. If, as Minister for Sport, I am asked if I want more money for sport, the answer is yes I do, and I will continue to argue for it. It was great to get rate relief for community amateur sports clubs—an idea that had been whizzing around the sporting world for about 20 to 30 years. Coupled with the four or five tax breaks available to those clubs, that means that we are moving in many and varied ways to bring more money into sport.

The budget and the financial framework for the Olympics are very robust. Before we could convince the Treasury that going for the Olympics was right, the Secretary of State and I visited many cities that had run the Olympics. I went to Sydney, Moscow and Munich, and twice to Athens, as well as to other cities, and asked a simple question: "What would you do differently if you had the Olympics again?" Certain themes emerged. For example, do not underestimate the budget, because having to go back on the budget means being seen as a failure. The budget should be robust, realistic and sustainable.

Another recommendation was to get the necessary planning permission and compulsory purchase orders for all the facilities being developed. Broadly speaking, we have done that. The budget is robust, although obviously, the Treasury is a lender of last resort. That was drilled in deeply when the International Olympic Committee was here closing the chapter on finance.

Of course, I would still like there to be more investment in sport. People are not throwing figures around with regard to elite sport. We clearly stated that we want to project two four-year funding streams for the periods between the Athens and the Beijing games, and the Beijing and the London games. We must work to those cycles if we are to bring young people through the system. The first such cycle is being put in place, and commitments for it have been made on the back of the old sports plans, which governing bodies have presented to UK Sport. We are investing on that, and that is where discipline will come in.

The approach in the Chamber has been realistic, but things are a little different out there. We must be realistic about attainment levels and how they are reached. If standards do not come up to scratch, funds will be withdrawn. We began that approach after the Sydney Olympics with swimming, for which we had the worst medal tally—reduced by 50 per cent. A new coach, Bill Sweetenham, was brought in, and within two years the team had taken the best haul of medals since the 1970s at the world swimming championships. That was about focus and ensuring that people were serious. We are serious: things will not be sloppy any more. If we are to drive the agenda for the elite, there must be discipline. There are four sports whose representatives are sending letters to me in droves, but I shall refer them to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), and say that he told me that I had to be disciplined and ensure that the agenda is carried out.

Mr. Reed: The Amateur Swimming Association is based in my constituency. Most people would accept that the swimmers secretly expected to get only two medals at the Athens Olympics, although we might realistically have expected to get eight, which is why their performance was regarded as a bit of a failure—but the same swimmers succeeded and did so well at the world championships. Does the Minister agree that it is dangerous to focus on medal tallies? Good performances do not always lead to gold medals. If everything depends on gold medals at the Olympics and other factors are not taken into account, sport could miss out in the long run.

Mr. Caborn: That is right. Although we just missed out on the medals, we got into about 17 finals, I believe. With half a second's difference, we could have had one hell of a medal tally for swimming. I know that the team was disappointed by the medal tally, but the quality of team members got us into those finals. I look at those aspects as well as at medals.

I am confident that that kind of financing for the Olympics is robust, but hon. Members also asked about finance in general. That is difficult. We have only to consider Sport England. When I came to this job, about 80 or 90 schemes had been hatched up and passed from the centre to regions and sub-regions. People simply ticked the boxes and got the dosh, and nobody ever did any measuring. We spent about £1.15 billion and increased participation by only 0.3 per cent., so that was not a huge success. That aspect needs to be addressed, and we have been doing that with the regional structure, which has been streamlined, but not to the degree that I want; work still has to be done on that.

Things are changing in sport. People can talk about the independent school sector, but if we consider the private sector in sport generally, we see that it has changed dramatically over the last five, 10, 15 and 20 years. The number of sports clubs and health clubs has increased. There are more swimming baths in this country now than we have ever had, and there are more in the private sector now than in the public sector, which is a change. We have to manage the changing landscape.

It is people from social classes A, B and C1 who tend to join health clubs and private tennis clubs, and we have to be careful that the public sector does not deteriorate. The challenge for the public sector is to lift the quality. There is an arrangement involving JJB Sports whereby indoor five-a-side football has been linked to a health club and a swimming complex. That is working well and bringing in many Cs and Ds through the medium of football. Local authorities, too, are spending considerable amounts of money directly and making a major contribution. When we talk about funding sport through the public purse, everyone looks at Sport England or UK Sport, but funding goes much wider than that.

With my colleagues at the Treasury, I have been working on mandatory rate relief for CASCs—community amateur sports clubs. Tax breaks and mandatory rate relief bring in considerable amounts of money. I think that some 3,000 genuinely amateur clubs are now receiving about £6 million a year. I am talking about not just one grant, but money year in, year out. Once those sports clubs get the tax breaks and the mandatory rate relief, they represent continued investment in the clubs. We have to consider these innovatory ideas on financing and ensure that we continue to push them forward.

On the structure of sport, which was the second question—

Hugh Robertson: I accept everything that the Minister is saying about the financing of the Olympics. I am sure that the process has been fully drilled down and is robust, but the key point is surely that part of the success of the London bid was that we were going to deliver on a much wider agenda. We were going to reinvigorate sport in this country in a way that had never been done before. I take what the Minister says about rate relief and so on, but I cannot see that the promises can be fulfilled without some front-end loading from the Exchequer, so the question for him is: are there any Government plans to front-end load the development of sport through Exchequer funding?

Mr. Caborn: I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman means by "sport". If he is talking about the Olympics, I can tell him that there is no doubt that the strategy that we put forward is to front-load the vast bulk of the investment. Why? The answer is simple, and again we learned this as we went around the world. We have to have the starting blocks in place. Misc 25—the Cabinet Committee dealing with the Olympics—met yesterday, and will meet again next week. The Bill on the Olympic delivery authority was already drafted; some hon. Members here know what is in that Bill, and we hope to have all-party support for it. The lottery Bill was also drafted well before we knew whether we were going to win. Today, we are three years ahead of where Athens was at the same stage.

We start pressing the buttons on Tuesday, when the London Olympics Bill will have its Second Reading. As I said, Misc 25 met yesterday and will meet again next Tuesday. Why? If we can get the contracts laid, whether for power lines or for a stadium, we are in control. Once people move towards the finishing date, they start losing control, and that is when it becomes costly. We have learned from the dome, Wembley, Picketts Lock and the Commonwealth games. When I was appointed a Sports Minister, my first job, with the Secretary of State, was putting another £100 million into the Commonwealth games. The sum went from £200 million to £330 million. That was to rescue the project; it would have gone belly-up otherwise. That was, in my view, crisis management. Why did it happen? Because there were underestimates in the budgets and then people were scrabbling around for money.

I can assure hon. Members that we will not go down that road with the Olympics. We are clear about the three stages: winning the bid, delivering the infrastructure and delivering a first-class games. Three different sets of skills are involved, and the investment needs to be front-loaded. That is what we are talking seriously about now, and that will be the most cost-effective way to deliver the games.

I agree with the point made about the structure of sport in the sense that we have been trying to rationalise it. That is why we have the regional sports boards—to reduce the influence of the centre. I am talking now about Sport England. We undertook that rationalisation with the aim of engaging the wider constituency of health, education, local authorities, business and the private sector at the regional level to work towards a benchmark, with a target of increasing participation. Away from the schools, we want to increase national participation in sport by 1 per cent. per annum. Only one nation—Canada—has achieved that before. However, we believe that it is achievable.

A third of the nation is doing what the World Health Organisation says that they should do: five half hours per week of reasonable activity. One third of the nation do that now, and we think that another third want to do it, and will do so if we give them encouragement and adopt a user-friendly approach. The other third will be more difficult to deal with, and we will probably have to adopt different schemes for them. Sport England has a clear target of increasing participation year on year, and linking that to what we are doing to change the culture in schools.

This debate is about elite sport, but it is also interesting to note that for the first time in decades we are consciously having to build physical activity back into our daily lives. For the past decade or more we have been taking physical activity out of people's daily lives, whether by taking stairways out and replacing them with escalators or lifts, or through town planners or architects designing towns such as Milton Keynes around the motor car, whereas now there are attempts to reintroduce pedestrianisation.

The current approach is to try to build physical activity back into our daily lives rather than designing it out. That is a big challenge, not just for sport, but for providers of other services, including architects, town planners and the health service. That is why we have tried to change the structure of sport to engage those constituencies that have a vested interest in it, such as health, social inclusion, education and the private sector. Those who are more progressive in the private sector know that a healthy work force are more productive work force, which will help them to hit their bottom line. We want to work with those forces in our communities and our society to ensure that we can deliver that agenda. That is why the structure of sport has been changing over the past few years.

A question was asked about the impact of devolution. Devolution is here, and we have to manage it. We have problems with the organisation of sport. For example, next year, Scotland, Wales and England will be competing against one another in the Commonwealth games in Melbourne, but two years after that, in Beijing, we will be there as a British team, in which all those elements will be brought together.

We have to manage the results of devolution in sport, which is sometimes difficult. For example, some of the governing bodies of sport are UK-wide and some are nationwide, which creates some complications. However, because of the role that UK Sport is now playing, it is seen as the lead body and is bringing others in, such as the English Institute of Sport, the British Olympic Association and the governing bodies. That is why I was pleased with what came out of the performance directors meeting called by the British Olympic Association and attended by UK Sport. I said that we needed to work in that partnership and set up a one-stop shop, rather than one-stop plans. If we can keep that type of honesty of purpose and partnership, I am sure that we can deliver a well invested and well focused structure not just for the Olympics but for the many other international competitions that take place. We must manage the effects of devolution through UK Sport.

I want to make more rapid progress on school sports links. Our 400th partnership will come on stream in September 2005, which will represent the completion of about one partnership for every 100,000 people. We are talking about one sports college, eight secondary schools and 30 primary schools.

We are also talking about 3,000 school sports co-ordinators—which means a teacher having two days a week off, fully backed up by another teacher. There are something like 20,000 primary teachers linking from primary to secondary schools, for which they get 18 days a year off. That scheme is having a major effect, and we will continue to roll it out; the investment is in place. When we started having school sports co-ordinators the process was funded by the lottery, but it is now being provided by mainstream Department for Education and Skills spending, which shows the real commitment the Government have to the sustainability of the structure of sport.

The linking of schools to the club structure is absolutely vital; there is no doubt about that. If we are to address the 70 per cent. fall-out figure, that is where we have to do it. There are other challenges to our governing bodies. It is interesting to talk about extreme sports, team sports and so on, and we have to be much more creative. That is why we are trying to encourage the development of multi-sport centres in the public sector and joining the private sector in with that process wherever we can.

I ask Members to think about football. There are more than 40,000 football teams: it is the biggest game played. There are between 2,500 and 3,000 rugby clubs, and roughly the same number in cricket. I mentioned the film "Bend it like Beckham" earlier, and asked what sport young girls will want to play. They will want to play football, and we can get them to play football—but at the same time we can get them into an environment where someone will put a tennis racket or a hockey stick into their hand, and let them play sports such as basketball. The way to get young people involved is by letting them choose a sport that they want to play, and we must encourage sports to come together to develop multi-sports clubs. We need that process instead of the silo thinking that we have had in sport. It is a legacy of our sport; it does not happen on the continent, and there are multi-sports clubs in Germany, France and Holland.

We are trying to move to a situation in which people can get their experience from the community, not just the school. That is why the big four sporting bodies are working together, and other governing bodies are now coming on board. That is part of the way forward, as is linking clubs to schools, which is why we are continuing to invest in multi-sports clubs through Sport England and local authorities.

To be honest, I cannot go into dates but the whole thing goes wider, because health issues can be built in. We can build health centres there, and many doctors are considering bringing coaches into their surgeries and multi-skilling them so that they can deal with obesity. People who promote physical activity can resolve the ailments of many people without the need to stuff pills down them, but we need people from the sporting world who are skilled enough to do that. That is why multi-skilling of coaches is important.

Coaching will present a challenge. We have come a long way, with the great support of the governing bodies, which have all now bought in to the coaching certificate through UK Sport. Will coaching now become a profession in the sense that being a teacher or a doctor is a profession? Will we have professional coaches—not just people who are paid, but people who have entered a profession? Those involved in sport have to take that idea on board and consider whether it should happen.

That takes us back to the point mentioned by the hon. Member for Bath, which people were bending my ear about when I was down at the university of Bath the other day: what is higher and further education doing about skilling throughout the whole infrastructure of sport? We now have the first doctorate in sports and exercise medicine; it is crazy that that has happened only in the past few months. It has been argued about for a considerable time, but now we have got it. If we are serious about upskilling the sporting infrastructure, we have to talk about coaching and other professions in the sporting industry.

As for the fifth question that the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) asked, there has been a debate about whether testing should be taken away from UK Sport. All I can tell him is that the PMP report was done, and we were very open about that process. We showed people the terms of reference and they were critical, saying that this was a case of the poacher turning gamekeeper. We told them to go away and look at the report and they came back saying that there was no conflict of interest, and there were proper Chinese walls, even though the elite athletes were both paid and checked for drugs. We put that report straight on to the web, unfettered, to let everyone see it—and told people that the decision that we had made was to keep testing within UK Sport. That is the basis on which we acted. The evidence is there, and that is how we made the decision.

The hon. Member for Bath mentioned tough choices. He is absolutely right, and the structure that we have in place with the governing bodies is now dealing with them. We never have enough public investment and, as the Minister for Sport, it is my job to prosecute the case in Whitehall. I believe I have been reasonably successful with the Treasury, because sport is fit for its purpose. We can invest in sport with confidence that the outputs will have an effect on the Government's agenda on health, social inclusion and education. That makes is easier for me to ask for more money to be invested in sport and physical activity. Coaching is also important, but I have already spoken about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey (Derek Wyatt) referred to regional initiatives. This evening, I am going to a meeting with Charles Allen of the nations and regions support group that was set up under London 2012 to consider how we can prosecute initiatives for the regions in a number of ways. In my own area, this has even brought Leeds and Sheffield together. It is unique to get people from Leeds and Sheffield talking in the same room, but it has happened. The same has happened with all the sports facilities in Yorkshire, with the proactive work of Yorkshire Forward, the regional development agency, which is starting to approach teams and countries about who they would like to see in Yorkshire in the run-up to 2012.

Mr. Don Foster: I hope that at his meeting tonight, the Minister will congratulate the chairman of the nations and regions support group, who did a fantastic job as a member of the London 2012 team. Is it the intention of the Government or that group to provide, as a matter of urgency, an information pack or some other source of information for the groups that are springing up around the country and wondering how best they can work in their regions and localities to benefit from the successful bid for the Olympics?

Mr. Caborn: Yes. That is exactly what the group is doing while we are having this debate. On the other side of the Thames, it is discussing how to move the agenda forward since gaining the Olympics. Some chairmen of regional development agencies are with Charles this afternoon, as well as others. They are doing that now. We are pressing many buttons. We were ready to move when Jacques Rogge said "London"—it was the nicest way I have ever heard "London" said in my life—and regional initiatives have already started.

I like the school report mentioned by my hon. the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey, who knows that there are hurdles to overcome. If we are serious about the health of the nation we must bring school reports into focus for parents.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Ms Barlow) said that the sea was free, which is true. Extreme sports have access to funding from the talented athlete scholarship scheme—TASS—and they are important too, as are individual sports. There is a big drift away from team sports to individual sports and we must respond to that trend by providing facilities, coaching and so on. Young people on the edge of society sometimes get a thrill from extreme sports, and that can bring them back into mainstream sports and mainstream society.

We provided money to the Lawn Tennis Association, as we did to rugby union and, to a lesser extent, cricket. We required it to look at club structure and club-school links and to invest the money in certain categories. The structure was found wanting, because many clubs were in the leafy suburbs rather than downtown and I asked who would be the next Williams sisters, and who would be the next Tiger Woods. The challenge, which applies to tennis, cricket and other sports, is how to take sport to the heart of communities. I am convinced that there are Williams sisters in downtown Sheffield and downtown Manchester. We must give kids the opportunity, which is why we are keen on TASS. The scheme is not just for those who go into further or higher education but for those who leave school early.

Someone said that our footballers are not the sharpest pencils in the box—but by God, they can perform on the park. They probably did not go to university. In fact, some of the best performers in football and other sports have not been academically bright, so the academic attainment system has not fed into sport. We need a structure in which everybody has an opportunity, whether they are a plumber's apprentice or are about to start a PhD at university. That is what we must remember when talking about talent identification.

I know that the LTA is making great strides to ensure that it has a structure that is fit for purpose and that can attract a lot more young people. From time to time it gets embarrassed when people such as my hon. Friend the Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey reminds it that we do not have many players reaching the finals at Wimbledon. That may change, perhaps as we follow Scotland, which is showing us the way in tennis.

My hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Reed) asked about funding. Whenever we can give out more funding, we do. However, he is right to say that we need a mature debate about the single funding stream. The situation is like congestion on the roads—people always think, "It's that bugger in front that's the problem, not me in my car." It is a bit like that when bodies are asked whether to give up some of their sovereignty; the situation becomes a little more difficult.

There is now a maturity in sport, however, and our collective work with the Olympic bid has shown that when we are focused and the team works together, we can make things move considerably. We have a great opportunity to consider the system, and I have said clearly that I want to ensure that the BOA, the EIS and others are constituent parts of UK Sport, through which we would fund them. That is where the bodies would have their arguments about how to dispense the money, and their performance and output will be measured.

As I said, there is now a maturity, and in the past few years there has been a change in the quality of people in governing bodies. I do not mean that in a derogatory way, because some people who have spent their lives in sport have been fantastic—but if we are to compete with the best in the world, we need not just the athletes, coaches and physios but the administration. That has to be professional if we are to take on the rest of the world, and the capacity building that has been done by the governing bodies, aided and abetted to a large extent by UK Sport, is starting to have an effect.

We are at the cutting edge of technology. If we can take the intellectual property from an athlete and transfer it into services, wealth creation and products, that will be a bit like what happens with a Formula 1 car. What is in a Formula 1 car today is in the luxury car market tomorrow and the volume car market the day after. That is technology transfer. Like a Formula 1 car, athletes throw out knowledge and expertise about pushing themselves to the extremes. We can capture and transfer that, which will involve wealth creation as well. We have a fantastic opportunity with the Sheffields, the Loughboroughs and the other universities, such as Durham, which have started to think about setting up spin-off companies. There is commercial investment in some of them, and they are considering what the products should be.

In terms of our challenges on quality of life and health, a lot of the improvement can come through what we are doing with sport and physical activity. The challenges are great; the opportunities are immense. The fact that we are now focused on 2012 will give us an edge, and this debate has reflected the fact that we will all work together to get the maximum out of it.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Five o'clock.

End-of-life Care

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Mr. Roy.]

9.30 am

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): May I first say how pleased I am that we are having this debate today? I shall give a history of the reasons for it. I wrote to Mr. Speaker to ask for a debate on dying, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman)—I shall happily call her my hon. Friend today; no doubt we shall both say in our own way why we wanted the debate. It is significant, however, that the title of the debate that appeared on the Order Paper was "End-of-life Care".

One of the main points that I shall make is that dying has largely been taken away from us and from society, and has been privatised and hidden away. That is a huge loss for us. In the past, most of us would have lived in families in which we experienced other family members dying, and we would have learnt from that dying. In helping those individuals, we would have learnt some of the great truths about living. If there is one idea that I want to advance, it is that we should view life as a great play—but that we have now got ourselves into a habit of mind whereby most of us leave the theatre before the last act. That being so, it is very difficult for most of us to make sense of why we are here, and what our purpose is.

As I said, the request was for a debate on dying—a subject that I hope we shall easily be able to include under the title "End-of-life Care". The request was made because my hon. Friend and I want there to be greater public recognition that dying is one of the most crucial parts of our lives. That simple fact needs to be recognised and given the place in our lives that it warrants. I hope that the debate, with hon. Members of very different views and backgrounds contributing, will challenge the view that dying is a private event that most people negotiate alone. It will be a debate that questions why most people die alone. I suggest that it is out of embarrassment and more that most of us shy away from this simple but crucial event in all our lives.

The Minister will be relieved to know that I am not asking for any major Government initiatives on this subject. It is not that sort of debate, and it is not that sort of issue. There is, of course, a role for Government. That official role is to help us to see the extent to which our full humanity is often and mysteriously completed in the process of dying.

Why have this debate at this time? For me, the first and perhaps most important reason is that my own mother died a few weeks ago. I was struck by how unprepared I was for that event, but also by how well prepared she was. Looking back on it, I am appalled at how much she needed to teach those of us around her about the process that was going on, and what she wanted from the process of dying.

The debate was also initiated because of the work of a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden—James Woodward, the priest warden of the Foundation of Lady Katherine Leveson. Part of the debate is about not only the celebration of dying itself, but the fact that there can be a centre of such excellence, which is trying to help us to address this key question. James Woodward recently published a book entitled "Befriending Death". In other words, although it is the natural response of many of us, we should not be frightened of death but regard the process as a friend, and a crucial part of our lives.

It is appropriate that we are having this debate now, because in the last week we have heard of the death of Dame Cicely Saunders, who did so much to transform the care of people who are dying and to deal with, and wherever possible eradicate or minimise, their pain. She thought, as her foundation continues to teach, that there is also a spiritual side to our nature that needs to be recognised in the process of dying. The spiritual side does not have to be attached to any religion. People can be highly spiritual and have no formal religion—and as we know, there are also those who are highly religious yet still manage to disguise any spiritual side of their nature, whether they are living their lives fully or in the process of dying.

James Woodward's book is, in its own unique way, a response to a best-selling Consumers Association pamphlet published 40 years ago, "What to do when someone dies". Forty years later, the book asks an even more pertinent question: what do we do before someone dies? In posing that question, I do not suggest that we do not need to be prepared when somebody dies, but I am trying to get back into the public debate the fact that the process of dying is the last great act of the individual play that each of us has to enact in this world. While I draw a great deal on James Woodward's work, I also draw on the work of Dr. Anne Richards, a member of the Archbishop's Council team who has written profoundly on this issue.

Let me suggest five reasons why some of us find dying such an uncomfortable issue to deal with. The first, and most obvious, is that we live in what has been called a death-denying society. Most of us gear our lives to the future: we plan what we are going to do at the end of our Session—where we will go, what holidays we will take, what is happening in our constituencies and what we will do with our families. The crucial point about dying is that we have to give up thinking about the future, and take on a different frame of mind. The first reason why dying is such a difficult topic for us is that it strikes at the basis of the society that we enjoy being part of but which, because it is so death-denying, is a significantly impoverishing society.

The second reason is that the process of dying is immensely important, and each of us needs to learn how we are going to do it. For most of our lives, we do not question how our bodies live. We take that for granted until we come to the final stage, at which we somehow deny that our bodies have a right to do their dying in their own way. The second challenge, therefore, relates to the process of how we die and how we surrender to our bodies, to allow them to continue doing the work for which they were created.

[Mr. Frank Field]

The third challenge to our death-denying culture is that our society is very bound up with the body beautiful. Practically every advertisement for the things that people think we need to lead happy lives would lead one to think that everyone in our society was aged between 15 and 23, and possessed remarkable beauty. The body-beautiful culture is reinforced by the status that we have surrendered to celebrities, or built up around them, in our everyday lives. The debate is about the fact that it is all too easy to overlook the way in which we indwell in our bodies, and that our bodies have a right to die in the way that they wish, rather than in the way that other people might find convenient.

The fourth challenge that a debate on dying poses to our common culture is that it is a full frontal attack on the view that we are not proper people unless we are in control of everything in our lives, including the people who make our lives worth while. Each of us has to face the crucial fact—indeed, some of us are facing it now—that our bodies grow old and change, often in ways that we cannot control. Again, however, there is individual and collective denial of the whole process of living and indwelling in our individual bodies. Our bodies therefore behave in a way that offends our modern view of how we and the society around us should operate.

The fifth challenge is to our abhorrence of the possibility that our frail bodies, which our modern culture somehow despises, should become the final arbiters of the relationship that we have had, and will have, with what is known as the process of our own lives.

The debate is about those fundamental challenges. I hope that others will talk about the palliative care that we rightly offer to people who are dying, because we too might live out our last moments on this earth in such circumstances. I do not want to minimise the importance of that issue in any way, but I am trying to draw the debate slightly wider. Given your background, Mr. Marshall, you will have recognised from the beginning that this debate challenges the growing voice in favour of euthanasia. The euthanasia lobby is now much more slick at presenting its arguments, but the debate is a challenge to members of that lobby, because from their angle, the idea is that we should be able to control the final parts of our lives and decide when they will be completed. I question whether we should have that view of control, and, indeed, whether we should have a right to have such control.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): May I offer my right hon. Friend my condolences on the death of his mother? I identify very much with his opening remarks, in particular. However, when he speaks about the fact that people's bodies change, he must, I think, allow that people's attitude to their death may change too, that even the best palliative care available may not satisfy the person who believes that their time has come, and that they should be in a position to make that decision. No one wants to impose that on others, but my right hon. Friend has spoken much about the individual's spirituality and philosophy, and I would want that choice—only the choice.

Mr. Field: I do not want to dispute the genuineness or the legitimacy of the views expressed in the debate, or to suggest that we should not engage with them. I do not want to narrow the debate—not that you, Mr. Marshall, would allow that—or to deny the legitimacy of what is being argued, but I question whether people's views are constant over time.

By way of an example, a great friend of mine, Barbara Wootton, proudly announced to me one day that she had joined EXIT. At the time, one of its members was in court; the case concerned events in which a daughter returned home and heard her mother in enormous distress in the bedroom. She rushed upstairs where the EXIT member, wearing a woolly hat, was eating a banana, having thrust a plastic bag over her mother's head.

No one is suggesting that most people will ever be in that position, but I allude to it because Barbara said that she had joined EXIT. She was a Member of the other House, with very talented and knowledgeable doctors, and she had persuaded one to give her knock-out pills should she ever, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock) describes, feel that her life was unsatisfactory and want to draw it to a conclusion.

The next part of the story is that during a summer recess I received a message that Barbara was in a geriatric ward, and I went to see her, thinking that during that meeting she would ask me to go and get those drugs. On the way to the hospital I had made up my mind that although I disagreed with the approach, my great friend had every right to end her life in the way that she wished, even though I would be guilty of such an offence that if the matter became public knowledge I would lose my seat. I believe that she had that right—but what struck me was that she never once asked for those knock-out pills, and that she struggled right to the end, in a way that my mother did not, to stay alive.

I am just sounding a note of warning about whether our views remain constant. When the Mental Capacity Bill was going through the House I voted for living wills, but because some members of the public thought that I must have voted against them they wrote me abusive letters, saying "Why do you deny me the right to determine when my life should end?" I wrote to each of them saying "I am pleased to hear you have a living will. Do you know what the words 'withdrawal of care' in your living will mean?"

I explained that it means the withdrawal not just of medical support, which most of us would understand, but food and liquid, which can lead to a horrible death. I sent for the leaflets that four of the societies most concerned with promoting living wills produce. Only one of them, in a footnote small enough to make glasses better than mine necessary to read it, explained that withdrawing care would mean the withdrawal of food and liquid.

I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention, because we need to debate more widely the rights of people in the circumstances that she described, and also the products on offer from groups promoting such an exit from life through the agency of living wills.

Joan Ruddock: I think that my right hon. Friend is making a case for choice, and for choice that is reliable and safe—if safe is not an odd word to use in such circumstances. That is why some of us support the concept, which certainly needs further debate, of physician-assisted dying. No one wants to put anyone through the terrible circumstances that he has described, but there are alternatives. That is the debate and the choice that we want. When the House of Lords Select Committee on the Assisted Dying for the Terminally Ill Bill took evidence, it found that people who had that choice—as my right hon. Friend's friend did—often chose not to use it.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD) rose—

Mr. Field: I want to take the next intervention, but I will come back to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford.

Dr. Harris: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene, and for the tone of his remarks. I want to question his evidence about cases in which care—nutrition and hydration—is withdrawn either because the patient rejects it, as every patient is entitled to and as many do, or because, in the case of incapacity, it is felt not to be in the best interests of the patient for it to be maintained. On what basis does he believe that such deaths are horrible? Is he not aware that steps are taken by those looking after people medically to ensure that death is easy, whatever happens?

Mr. Field: My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) is making, I hope, the point that I am trying to make—but if medics are bound by a living will, and we have so crudely defined what treatment is, they may not have the choice of looking after someone and giving them a good death in the way that we would all welcome. I am not in any way trying to argue for less choice, or to close the debate down. I am grateful that my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford is here to make those points, because it pushes the debate and makes us think more clearly about this crucial area. She makes an eloquent plea for choice, and for people having the right to make the decision themselves—but I want to counterbalance the importance of that view with how older people feel about the burden that they might be. In some of the papers produced by James Woodward's foundation, it is reported that older people talked about the process of dying in terms of wanting to die without being too much of a burden on other people—as if it could ever be too much of a burden to look after someone who is dying.

My worry is that although talking about choice makes a powerful debate, if we are not careful we could build up a culture that leads old people to feel that they are such a burden that they ought to take the opt-out clause earlier rather than later. I know that my hon. Friend in no way supports that view. It is just that sometimes when we operate the law or make new laws in this place, there are unforeseen consequences, and I am anxious that that should not be one of them.

I am making a plea in opposition to the euthanasia lobby. The body has a right to die in its own time and in its own way. That thought goes against the modern view that we can move swiftly from life to death and wipe out the intervening stage—the process of dying. Dying well is about putting aside control, which, as I have tried to explain, is bound up with the essence of what we think of as a proper life. Dying well is about sometimes helping people to face the terror of dying and, by being with them when they die, learning some of the important lessons about the significance of life that become only too apparent at that stage. People might find themselves in a situation similar to the one in which I was recently with my mother, in which she was doing all the teaching and we were doing all the learning. On reflection, I feel that I came to my mother's deathbed inadequately prepared to meet her in the process of her dying.

In conclusion, the main point that I have been trying to make is about bringing dying back into life. However, the dying process is also about gathering the fragments of our lives together, and trying to make sense of our lives. If our society continues to make dying a private affair, in which so many people die on their own—or, if they are lucky, with a nurse by their side—we are taking away what I described as the last act of the great play of their lives. Sometimes, dying is an opportunity for people to make amends for events that they have regretted in their lives, but it can also be a time of celebration, when people can thank others for the friendship and love that they have had during their lives. Dying is also, as those fragments are brought together, essentially about letting go of the future, and letting our bodies take control of us. Those are the comments that I wanted to make in opening this debate, and I am grateful to Mr. Speaker for choosing this as our topic.

9.57 am

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): I begin by paying tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), whose commitment in the House to the needs of the elderly has been unparalleled, in my experience. It was my right hon. Friend's idea to hold this debate, and when he first approached me about securing it I felt honoured to be asked. As far as I know, it is unprecedented for a Conservative Front Bencher and a Labour Back Bencher to secure a debate jointly. The nature of the subject warrants a cross-party approach, and I hope that that will help to improve the quality of today's debate.

My right hon. Friend approached me specifically because, as he said, the Foundation of Lady Katherine Leveson for the study of ageing, spirituality and social policy is at a place called Temple Balsall in my constituency. If hon. Members ever have the time, when travelling north from London and passing through the very middle of England, they should visit that remarkable foundation. It was built by the Knights Templar in the 12th century, and makes a significant contribution to the care of the elderly. Interestingly, it is also integrated with a primary school, so at times the elderly are brought together with the very young to share their experiences. That in itself is remarkable.

As my right hon. Friend said, the centre is run by the Rev. James Woodward. It was his experience as a chaplain at the Queen Elizabeth medical centre in Birmingham that first galvanised him into writing, and then into directing a centre for the study of ageing and death and how we cope with it. I do not know whether he coined the phrase a "death-denying society", but that is a fact of modern life.

[Mrs. Caroline Spelman]

As a mother, I am very aware that because infant mortality has declined, there is less awareness of death among children. It therefore comes as a rude shock to young mothers when things do go wrong in pregnancy and childbirth, as they sometimes do. Such things are not talked about in our society. These days, people do not tend to wear black after losing a member of their family. In times gone by, such habits were a way of helping society come to terms with the reality of death. These days we hide it away, which makes it much harder for those who are dying and for their loved ones.

I add my recommendation to that of my right hon. Friend for the book "Befriending Death", which I have read cover to cover. It is a useful book if one has friends or family in that position, and it is not a heavy read at all. Some hon. Members might have felt nervous about attending this debate, which could be seen as being on the heavy side, but in a way death is a celebration of life. That is the important point about trying to bring the positives out of it, which is a strong feature of the book.

Mr. Field: One review of that book, written by one of my hon. Friend's constituents who lives at the foundation, said what a wonderful book it was, but then asked, "Who could I possibly give it to?" Her reason for saying that was that in our society people might take it amiss if one wanted to discuss with them the business of dying.

Mrs. Spelman: I assure you that we are not advertising the book, Mr. Marshall—but in general we do not talk about dying because it is not something that people like to discuss, which makes it very difficult when death comes to a person, or to a member of their family, and there is a need to deal with it.

The debate was applied for last week, but today is a most timely moment to hold it, because it has now also become a tribute to the work of Dame Cicely Saunders, the founder of the modern hospice movement, who passed away last week. Her story is very interesting: she trained as a nurse, became an almoner and then a medical secretary, then went on to become a doctor, before opening a hospice. That remarkable application to learning all the requisite skills for the care of others is to be commended.

Dame Cicely set out to cater for cancer patients in particular, after the Marie Curie Foundation identified a gap in NHS provision for their needs, as long ago as 1952. She advocated an approach to pain relief demonstrating that intermittent reactive sedation was far less effective than achieving a steady state in which the dying patient could still maintain consciousness and enjoy some quality of life. That was revolutionary at the time, but is now well accepted.

It is interesting that for herself, Dame Cicely Saunders preferred the idea of a death that had some forewarning, giving her time to reflect on life and put practical and spiritual affairs in order. For someone who saw many people depart this life it was an interesting conclusion to draw, and it is in that respect that her life has been taken up and pursued by the Leveson centre in my constituency, which is constantly considering how palliative care can be improved and the quality of life in our last days made better.

I expect that all those present have some direct personal experience of losing a loved one. We are lucky if in the natural order of things our first experience is to lose someone who has led a full life—perhaps a grandparent who has reached the proverbial fourscore years and 10. But for others the experience may come much earlier and unexpectedly in the tragic loss of young life, which leaves us smarting at the perceived injustice. Sadly, because of what happened on 7 July many families are experiencing great pain now, and will do so in the weeks and months to come. When I went to sign the book of condolence in Embankment gardens and saw the flowers I was struck by how many young women had lost their lives.

When someone close passes away, one starts on a journey of grief, which feels strange the first time round, with shock and numbness followed by anger and great sadness, finally giving way to acceptance in most cases. However, for some people that journey never progresses to the healthy outcome of acceptance. We need to do more about helping grieving relatives to understand that process. Odd though it may sound, a successful grieving process is a rite of passage, and when it comes around again, as it usually does, we can recognise the stages in ourselves—but the lack of preparedness the first time is hard for everyone.

Both my parents passed away some time ago in hospital, and that made me acutely aware of the difference that health personnel can make. It was a shock to discover on my mother's notes the dreaded words, "Not for resuscitation", without any discussion having taken place with a member of the family. It might have been the right course of action, but it was the wrong way to help those who are affected. If one has never seen someone dying, it is a shock. It was only hearing about my sister's nursing experience by telephone afterwards that made any sense of it all to me.

With my father things were different. I was there at the end, supported by a nurse who explained what was happening and who kindly confirmed when the moment had come, because it can be hard to know. In both cases, however, the hospital setting provided only the barest scrap of dignity, and the drawn curtains were no shield against the routine noises of life on the ward. That led me to feel that we could surely do better. Death is such a monumental experience for most relatives that the environment in which it happens has a considerable effect.

Some 64 per cent. of hospital patients express a wish to go home to die, but only 25 per cent. achieve that. Once people are in the system, the health service seems reluctant to let them go. Many people fear going into hospital precisely because they worry that they might never get home again. A particular ward in my local hospital suffers from the connotation that it is a place from which people may not emerge again. We need a better solution to such problems.

The hospice movement is still stretched, and is dependent on the good will of voluntary donors. Of the £450 million spent annually on hospice and specialist care services in England, the NHS contributes only 35 per cent., while the value of the work undertaken by volunteers in hospices is estimated at £100 million. We must bear in mind the fact that the dedicated work of the hospice movement covers a multitude of jobs. While 30,000 people die in hospices each year, there are 41,000 new admissions and 110,000 new patients, who are seen by palliative care home care nurses. The care that they provide gives the patient options at a limiting time of life.

In their manifesto, the Government promised to double funding for palliative care in England, yet we do not have published figures for what they spend on it now, so it is difficult to know how much extra funding will be available. I am sure that the Minister will be able to pick that point up when she responds.

We do know, however, that current NHS expenditure includes contributions to adult hospices, adult community palliative care services, children's palliative care services and general palliative care services. None the less, the Health Committee report noted that there are still gross deficiencies in palliative care provision in the UK. The National Audit Office reports that half of all hospital patients experience moderate to severe pain, with only a quarter of them feeling that hospital staff did all they could to relieve it.

Care can vary even from ward to ward within a hospital. There are inequalities in provision around the country. The need and demand for provision is not uniform, so a one-size-fits-all approach to palliative care will not work. For example, northern cancer networks need 60 per cent. more service provision than Thames Valley. Out-of-hours provision, too, is distinctly patchy.

Question marks over the security of funding mean that there are difficulties with the availability of palliative care. Funding for palliative care in cancer networks is ring-fenced until 2006–07, but the ring-fencing will then be removed, and there is a danger that the funds will be used to meet primary care trusts' financial deficits. Careful thought needs to be given to that possibility.

There is an excellent hospice called Warren Pearl in my constituency, run by the Marie Curie Foundation, but it is located in Solihull. For constituents who live on the Chelmsley Wood estate, which is well to the north of Solihull, getting to the hospice involves a difficult journey by public transport. Culturally, Solihull is not the town towards which they are orientated. There is, therefore, still a difficulty with localised provision of palliative care.

That highlights some of the severe inequalities experienced across England, particularly found from one PCT to another. When I last visited St. Mary's hospice in Birmingham—it is, of course, much larger because it serves a much larger city—I was disturbed to find that we do not have a pain consultant in the whole west midlands region, although it has the same population as Denmark. That is simply because Birmingham is not a designated centre of excellence for pain consultants.

That may partly explain the long delays that my constituents experience in waiting for a referral to a pain consultant. A recent answer to a parliamentary question states that almost 1,000 patients have not yet been seen after 13 to 17 weeks of waiting for a referral to a pain consultant. More than four months is a long time for a cancer patient to wait for such essential help. Furthermore, the Association for Palliative Medicine is concerned that only a quarter of the number of consultants needed to fill the places are enrolled in the four-year training.

From that, I conclude that as a nation we do not do death very well. That could be one reason why there is such a rise in interest in euthanasia and living wills. I urge the Government to consider the issues that my right hon. Friend and I have raised about the need to engage with the quality of death, which is a problem in our country. Chronic conditions and pain relief tend not to be the subject of Government performance targets, with the result that they slip down the agenda.

It is not easy to live in this death-denying society. People find death difficult to talk about, and are not sure what to say to the bereaved. The Government could do more to help both those whose lives are ending and those who must live on with the memory.

10.11 am

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) both on the idea of having this debate and on introducing it together with my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman). I hope that he is right to say that the debate will go wider than just the issues of euthanasia and death on request.

As it happens, last night I was at a dinner where the person introducing the speaker collapsed and fell flat on the ground. He did not die; the electricity for his pacemaker had stopped working, and afterwards he got back on his chair and carried on with the rest of the evening. However, it was an amazing example of what could be seen as a sudden small death—although he has now come back to life—and it is the second time that I have seen that happen. It is an aspect of death or near death that makes us realise how our bodies work, and sometimes do not work.

Normally when discussing such issues, people are talking about the elderly and those who have some understanding that their life is coming to an end, but it is not always like that. One of the most useful things that I have heard was from a mother—I forget whether her child was three or 13 years old—who said when the child died, "I have to look on it as a life completed." Death is as natural as life, and when bodily death comes it is a life completed. It sometimes happens in circumstances that are mucky, unpleasant and awful—but then birth can be like that as well. We need to recognise that death is as natural as birth, and to be able to talk about that.

My wife—my noble Friend—opened the first exhibition for the funeral service. She is a patron of, or has some honorary title in, Cruse Bereavement Care, and she came away from the exhibition in Birmingham saying that we should all pay more attention to our deaths and funerals than to marriage. Not all of us will marry, but we will all die. All of us can die only once, while some of us marry more than once—I have not done so yet, but who knows what is in the future?

My wife has started talking about how people can prepare. For example, instead of waiting until someone dies, why do they not prepare a piece of plywood covered in pictures of life that can be easily screwed on to the side of a coffin? That would be a way of being open about death. My father-in-law always used to have his coffin stools ready, although in fact he died in Greece—by mistake, as it were—so they could not be used. What I am trying to say is that people can put in as much effort and time and, in a way, have as much fun in preparing for the events that go with death as they do in preparing for a wedding party. My wife also says that 100 years ago, people were very good at death but not very good at sex, and asks why, as it is now all hanging out, we do not tuck it back in again, zip it up and bring death back into the conversation in a more open way.

My mother thought that it would be sad to miss the party after her funeral, whenever that came. She had no understanding that she might be close to death, but she saved up her old-age pension for a time to give the most marvellous party, and invited all the people whom she hoped would be there for the funeral. In fact, her experience was that after the benefit of a misdiagnosis, she died within three days of finding out that she was terminally ill. She had time to bring her children together, and while she was unconscious a senior member of my family—I hope that he will not mind my saying so—said, "Virginia, you had better get out your diary, because you are going to have to arrange the funeral." I hope that that sounds hearted rather than hard-hearted.

In 1978 I went to San Salvador as part of a human rights delegation. As I remember it now, our aim was to try to delay the assassination of Archbishop Oscar Romero. I asked him how he felt about the likelihood that he was going to be assassinated. He said, "Well, it has happened to some of my priests. Death comes, and I am going to get on with doing what I want to do before it comes." Tragically, and predictably, he was killed 18 months later, while celebrating mass in a hospital chapel. I went as part of the British representation to his funeral, representing the British Council of Churches, and at his funeral 14 more people died. They were crushed rather than shot, but when one sees 14 people laid out dead on a cathedral floor, who were alive an hour before, one begins to become rather more accepting of death. One does not accept the reason or the cause, but one accepts that death is a natural thing.

The problem nowadays is that many people do not see a dead body until they are about 60, when one of their parents dies. I am not suggesting that people should just go and find the nearest dead person, but there is something to be said for children finding it perfectly natural to see a dead body in a casket. They will become less frightened of what it is like to see someone who is dead. When I am dead, people who see me will see someone who is natural but lifeless. That is one of the points that my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead was trying to get across in saying that we should open the subject up.

I do not want to spend much time on what I call the "death on request" debate, because that will continue. However, when people start arguing for that choice, I always remind them of the story that my right hon. Friend told us about Barbara Wootton. When I first heard it in the Chamber of the House of Commons, I thought to myself, "That's something I shan't forget." Although people can draw various lessons from it, that story is one that we should bear in mind: decisions are not decisions until they are carried out. Advanced suggestions should not necessarily be taken as the last word in people's minds.

I understand that in the Netherlands they started by saying, "Let's allow an accelerated, deliberate death in rare cases," but I think that in the Netherlands now, more people are put to death—or rather, as I do not want to be pejorative about it, I should say meet their deaths—at their request, than commit suicide.

It is not the rare hard cases that are in question; the practice is becoming close to what people call tidying up, or, I suspect, creating a pressure to say, "I'm in the way; put me down"—or rather, as I do not want to speak of people as if they were animals rather than human beings, "End my life." That is why I shall not vote for death-on-request provisions. I am not an expert on when the ability to end one's own life shifts enough to become the ability to put someone else's life to an end, but if I am asked whether I believe that death on request should be made lawful, I answer no.

I would like to add one more point about palliative care, which I made to the Healthcare Commission at its meeting yesterday. The Government need to work out the level of funding that they expect to provide to the hospice movement, assuming that there is not some gross overprovision somewhere. No one wants great cathedrals of hospice care that are not properly used, but as for hospice care at home, day care and residential hospice care, it is time for the Government to move forward to the time when they can come to an agreement with the hospice movement about the level of funding that it can expect. Again, it is my wife—and noble Friend—who has taken an interest in such matters. The movement should be told, "We value the voluntary contributions of time and dedication and we value the support and money that are given, but a basic level of state funding for hospices will be given in the three categories of hospice care at home, day care and residential hospice care."

There is a duty to make hospice care possible at the end of life, and to provide that kind of comfort—and, for that matter, to relieve the acute services. People might otherwise be in hospital, where they should not be if they are not going to be cured. When it is not possible to cure, it is possible to care, and people can be helped to cope.

10.21 am

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): I welcome the debate and the speeches of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) and the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman). We are all grateful for the opportunity to debate the issue. Some of the points that have been made are reasonably philosophical and sociological, and it is not easy to give an immediate response. We need to read the record first, and think further about them. However, I shall respond now to some of the points that have been made.

I am a former hospital doctor, and for the past few years I have been a member of the British Medical Association's medical ethics committee. I do not speak on its behalf in this debate, but obviously my views are informed by discussions there. The BMA, of course, recently changed its stance on assisted dying, which has already been touched on in the debate, to argue that the question is one of ensuring that there are safeguards rather than of actively opposing or supporting a change in the law.

Peter Bottomley: Would it be fair to say that it is not certain that the BMA decision was taken at quite such a representative forum as people might have expected, and that debate may continue at the BMA about it?

Dr. Harris: As I understand it—and I am a long-standing member of the BMA and have held office there in the past—the annual representative meeting, which was where the policy change took place, is the sovereign policy-making body. It includes many representatives elected from the divisions and the crafts—the various types of doctor in the BMA. The meeting was quorate too, so the procedures were voted on by the quorate, sovereign policy-making body of that trade union. Some political parties make policy in a way far less democratic than allowing the sovereign policy-making body, in a quorate meeting, to debate and discuss such things openly with the support of the majority of those present. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman, or others who make the point that he was making, could be more specific about their concerns.

However, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that the debate will continue within the medical profession. Nevertheless, the majority view was clear. That does not mean that there will not be views held on both sides of the debate, and that is why the BMA was probably right to choose neutrality. It will never be able to please all parties. I think that it was right to choose a motion from the Oxford division of the BMA in my constituency—a motion that I confess I had something to do with—as the basis for the position that it took.

The right hon. Member for Birkenhead said that he felt that dying had been in some way privatised and taken away from society. I do not think that he meant privatised in the commercial sense; I thought that he was going to say that dying had been too medicalised, with the advances in palliative care—and, indeed, the heroic efforts that are made to keep people alive. Many people die now surrounded by doctors and nurses struggling to keep them alive, although a significant number die with good palliative care.

I note that the right hon. Gentleman applied for a debate with the title "Dying", but that was not allowed. I understand that the rules are that debates must be about things that are the Government's responsibility, and the Government might argue that they are not responsible for death—at least not directly—so I understand the difficulty of the House authorities in arranging a debate with that title. None the less, we have had the opportunity to raise a number of issues in this debate.

I agree with those who have said that we as a country and a society—including the House—do not deal with this subject well and that we shy away from it. There is a huge "yuck factor". People feel uncomfortable, perhaps because of their own memories or because they are concerned for others who might be worried. That is understandable, but as a society, and certainly as a legislative body, we have a responsibility to address these issues sensitively and to tackle them. Because the issues are not party political and it is unlikely that they would be subject to whipping, business managers do not want them to be discussed, debated or voted on, but there is an urgent need for both Houses of Parliament to discuss, for example, medically assisted dying. That issue does not affect many people, but for those whom it does affect, it is a profound issue. Those of us in this Chamber might disagree about what we would like to see, but I do not think that it can be argued that we do not have a right to debate the issue—or to vote on it, for the first time in many years.

The private Member's Bill promoted by Lord Joffe, the Assisted Dying for the Terminally Ill Bill, is a step forward. It has just come from a House of Lords Select Committee with a recommendation that it be given an automatic Second Reading and sent to a Committee of the whole House for detailed scrutiny. I hope that if and when that happens, and if the Bill has a Third Reading in the House of Lords and comes to this House, time will be found for us to debate it.

I shall now deal with a couple of points raised in the debate. With respect, I was not entirely sure what the right hon. Member for Birkenhead was trying to say with his story about Barbara Wootton. I think that he was showing that people can change their minds, even if they are supporters of assisted dying, and that they have, and should have, control and the ability to change their minds right until the end. In Lord Joffe's Bill, there is a specific requirement for any desire for assisted dying to be repeated, consistent and checked, not only between the doctor and the patient but by another doctor and others. I think that the right hon. Gentleman also said that he would have been willing to break the law, with the consequences that flowed from that, to assist the suicide of a friend, even in the generality, without the urgency of a terminal diagnosis, great pain or indignity. I think that that suggests that it is probably a common practice. Indeed, surveys have suggested that some doctors do break the law, and that a law to prevent something like that is not a safeguard against that happening, because people are willing to break the law to act compassionately.

I think that such things should be done above board; they should be regulated, controlled and counted. That is what the Dutch have found, and that is why when they introduced their system it proved popular and has been supported. Indeed, studies have suggested that the number of deaths in which people are assisted to die, or voluntary euthanasia takes place, has been reduced because of the regulation.

The hon. Member for Meriden made a point about "do not attempt resuscitation" orders. Those are misunderstood, and again we need to ensure that we have a debate on this subject. It is appropriate that such orders are discussed with the patient, but it is for the patient to decide and not, in my view, for relatives to take a view unless invited to do so by the patient. It is a private matter. That discussion needs to be had with people in a sensitive way as they enter hospital, because anyone in a hospital is liable to die. If someone is liable to die, a crash call will go out and they will probably spend their last few moments undergoing quite serious medical intervention. If they do not wish heroic efforts to be made to resuscitate them, that idea needs to be broached with them carefully and addressed.

[Dr. Harris]

There are strong arguments for us to move towards legalising assisted dying. The issue is all about ensuring that people have the choice, and that it is not forced on people who do not want it. If people are terminally ill and in pain or suffering indignity and have had the option of palliative care, they should be entitled to have their autonomy respected on that important issue. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that this does not involve many people, but for those people it is one of the most important decisions. I hope that in due course we will have a chance to debate, and vote, on that issue within this important subject.

10.30 am

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on securing the debate, but I should say that when I prepared for it last night, I was not quite sure what it was going to be about. Would it be about palliative care? Would the thrust of the argument be about physician-assisted dying? The debate has been about more than that, which makes it difficult to answer—and it feels completely inappropriate to respond to it as the representative of a party, because every Member in this place will have a view on the subject. Some of my remarks will inevitably be personal, but I shall try to divorce them from what might or might not be the view of my party on any of these matters.

I have been presented with five challenges, and the thrust of the debate seems to be that control is a bad thing. Perhaps that was not intended, but that was certainly how the argument came across to me. I must pose the question: what is wrong with control? The logical extension of the argument against control is that we should not have control over the progress of an illness. Why should death be different? That is a wider debate, which society should have, but I must ask the question.

I shall say a few words about palliative care before I get into the more philosophical aspects of the debate, because that subject has not been covered much today. It is most people's stated wish to die at home, in familiar surroundings with their family, but that presents a huge challenge to health and social care services—a point that was highlighted in the Health Committee report. I shall return to that subject in a moment.

Hospices are often a preferred place to go, if people are lucky enough to have one in the area—access is often difficult—because they deal with death very well. The debate is often about palliative care and drugs so that someone does not suffer, but to repeat a point that was made earlier, we often do not deal very well with the emotional aspects of dying that affect the person and their family. That, however, is the hospices' strength.

It is worth noting that hospices contribute about £300 million to health care in England each year, and, as has already been mentioned, volunteers do work worth about £100 million. There is, however, a huge gap in provision. Some 95 per cent. of people in hospices have cancer, but 300,000 people die annually of other diseases, and their end of life is probably not handled in such a considered manner. Not so much work is done to manage their deaths, and attention needs to be paid to that problem. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence, as it was then, examined palliative care, but made the mistake of concentrating almost exclusively on cancer. That was a missed opportunity. We must widen our focus.

In their recent manifesto, the Government pledged to double their spending on palliative care, so it would be useful to know how much money is currently spent, how it is allocated, how much extra money will be available in the next few years, and how that will be phased in. It would also be useful to know whether the Government will ensure that hospices can recover some of their costs from primary care trusts if someone ends their days outside their area.

We have not yet talked about the carers, to whom I pay tribute. We should acknowledge that the debate is not only about respite care. What hospices do so well is to deal with the emotional needs of the carers. That is neglected in other sectors, not through malice but because of other pressures and priorities.

The hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) described death as an unknown. I agree. It is almost the last taboo—something we never talk about. She said that people did not wear black, and that various other changes had been made. Sadly, as I grow older I seem to attend more and more funerals, but I have noticed recently that they have increasingly become a celebration of life rather than an expression of misery and gloom. I have recently been to some positive and heart-warming funerals, which were more like rites of passage. It is a positive move if that attitude returns in the last days of life.

We have limited experience of death. That is why we are strongly affected by the experiences that we have. However, the people whom we come across in their dying days can have different attitudes. I recall the contrast between two old gentlemen, one of whom was depressed and asking, "When am I going to die?". The other one was positively looking forward to death. He had a faith, and was asking, "When am I going to see Jesus?" He could not wait to get out of here. The difference that that attitude made to the people around was remarkable. There is a lot to be said for taking steps to prepare people with the idea that death might not be entirely negative.

It is a sad fact that although nearly three quarters of people would prefer to go home to die than to die in hospital, only 25 per cent. achieve that. However, the situation also depends on the hospital. For instance, a small community hospital can deal with the problem well. Sadly, there are often moves to close such beds, in an attempt to encourage care at home, but unless that care is good, we could lose something fundamental. If the death takes place in a busy district general hospital, however, although attempts are made to provide a personal input, that is often difficult.

I suppose that what affected me most personally was the death of my father. All my assumptions about the end of life were completely turned around. My father was the person whom I mentioned earlier who wanted to die. In the end, death came quickly—more quickly than expected—and the family could not get there. I often think that it would have been nice if we could have been involved, because my father desperately wanted to end his days that way. However, I also question whether I would have wanted that. Again, this comes down to what the individual wants, in conjunction with what the family wants, but the individual wish must come first.

I want briefly to mention assisted dying. Since 1977, Oregon has had the Death With Dignity Act, which allows a doctor to write a prescription for medication for a competent, terminally ill adult to self-administer, with the purpose of ending their life. There are strict safeguards. What I found fascinating—this relates to the story about Barbara Wootton—were the figures. Some 17 per cent. of terminally ill patients discussed hastening their death using the Act with their families, and 2 per cent. made a formal request to their doctors for assistance, but only 0.14 per cent. took the full step of using the prescription.

We must consider such options. It is our responsibility to have a wider and fuller debate in the House, and reflect on whether they could be considered. There appears to be no evidence that the law in Oregon has been misused. We talk about choice in other areas of life; perhaps we also need to talk about choice in death.

10.40 am

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): I begin by offering my condolences to the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). I also thank him for securing the debate and giving us the opportunity to discuss a deeply personal and emotional issue that also has a practical side—the care that should and must be provided for those in the last days, months and years of their lives.

I must confess that I found the right hon. Gentleman's speech deeply moving and extremely thought-provoking. I am not qualified emotionally or from practical experience to enter that debate or to discuss some of the deep issues that he raised. I do not have the experience, through good fortune and probably because like many other people I have failed, or refused, to confront the issue. That is why I will read very carefully what the right hon. Gentleman said when Hansard is published tomorrow. It made me think and wonder a great deal about an issue that we must all confront and consider, rather than brush under the carpet.

In many ways, caring for the dying is similar to caring for the elderly: we should ensure that the most appropriate and individual care is provided and that help is provided for family members and/or carers. Many people's immediate reaction is to reflect on the tremendous work of the hospice movement and to see the hospice as the bedrock of support for members of their families who may be suffering from terminal illness. Most of us, I suspect, are fortunate enough to have hospices in or near our constituencies that provide that help for adults.

It goes without saying that hospices do a fantastic job, supported by the whole community through fundraising and other assistance. This Government, and previous Governments, have introduced a level of funding that covers a significant proportion of the day-to-day running costs. However, two issues connected with adult hospices need to be addressed.

Supporting the hospice movement is tremendously hard work, which is done with great devotion by many members of the public who raise funds week in, week out. Now the costs of hospice care are escalating dramatically, and that is becoming even harder work. The Government have reflected that fact and increased funding—but I would like to see funding increase from 34 to 35 per cent. of day-to-day costs to a flat rate of 40 per cent. I certainly would not want any Government to pay more than 50 per cent. of hospice costs, and neither would the hospice movement; it feels that that would threaten its independence. However, we still need to provide extra money.

On the subject of assisting the hospice movement and making its life easier, I appeal to the Minister about the practical problem caused by the fact that many hospices are covered by a number of primary care trusts rather than one. With the devolution of funding to local level, PCTs play more of a role in assessing their contribution to the hospice movement. If as with my hospice, nine PCTs are involved, it is time-consuming and frustrating to have to deal individually with each of them. If anything could be done on a practical level to make them into a united single unit for dealing with hospices and resolving matters of funding, that would be a tremendous boost.

It is not only adult hospices that provide that valuable service; sadly, young children die too. There has been a dramatic growth in children's hospices, yet their funding from the state is on average just under 5 per cent. of their costs, which puts even greater pressure on individuals to raise funds.

As hon. Members have said, and as was highlighted in the report of the Health Committee, of which I was a member, there is no uniform consistency in the quality of palliative care. More has to be done to bring that up to a universal high standard. The National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence should look into and further encourage the development of standards in that area of both health and social care. I fully support the roll-out of the gold standard framework for palliative care, but I should like it to move on at a quicker pace if that is feasible and sensible. I also strongly support greater interaction between the NHS, social services and the voluntary and charitable sector to provide a seamless service.

I should like to draw to hon. Members' attention a pilot scheme known as the Lincolnshire project, which is being run for a three-year period by Marie Curie Cancer Care as part of its delivering choice programme. All the statistics show that the vast majority of people, given the choice, would prefer to die at home, but as we have heard, only about 25 per cent. achieve that. More has to be done to provide schemes with full back-up services to help support family and carers in giving people the dignity to die in the familiar secure surroundings of their own homes if that is their wish.

Although it is only part of the way through its three years, the Marie Curie pilot scheme has concentrated on the best possible palliative care, equality of access for all, appropriate support, and a choice of care and assistance. The results so far show that it is an encouraging, positive and successful project, which has been able to ensure that, judging by the national figures elsewhere, the needs and the wishes of individuals have been met far more than happens outside the project.

We have a lot to learn from that project. We must learn those lessons and confront our own individual demons on this deeply sensitive and personal subject.

[Mr. Simon Burns]

We must also break down the barriers of the dread and the fear of confronting the issue, thereby becoming more open and more able to work together to ensure that palliative care, and the care of all those who are involved in the vital back-up and support for those who are dying, reaches the highest standards that we would expect for our constituents' families and everyone else in our society.

10.49 am

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I, too, thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) for giving us the opportunity to debate this profoundly important issue. I also offer him my condolences on the death of his mother. This has been an interesting and thoughtful debate. As the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) said, it has been a mixture of the personal and the practical.

My right hon. Friend began the debate by saying that most people negotiate dying alone, and that that has been the traditional approach. He and the hon. Member for Meriden (Mrs. Spelman) referred to the work of James Woodward and to the idea that ours is a death-denying culture. I do not know whether this is the experience of other right hon. and hon. Members, but that made me think that as Members of Parliament, we write letters of condolence quite often—perhaps more than most people—and when I write to someone about the death of their mother, father or husband, my pen always pauses after the words, "I'm so sorry to hear . . . ". The problem is whether to say that someone has "died" or has "passed away", or that the person to whom we are writing has "lost" a relative. Part of what my right hon. Friend was saying is that we have an inability to find different words. I do not know whether that is to do with British embarrassment, but there is something that makes it difficult for us to express ourselves when confronting death, because we are conscious of the other person's reaction.

We have talked about the roles of the state, the individual and the community, including friends and family. The debate also touches on the many developments that have taken place in the medical profession. Those developments mean that we can, I hope, provide better care nowadays for people who are dying, but they also raise the issues touched on by the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) and my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Joan Ruddock). Those issues were raised during consideration of the Mental Capacity Bill, and will obviously be raised during consideration of Lord Joffe's Bill. They often touch on deep debates, and lead to deep debates in Parliament. Obviously, the Government are, as ever, listening to those debates.

I am glad that this debate has given us the opportunity to pay tribute to Dame Cicely Saunders, whose work has made us a world leader in palliative care. All hon. Members—particularly the hon. Members for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) and for Romsey (Sandra Gidley)—talked about how we can extend palliative care. This is not an appropriate debate in which to exchange figures for Government spending on palliative care, but there has been increased investment, including in the care provided by hospices. I am sure that many right hon. and hon. Members will say that it is not yet enough—but our manifesto commitment to increase spending on palliative care gives us an opportunity to consider some of the issues that have been raised. I have had responsibility for this matter since the general election; until now, the provision of palliative care has concentrated on cancer services, and I feel strongly about that.

We now have an opportunity to look further at the issue. The hon. Member for Meriden mentioned the work of the Marie Curie Foundation and the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) talked about the work going on in Lincolnshire. We have also been looking at the work of the British Heart Foundation.

We need to bring things together and consider what it has been possible to achieve—in the Lincolnshire project, for example, in which the Marie Curie nurses have been co-ordinators of the available care. It has been possible to keep people out of hospital, and, as right hon. and hon. Members said, people increasingly prefer not to die in hospital; they want to die at home with their loved ones. Another example is the Liverpool care pathway, in which it has been possible to identify the support needed in what are likely to be the last two days of someone's life. If we can build on the initiatives that are in place and give support to their carers, people will be able to go home, and die in the place of their choice.

As for out-of-hospital services, there is a big opportunity in primary care consultation. That is when we should consider our commitment to increase palliative care services, and take note of the feedback from such consultation on people's choices and find out how to spread best practice in the available services. I assure my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead that we are considering how to ensure that the gold standard framework is consistent throughout the country. We are also considering how PCT commissioning is done, because sometimes it would be better for one PCT in a group to take the lead.

We are also examining the different aspects of palliative care, which the hon. Member for Meriden mentioned. The approach if someone has heart disease or heart failure is slightly different from that taken if the patient has Alzheimer's disease, for example. We should ask what exactly we expect from palliative care services so that we can extend the range, rather than seeming to concentrate only on cancer.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend on raising this extremely important issue. The debate has been fascinating and some vital matters have been raised for the future. I hope I have been able to reassure hon. Members that we are giving the matter our attention, especially at the moment. We will be making proposals shortly.

Abortion Time Limits

10.59 am

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): Before I start, I declare an interest: I have been a member of the British Medical Association medical ethics committee for the last few years. In this debate I speak not for the committee but for myself, although my views are informed by the discussions and debates that have taken place within it and among the wider medical community. I am a former hospital doctor. As a medical student, I trained in obstetrics and gynaecology and as a doctor I was aware of the practice of termination of pregnancy in the hospitals in which I worked.

I am conscious that it can be argued that one can fully understand pregnancy and abortion issues only if one is first a woman and secondly one who has been through pregnancy. That is a fair point. Clearly, I do not meet those criteria, and I recognise that there will be those with direct experience of some of the issues that I shall raise. Nevertheless, it is an issue for society, for Parliament and for men and women to debate.

The remarkable thing about this debate is that we are having it at all. The House of Commons Library confirms that it is 16 years since the House of Commons debated abortion in such a way. I hope that, whatever our views, we would all agree that that is far too long to ignore an issue that is so important and controversial that it divides society; people have strong views both ways. It is, therefore, necessary to retain public confidence in the law, and public confidence is best retained not by running away from debate but by revisiting the issues. We must show that, as the people's representatives, we have acquainted ourselves with the ethical arguments and the changes in medical practice and social attitudes that have undoubtedly taken place since the law was enacted in1967 and amended in 1990.

It might well be that, having debated the issue, the House does not change its position but supports the existing approach. That will still be of benefit to the public and the media. They think that for too long politicians have run away from debating the matter further because it is uncomfortable—of course it is—and because it is an issue on which neither the Government nor the Opposition parties, through their party Whips, can control what hon. Members do. We Back Benchers think that that is great, but perhaps Government business managers and party Whips do not. The fact that we have not debated the issue for 16 years shows that Parliament is too heavily dominated by the business managers and Whips and not responsive enough to the views of the public in terms of changing, or at least debating, the law.

Nevertheless, we now have a debate and I have sent an outline of my comments to those on the Front Benches to aid them, particularly the Minister, in preparing their responses. The Minister cannot claim to have had no chance to consider my points, and I am grateful that I had an opportunity to speak to her about the questions that I am going to ask.

One of the key issues is the abortion time limit under the existing law, which is 24 weeks of gestation in almost all circumstances save serious threats to the physical health of the woman or foetal abnormality that could lead to serious handicap. What is the basis of that? Is it because that covers almost all abortions other than the exceptional cases that I have described, so it is a matter of practicality—nobody is denied the opportunity to have an abortion if she meets the criteria for which the law sets out that abortion is legal—or is it based on foetal viability? That is an ethical argument that recognises that the woman's rights have to be respected. However, at the point at which the foetus is capable of living independently of the woman, it gains a moral status that requires us to give consideration to its interests.

That may be a practical choice, but I think that it is the basis of the current limit. As someone who generally supports the existing laws, I am happy to defend my support on the ground of foetal viability, but we need to decide what we mean by viability. Some people argue that viability will move ever downwards, because foetuses will be deemed to be capable of living independently of the woman earlier as a baby will be able to be resuscitated and kept alive earlier by medical advances. It is unlikely that the time will reduce in the near future because of some basic biological issues surrounding the development of lungs. However, if viability is chosen as the reason for the time limit, people will feel that it will become difficult to get an abortion beyond a certain stage of pregnancy.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on securing the debate. If he accepts that the law lags behind modern science, is there not a strong case—the opposite of what he says—for reducing the abortion time limit from its current status at least to 20 weeks?

Dr. Harris: That is the point that we are discussing. I should say at the outset that I am seeking a parliamentary inquiry so that we do not choose a time limit at random. I am not suggesting that the hon. Gentleman chose 20 at random, but why not 19 or 21? I shall go through some of the premises on which the law is based, and if we accept the limit, we need to be informed in making the decision.

In the general election campaign, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) stated that he thought that the time limit should be reduced. That comment was perfectly reasonable, and it was wrong for him to be criticised for expressing a view in direct answer to a question. The argument that the issue is not political is ridiculous, as we in Parliament are the only people with the power to change the limit. It is not a party-political issue, in the sense that views vary across the parties. and I trust that it is one of the few remaining decisions on which even the Government allow a free vote to their Back Benchers.

Nevertheless, it is right that people, particularly before an election, should find out the views of the person seeking to represent them on an issue that they feel strongly about. I have always made my views clear, and other people should as well. It is right for party leaders to say that they would give Parliament time, in a way that the Government have so far failed to do in two terms, to debate and vote on the issue.

Returning to my previous point, we must bear in mind that if viability is the basis for the limit, earlier viability will impinge on the ability of some women to have abortions. I shall come back to that later. Nevertheless, it is reasonable to say that there will not be a rapid reduction in the time limit, as we are reaching a minimum.

There is also a second question. If we use foetal viability as the ethical backstop, what do we mean by viability? Do we mean that the foetus is capable simply of being born alive, or surviving for a reasonable length of time or surviving through childhood with no serious disability? Can we make a general statement about the limit of foetal viability, or will we have to talk about specific cases? For example, there may be some foetuses for whom a higher limit will apply if they are small for their date because of some developmental delay or if they are part of a multiple pregnancy, which usually goes along with a reduction in size. Gender will also have an impact, and we will need to discuss all of those questions.

The law is not clear. Case law, from a case in 1991, has interpreted the term "viable " literally, arguing that Parliament meant the literal meaning of "viable"; that is, capable of being born alive. It is probably wise, when talking about the difference between abortion and potential manslaughter, that the judges take a literal approach to the law where there has been no further explanation.

However, we are now in an era when it is reasonable for Parliament to seek to define our terms more clearly. If we mean "capable of being alive", that would imply that a baby that was anencephalic—missing most of its brain, but whose lungs were capable of functioning for a short time—would be considered viable. We would not argue that that would prevent the termination of a pregnancy where anencephaly had been diagnosed, because that would fall within the rule that allows termination up to term where a serious handicap would be produced.

In contrast, the US courts have used the concept of viability to mean "capable of meaningful life". That presumably implies a reasonable period of survival but that could usefully do with definition, unless we are happy to leave it to the courts. We may decide that we are happy to do that, but those are issues that we need to decide. If one follows the argument that we define viability or decide to leave it to the courts and we feel that viability is the basis for our law, the question then is this; what should the limit of viability mean? The key question is whether medical advances have meant that it has been reduced.

I do not, for example, take the view that the three-dimensional ultrasound images—sometimes they are described as four-dimensional—demonstrated by Professor Stuart Campbell have any bearing on that. Professor Alan Templeton, the president of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists, said that they add little to the abortion debate. He said:

"Observing these developments and physiological movements is not changing anything about the time of viability. These images, however, have given rise again to the question as to whether or not there should be a reduction in the time limit of 24 weeks. It is distressing that so much of the comment has been so ill-informed."

Peter Hepper, the director of foetal behaviour research at Queen's university in Belfast, said:

"The images offer fascinating evidence of foetal development but did not advance arguments against abortion. It is unlikely that there is any emotional feeling behind these responses. They are probably just straightforward reflexes or practice for important behaviour at birth."

Some have commented that some of the images imply more movement than there was by using a loop in the pictures in some of the demonstrations. I do not have the details of that. I would argue that we do not need to deal with the question of viability, although it is clearly an emotive one. We need to consider whether, whatever definition of viability we choose, babies are capable of surviving at an earlier stage.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): It is almost impossible to separate this debate from the comments made by Baroness Warnock about decisions that we make when women give birth 24 weeks into the pregnancy. There is now an opportunity to keep such a child alive, although it may lead to problems in later life. Surely one cannot separate the debate about late abortions from the ethical debate about when babies should be kept alive. Should medics try to do that with all babies—that is my inclination—or do we need further guidance for people making those decisions?

Dr. Harris: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that question. They are separate issues, although some of the ethical issues are connected. There are clear rules and guidelines from professional medical bodies about what to do with babies that are born alive at a very young age and with profound disability. We do not have time to explore that now, but it is worthy of debate, because questions have been asked about whether we are striving too much or too little on some of those issues.

The Epicure study from 1995—it is somewhat dated—suggested that a small number of babies, two out of 138, born at 22 weeks' gestation, survived. One of them was severely handicapped and one had no impairment. Those are such small numbers that it is not helpful to use the term "percentages", because simply one more would double the percentage. That study also showed that at 23 weeks' gestation, 22 out of 242 babies—9 per cent.—survived with varying degrees of disability. At 24 weeks, 73 out of 382—19 per cent.—survived, also with varying degrees of disability, ranging from no disability to profound disability.

If we take a strict definition of viability, that is prima facie evidence that, in theory, the foetus is capable of living independently of the woman and that the age of viability needs to be reduced. However, we need to know whether those figures are reliable, and whether the gestational age can be determined sufficiently accurately. That is why we need a parliamentary review of the scientific evidence, so that those of us who will base our decision on the science—that will not, of course, apply to everyone—can make that decision in an informed way.

A further question that needs to be raised is whether if the time limit of 24 weeks were reduced, that would have an adverse impact on some women seeking abortion and, if so, whether that impact could or should be ameliorated. There are various reasons why women have late abortions. It is important that those reasons are made clear, because it is often suggested that women who seek late abortions go into it lightly, and that it is dealt with in a trivial way. That is not my experience, and I do not believe that it is the experience of those who see and treat those women. The reasons for late abortion can be listed, and I am grateful to the FPA, Marie Stopes and other organisations for providing that information. Those seeking late abortions include teenagers who cannot face the issue or find it difficult to make a decision; young women whose periods are irregular and who therefore do not realise that they are pregnant until late in the pregnancy; women who are in a similar situation perimenopausally, in which they do not have regular cycles and do not or cannot believe that they are pregnant; and the failure of the type of contraception that stops periods completely, which may delay recognition of pregnancy.

There may also be a problem with doctors not referring women for abortions because of their own religious views. In relation to that, I support the view that it should be made clear to patients in advance of a consultation on abortion which doctor they should see. An informed patient requires that information, and it would also make it easier for the doctor. In respect of late abortion, there are also young women whose doctors might insist that they consult their parents when they are unwilling to do so. It is lawful for them to be referred without parents being involved, but young people may not be able to negotiate with a doctor in that situation.

There are also cases of women who suffer a domestic disaster—there is probably no better word for it—during pregnancy, such as abandonment or physical abuse by a partner, which makes it impossible for them to seek to continue with the pregnancy at a time near the limit. We must recognise that those women have needs and we ought therefore to think about what changes could be made if the age limit were reduced.

I believe that there is now a good case for making first trimester abortions easier to access, without the need for the consent of two doctors. We should treat them as we treat other medical procedures; it should be subject to informed consent and an assessment of its appropriateness and the best interests of the patient. There is a strong argument for permitting medical abortion—the use of the so-called abortion pill at home—where it is shown to be safe, and I regret that the authorities and the Government seem to be stalling on permitting that.

Mark Pritchard: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. In relation to the review of the law that he speaks about, does he agree that there should also be a review of abortion up to birth for disabled babies? The hon. Gentleman will know, as a medical professional, that many people are not born able-bodied, but nevertheless live perfectly fulfilled lives and make vast contributions to British society. Indeed, we have, and have had, fellow Members in the House who have not been able-bodied but who have made great contributions to public life.

Dr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point, which I shall come to in a moment. There is a strong argument for extending the legalisation of abortion to all parts of the country, meaning Northern Ireland. It is depressing that the Government have still not come up with the guidelines for medical professionals in Northern Ireland that were requested by judicial review, so that they know what they are permitted to do in that jurisdiction. I believe that there is an argument for performance monitoring of the delivery of NHS abortion services, to ensure that they are more accessible, on a fairer geographical basis.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) asked about the law that permits abortion up to term in the case of foetal abnormality and I think that there is an argument that Parliament should revisit the matter and seek to define "seriously" and "handicapped" more closely, or make it explicit that it should be up to the courts or the doctors to decide. The Jepson case, in which there was a referral for what appears to have been, on the face of it—we do not know the full details—bilateral cleft lip and palate, and in which an abortion was carried out at 26 weeks, suggests that Parliament should revisit the matter. The hon. Gentleman and I may not agree on whether the procedure should ever be allowed, but it is reasonable that Parliament should consider it again.

Mark Pritchard: The hon. Gentleman raises the Jepson case. I live in Shropshire and am a Shropshire Member, and the county falls within the area of West Mercia police which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, was involved. I wrote to the chief constable asking him to investigate the case, because I have grave concerns. The police should enforce and not interpret the law on abortion, and there have been claims that abortions have taken place outside the law. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raised that case, which shows a worrying trend.

Dr. Harris: I am reluctant to be drawn into the case. We do not know the full facts, and cleft lip and palate are often signs of a more profoundly disabling syndrome. I understand that Rev. Joanna Jepson has not yet indicated whether she will seek judicial review. We should discuss the generalities. I agree that the issues need to be debated, although they are somewhat outside the issue that I am raising today.

My final point is to discuss how we should take the matters forward. A Government response is awaited to the Science and Technology Committee's report on assisted reproduction and assisted reproductive technologies. I served on the Committee, which argued for a Commons and Lords Joint Select Committee inquiry into those questions, and the impact of technological, medical and social changes since 1967. There are several options for the Government to consider, and I hope that even if the Government will not say how they will proceed, they will at least say which they consider reasonable.

I do not think setting up an independent scientific review, reporting to the Department of Health, is ideal, because it should not be solely in the Government's purview to set terms of reference. The matter is non-party political and subject to a free vote. Another option is setting up an ad hoc Select Committee of both Houses to review the issues and report back to the House, which would be for the Government to do. The third option is a Lords and Commons Science and Technology Committee joint inquiry, to be reported to the House.

[Dr. Harris]

A report made under any of those arrangements should contain options for Parliament to vote on, based on the ethical, social and medical or scientific evidence reported. There would not be a consensus in such a report on the ethical basis of abortion between what are called the pro-life and pro-choice camps. Parliament will have to decide that question. However, there is a good chance of considerable consensus on what the options should be as to viability and time limits, if Parliament is minded, as seems likely, to support the existing basis for the law.

We need the Government to agree that if a Select Committee embarks on the exercise they will provide the time for a debate and vote on the outcome. Otherwise it will be another fruitless exercise.

During the election campaign, the then Solicitor-General, the current Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, was quoted in The Sunday Telegraph:

"Harriet Harman, the Solicitor General, said: "This has always been a matter of individual conscience. If something is a free vote it cannot be in a general election campaign."

I think that that is questionable. She added:

"We can debate it later."

Can we debate it later? What is not acceptable is for the matter not to be brought back to the House. Sixteen years is too long a time for Parliament not to vote on the issue, let alone debate it substantively. I agreed when the party leaders said during the election campaign that there was an issue to be discussed and settled. It is time for the Government to back a parliamentary inquiry, after which they should allow time for the issue to be debated and settled.

I am grateful to the British Medical Association for its paper on abortion time limits, and for helping me to prepare for the debate with its briefing.

11.25 am

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): The debate was inevitable. It is true that 16 years is a long time for such an important issue to have been ignored. We are all aware that many Members of Parliament are afraid to put their heads above the parapet on this issue, even in their own constituencies. I have never been of that ilk. I have made my beliefs on the issue clear locally. I am the chairman of the all-party pro-life group, so, naturally, I am against abortion, except in rare cases in which the mother's life is in real danger.

I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris), who has a medical background. Much of the data he provided is backed by the medical profession, but it must not be forgotten that there is also a moral aspect to the debate. I see this debate as a follow-up to the recent debate at the BMA conference. I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman had a vote at that conference, but from what he said, I assume that he might have abstained.

Dr. Harris: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the BMA voted against a specific proposal to reduce the limit from 24 weeks to 22 weeks. I believe that we should review the scientific evidence before making that decision, so I would have voted against an immediate decision to reduce the limit. It is not logical to argue for a review so that a decision can be made on the evidence, and then to pre-empt that by picking a date.

Jim Dobbin: The debate and the demands for a review of the Abortion Act 1967 were stimulated—we cannot get away from this—by the sensational ultrasound pictures presented by Professor Stuart Campbell. I saw Martin Kemp's film "Science in culture: Womb with a view?" to which the hon. Gentleman referred, and heard Professor Campbell, who is eminent in the field, rethink his position on the number of weeks in the abortion limit. Since those pictures were printed by the national press, I have spoken to many colleagues in the House of Commons, who seem to be reviewing their personal positions on the limit. I believe that they would support a proper evidence-based review. That is the aim of the debate. Indeed, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have said as much, and Lord Steel has indicated that he believes that changes are required.

For me, the issue is not just about the length of the abortion limit, but about the number of abortions and access to abortion at earlier stages. The pro-life charity, Life, recognises that abortion in the UK is legislated for within the framework of time limits, and it supports a reduction in the upper time limit to save unborn lives. The philosophical flaw in the framework is that it implies that bigger is better—that an unborn child of 24 weeks and one day is worthy of the protection of the law, whereas an unborn child of 23 weeks and six days is not. Where is the logic in that approach? That issue must be considered.

Our primary focus should be to reduce the overall number of abortions. In 2003, there were almost 190,000 abortions. That is 600 every working day. Surely, there must some agreement in this place that too many abortions are being performed in the UK.

What is society's response? Marie Stopes International has been mentioned this morning, as has the British Pregnancy Advisory Service, both of which advocate the liberalisation of abortion law. This weekend it was reported that Marie Stopes International would like to name and shame doctors who have a conscientious objection to abortion. Such organisations fail to appreciate that the Abortion Act 1967 does not provide for abortion on demand. A doctor who is faced by a woman seeking abortion is perfectly entitled to determine that, in his or her professional opinion, the conditions set out in the Act have not been met. If Marie Stopes International and BPAS get their way, there is no doubt that the abortion rate will continue to increase.

I would like the Government to consider offering more financial support to organisations such as Life that offer crisis pregnancy counselling. Life has a team of professional counsellors and skilled listeners who provide non-directional pre and post-abortion counselling.

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Gentleman seems to be leaving out a step in the procedure. Although I come from a different philosophical viewpoint, I agree with him that we need fewer abortions—no woman undertakes one lightly, I would suggest. However, should we not go back one stage, to better contraceptive advice in schools and other such measures, which will prevent so many women from accidentally becoming pregnant in the first place?

Jim Dobbin: That is another issue, for another debate, but my personal view is against contraception.

A growing body of peer-reviewed medical evidence shows that induced abortion is associated with increased mortality, increased suicide rates and a large number of severe, immediately life-threatening medical complications, as well as long-term consequences for subsequent pregnancies, such as an increased risk of premature birth and ectopic pregnancies. Two Finnish studies in recent years have provided particularly disturbing evidence of increased mortality and suicide rates following abortion. More research needs to be conducted on the physical and psychological consequences of abortion. Also, abortion providers have a duty to ensure that the women who are considering abortion are given all the facts about abortion and what it entails. A right to choose must be accompanied by the right to know, but that information and counselling are often not given.

Abortion law reform should not focus exclusively on time limits. Rather, we should consider other legislative options. There should be informed consent legislation, placing a legal obligation on all abortion providers to provide women considering abortion with the relevant information about the physical and psychological consequences. Also, there could be a compulsory cooling-off period between the decision to have an abortion and the abortion. We could consider giving greater financial and practical support to women in crisis pregnancy situations and introducing parental notification laws for minors, which has been in the news recently. However, the most important issue, right at the top of the agenda, is the rights of the unborn child. We talk about foetuses and use other technical terms, but in the end there is a baby—a child—and that must not be forgotten. Anyone who has seen Professor Stuart Campbell's pictures will know that that is the situation. To me, a child is there.

Some people call for a 22-week limit, some for a 20-week limit, others for an 18-week limit and some have even argued for 12 weeks as a possibility. This debate is the first salvo from the pro-abortion lobby. No doubt we will return to this important subject in the next Session.

11.35 am

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): I congratulate the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) on securing a debate on this important subject. I find myself agreeing with elements of all the speeches that have been made and I do not see the issue in the black and white terms that some people do—it is much more complicated than that. I probably agree with the hon. Gentleman about focusing on the time limits.

I agree that this is a medical and scientific question, as well as a moral question, and we cannot divorce the two when debating issues such as abortion. My views on the moral issue are perfectly clear, and most people will have a clear moral view on it. I come at the issue as somebody who would not support an outright ban on abortion. It is not right to tell women in particular situations that they cannot have an abortion. How, for example, can we tell someone who has been raped that they must not have an abortion? I am not, therefore, one of those people who try to use the debate on time limits as a Trojan horse to get rid of abortions altogether; the issue is much more complicated than that.

Although my moral view is clear, my view about the science is not quite so clear. The hon. Gentleman asked whether the current limit was based on the viability of a baby at that time or whether it was intended to give people the chance to have an abortion should they wish to have one. I very much hope and believe that it is based on a baby's viability. Although I support abortions for people in particular situations, it is outrageous and morally wrong to accept the principle that it should be permissible to abort a viable baby. We will therefore always come back to the science.

I tabled an early-day motion on this subject not too long ago, calling for a reduction from 24 weeks to 20, and my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) mentioned that. I was, however, persuaded by the hon. Gentleman that 20 weeks is just as arbitrary in many respects as 21 weeks or 19 weeks. There may be no particular basis for 20 weeks—why should the limit be 20 weeks and not any other period? I felt myself persuaded by that argument.

There is, however, some dispute over the figures. The hon. Gentleman quoted some figures for survival rates, but when I contacted the House of Commons Library, I was told that 39 per cent. of babies born at 24 weeks survived. There is clearly some dispute about the survival figures, so I find myself agreeing with the hon. Gentleman's proposed way forward. Select Committees should debate the issue, and the Government should get people to look into it, so that we can have a debate that is based on science and fact rather than raw emotion. I accept that my figure of 20 weeks was perhaps arbitrary; it was designed to move the debate on, which is why I welcome this debate.

Medical science moves on regularly, and I agree that it is an outrage that we have not debated this issue for 16 years. Medical science moves on very quickly, and those like me who feel that abortions need to be legal find it unacceptable that the time limit has not been debated for 16 years. Perhaps the law should enshrine the medical science rather than setting what may, given the progress of medical science, end up being an arbitrary time limit that is out of date within a year or so. Perhaps it should focus on the medical science and say, for example, that the ongoing abortion limit should be based on 10 per cent. of the number of babies born at that time—I simply pluck that figure out of the air. Rather than sticking to a particular time limit, which will inevitably become out of date very quickly, we should stick to something that is based on science and on a particular principle.

The hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) talked about how many abortions there are. I agree that there are far too many unwanted pregnancies and far too many abortions. There is a feeling around the country that abortions are sometimes too easy to obtain. I, for one, want something to be done to tackle that view, whether or not it is a misconception. I certainly do not accept that more sex education in schools is the way to avoid unwanted pregnancies and abortions, which I believe is what the hon. Member for

[Philip Davies]

Romsey (Sandra Gidley) was talking about. So far as I can tell, the more sex education we have in schools, the more unwanted pregnancies and abortions there are.

Mark Pritchard: That is an important point. A huge amount of public money has been spent on so-called health education in schools, yet there has been a huge increase in teenage pregnancies and sexually transmitted diseases. I question the whole logic of all this public money being spent, as the outputs are clearly not what they should be. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees.

Philip Davies: I have an awful amount of sympathy for what my hon. Friend says. The evidence is perfectly clear.

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Gentleman is obviously new to the House, so may I refer him to the Health Committee report on sexual health, which demonstrates quite adequately that current levels of education in schools are woefully inadequate? We took evidence from young people, so perhaps he will read the report before he comments further.

Philip Davies: I thank the hon. Lady for her advice, but simply because a Select Committee gives a particular recommendation does not necessarily mean that I must agree with it. I am sure that she does not necessarily agree with every recommendation made by every Committee. I try to use my own practical experience and consider these things from my own perspective as well.

Dr. Harris: I rise briefly to clarify the record. The figure that I gave was of 19 per cent. of people surviving up to six-year follow-up. Perhaps the figures that the hon. Gentleman obtained from the Library were different because they did not relate to people surviving up to six-year follow-up. Is he really saying that the so-called Widdecombe strategy of more ignorance for dealing with unwanted pregnancy is the way forward?

Philip Davies: I thank the hon. Gentleman for trying to clarify the discrepancy in the figures. I suspect that he might well be right about that. I merely make the observation that sex education, which has been piled on schools more and more year on year, does not appear to have had any great impact on the number of unwanted pregnancies and the number of abortions. In fact, the problem seems to have worsened.

It strikes me that the idea that more sex education will sort out all our problems is an easy and cheap solution. We have given sex education a particularly good go for several years and it does not appear to have worked, so a different strategy might need to be adopted. This never-ending sex education thing seems to encourage a fascination in the whole subject rather than preventing people from indulging in these pastimes and successfully preventing unwanted pregnancies and therefore abortions.

The facts are there for people to see; sex education has not worked. I do not feel particularly comfortable sending my children off to school to be told someone else's moral view on such issues. Children go to school to be taught things that their parents cannot teach them, not to be taught things that parents can perfectly adequately talk to their children about. This sex education business does not help to reduce unwanted pregnancies and abortions. That has become evident to an awful lot of people around the country. I am sorry that so many people have been fascinated by this sex education bandwagon and will not challenge some of the conventional wisdom around the country on these matters.

This is an important subject that we should be prepared to debate openly and rationally. I accept that some people have a particular moral view and abhor all abortions. That is a perfectly legitimate view. I do not share it, but the point about time limits is important. Sixteen years is far too long. The hon. Gentleman's recommendations for getting the matter resolved in this Parliament are good. I support them wholeheartedly. I hope that the Minister will agree that, should the Select Committees give some time to discussing this, it can be debated in the Chamber and the matter can be decided once and for all in this Parliament.

11.45 am

Lynda Waltho (Stourbridge) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) on securing the debate. I am glad that we have been able to discuss the topic more or less intelligently and sensitively without anti-choice campaigners trying to revisit the long-decided debate over whether legal abortions should be available. As those who have seen the film "Vera Drake" are vividly reminded, the choice is not whether we have abortion, but whether we have legal or illegal abortion.

Abortion has been legal in this country since 1967 and is very tightly regulated. Uniquely, for a medical procedure, two doctors must authorise an abortion. It is not easy to obtain an abortion and we do not have abortion on demand. Statistics from 2003 show that 182,000 women in England and Wales had terminations; only 13 per cent of those were later than 13 weeks' gestation. Late terminations are very rare; so rare that the figures are difficult to obtain for any categories later than 13 weeks because to do so starts to compromise confidentiality.

In the west midlands where my constituency is situated, 18,000 women had terminations in 2003. Much recent debate has been about reductions in the abortion time limit but I would argue, contrary to the hon. Gentleman, that it is as important and useful to call for research into why these few women who have terminations after 22 weeks—the figure is less than 2 per cent.—are requesting so late. We need to remedy that and also look at the requirement for a second doctor to authorise the procedure.

The decision to have a termination is never easy and never taken lightly by any woman facing an unplanned pregnancy. That is especially true for late terminations, which are not pleasant for anybody involved. Late termination is difficult emotionally for all in those circumstances. As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, the patients referred are often distraught because their wanted pregnancy is affected by abnormality, shocked by a late diagnosis of pregnancy, struggling with awful personal circumstances or, as in the cases I have come across in my work with young women, desperate because it has taken so long to arrange.

We all know that while a termination still carries less risk to a woman than giving birth, the earlier a termination takes place, the more straightforward it is. In the west midlands we have the worst record for early termination; only 46 per cent. of terminations take place under nine weeks compared with 58 per cent. nationally. Along with local practitioners and counsellors I am calling for continued expansion of sex and relationships education, improved access to confidential contraception services and speedier access to termination services when contraception fails.

A recent evaluation of the teenage pregnancy strategy showed how seriously it has been taken at a local level and highlights the work of the teenage pregnancy co-ordinators, but it also confirmed how much needs to be done. More than two thirds of young people still do not feel that the sex and relationships education they receive at school fully meets their needs and they are not confident that they can access confidential services for advice and contraception. It is time to look seriously at making SRE a compulsory part of the national curriculum.

Sandra Gidley: The hon. Lady mentioned an important word there—relationships. That is crucial. In countries where SRE has a heavy focus on relationships, the unwanted pregnancy rate has dropped. I am pleased to hear the line of thought she is developing.

Lynda Waltho: I was hoping to come on to that point. Of course, it is the relationship part of the whole process that is important. Parents contributing to sex education is excellent. I hope that that is what I provide for my children at home, but not all children have parents or the sort of parents who can guide and listen to them and be available for sex education. The hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) overlooks a great problem: many parents, for one reason or another, cannot provide sex education.

Comprehensive SRE would teach young people how to protect themselves against unplanned pregnancies and sexually transmitted infections and about local confidential services. It would also, crucially, help them to understand and resist peer pressure to have sex too early—that is the biggest problem—and to develop the communication and negotiation skills that they need to build successful relationships. I would welcome my hon. Friend the Minister's comments on that.

I welcome the recent input from the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists in the form of guidelines to its members calling for women meeting the legal requirements to be referred without delay. That is a vital element. As a former teacher and a youth worker, I know that it is one of the biggest single issues in young women presenting late.

11.51 am

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris)—one of my predecessors as Liberal Democrat health spokesman—on initiating the debate and on his measured and well-informed contribution. As he said, he is a member of the British Medical Association's medical ethics committee, so he is very well informed on these matters. Coming from somewhat different ethical standpoints, we do not always reach the same conclusions, but I certainly respect both his contribution and the fact that he has brought this very important issue to the House today.

Although short, the debate has been lively. I was pleased to hear some discussion of prevention, because the danger of a debate on time limits is that we focus on the question of 22, 23 or 24 weeks when, according to the BMA's excellent factual briefing on the issue, which I think is intended to be fairly neutral, 0.75 per cent. of abortions take place after 22 weeks. If we spend all our parliamentary time, effort and energies focusing on the period after 22 weeks, we miss the other 99 and a bit per cent. For those who, like me and, I think, many hon. Members, take the view that there are simply too many abortions, not least for the welfare of women themselves, there is a danger in focusing the debate too narrowly, so I welcome our discussion of prevention.

Clearly, prevention can come at different stages in the process. As the hon. Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) said, there are excellent pregnancy crisis services run by a variety of organisations, not necessarily by those that are strongly associated with one camp. A new service in my constituency, the Willow Tree pregnancy crisis centre, of which I am a patron, has been warmly welcomed by the local community as somewhere for a woman to turn to if she becomes pregnant unintentionally and wants to talk through the options with someone. The hon. Gentleman used the term "non-directive". The centre with which I am familiar will support a woman through her decision and will not turn its back on her if she takes a decision that perhaps is not the one that the founders of the group would have wanted. It supports people come what may.

One thing that I have observed is how poorly funded pregnancy crisis centres are. The group set up in my constituency has had to scrabble around for charitable funding in fairly small doses and has had to write to local businesses for small grants. Could the Minister say something more about what the Government are doing to ensure that women who want such support—often from other women from the local community and not necessarily from health professionals—can access it easily, locally and conveniently?

Prevention is critical, and an earlier stage of prevention involves education, which we have talked about. Where I perhaps differ from the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) is that the characterisation that he gives is of our schools talking about sex all the time. I strongly suspect that there is the whole spectrum in our schools. Some sex education is predominantly biological, and I would like to see it set in a moral context—not necessarily moralising, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley) mentioned, in the context of relationships. That would make it easier, particularly for young women who want to delay having sex for the first time.

Although some parents are good at communicating what children need to know about sex, we have a responsibility to the children whose parents will not do that, as the hon. Member for Stourbridge (Lynda Waltho) said. I am not sure how the hon. Gentleman would respond, but from where will the children whose parents are not providing sex education—it is clear that there are such children—get the information, if not systematically and reliably at schools?

Philip Davies: It would be fair to say that sex education in schools may have a small part to play. What I object to is the continuing call for more and more sex education in schools, which strikes me not as the solution to the problem but as the easy, cheap response. Does the hon. Gentleman not accept that with the more calls that we have for more sex education in schools, the problem seems to get worse and worse?

Steve Webb: As my hon. Friend said, we need to look at the evidence. There are different approaches to sex and relationship education across Europe and beyond, and there are very different patterns of unwanted pregnancies. It is far from clear that there is a simple link. In a sense, why would one be opposed to education? Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is saying that he does not think that it is education—

Philip Davies: More and more education.

Steve Webb: Why would anyone object to more education? What is wrong with education? I think that the hon. Gentleman does not agree with the philosophy behind the education and thinks that it is propaganda or something else. Clearly, we need to ensure that what is happening in our classrooms is education based on information and a moral and ethical framework, including the context of relationships. We need to ensure that that happens, and I do not see how anybody could be against proper education. If children do not get information from their parents or teachers, they will get it from their mates, who may not be the most reliable source.

Where I part company with my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon is on the close link between the debate on the time limit of 24 or 22 weeks and the rules for first trimester abortions. I am happy to debate access to abortion in the first 12 weeks, but the link between the two is tenuous. It is interesting that some people see this debate as a stalking horse for a total ban on all abortions while others see it as a stalking horse for a great liberalisation. I was surprised to see briefing material from the Society for the Protection of the Unborn Child, which was against the debate because it was worried that it would lead to greater liberalisation. The issues might be usefully debated, but I do not see much of a causal link between the two. We should not just assume that if we are going to reduce the upper limit, we have to make abortion easier in the earlier days. I do not accept that logic.

Dr. Harris: I see my hon. Friend's point, but I was trying to make a wider point that women find it very difficult to get even second trimester abortions without significant delay. If the limit were reduced to 22 weeks, that would mean that women who would otherwise qualify would be outwith the limit, simply because of the delays in the system for referral or provision of service.

Steve Webb: That is a helpful clarification, and clearly what we want to avoid is arbitrariness. It would be unfair if one woman fell the wrong side of the line because of local delays in provision.

On my hon. Friend's important point about a joint science and technology Committee, there is a strong case for a Committee of both Houses advising us. Where I part company with him again—this comes back to the point made by the hon. Member for Shipley—is that it is clearly not an issue just for the scientists. One of my worries about having the two Science and Technology Committees reporting to the House is that we are being dominated by the science. The science is important—we need to be well informed—but it is far from the whole issue. If we are considering a strategy for reducing abortions, we should think about the causes, education and social issues. Scientific committees do not have a unique insight into such things. A wider group of parliamentarians, informed by the science, might be able to help the House in its deliberations.

While the hon. Gentleman was talking about education, I looked up the figures on the ages of mothers having abortions. Nearly three quarters are over 20. There is, again, a danger of thinking that we are debating teenage mums. Many of the women having abortions are relatively mature adults—their ages range across a wide spectrum. Therefore, our policy must be broadly drawn. The issues affecting women further into their childbearing years will be different from those affecting 15-year-olds. Policy needs to be tailored to the needs of individuals, rather than being broad brush and dealing with generalisations.

I very much welcome the fact that my hon. Friend raised the matter, on which he is very well informed, in such a measured way. I am concerned that if we focus just on abortions post-20 weeks and post-22 weeks, we will miss the bigger picture. The Government are not doing enough to tackle the fact that the number of abortions is gradually but remorselessly rising. It does not matter where one stands, whether one is pro-life or pro-choice, none of us can regard that as satisfactory. What is the Government's strategy for turning the tide, regardless of any specific decision on the small number of abortions that take place in the later weeks of pregnancy?

12.2 pm

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I, too, add my congratulations to the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris) on having secured the debate. I also thank him for having sent me an indication as to what he intended to say. I found that very helpful.

No law can deal perfectly with such complex issues, and our present abortion laws are not perfect. However, it is important that, however complex the issue, the law reflects society's view. If it does not, it risks being seen as over-restrictive or morally at fault, and thereby undermining the rule of law in general. Aspects of the current legislation need to be addressed. On serious handicap, the law states that non-emergency abortions should not take place after 24 weeks. We are, however, aware of a recent newsworthy example of a foetus that was aborted after 24 weeks because it had been diagnosed with a cleft lip and palate. Although that condition might be a symptom of a failure of the skull to fuse—and, therefore, a serious handicap under statutory ground (e)—it might also be something as trivial as a harelip. It is vital that the wishes of Parliament are clear. This might, therefore, be the time to issue guidance under the 1967 Act as to what constitutes a serious handicap. To my knowledge, there has never been a definition of that term. I would welcome the Minister's views on that.

As we know, more than 90 per cent. of abortions each year take place on ground (c), a risk to the physical or mental health of the woman. There is a fear that that is a vehicle through which abortion on demand is being secured. If that is the case, we may need to examine whether changes are required to our legislation. Perhaps, like France, Germany, Holland and Russia, we should place abortion on demand in the first trimester on a firm legislative footing, or perhaps statutory ground (c) should be tightened further. Either way, Parliament, in full command of the evidence, should be free to take the decision. It is important that the wishes of Parliament, once decided, be respected. I am not sure that that is the case at the moment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, I think—

Sir John Butterfill (in the Chair): Order. I should point out that I am not a Deputy Speaker. The correct address while I am in the Chair is Sir John.

Mr. Baron: Thank you, Sir John. I apologise.

We should respect other countries' views on abortion. Last October, it was reported that the British Pregnancy Advisory Service was facilitating terminations after 24 weeks by referring women to a clinic in Spain that was willing to perform such terminations. However, Spain does not permit abortions after 22 weeks unless the health of the mother is in grave danger. A report into the activities of the BPAS by the chief medical officer has been concluded but has yet to be published. Will the Minister say when that report will be published? It is important that the laws of this and other countries are respected, especially as the BPAS receives NHS funds of about £12 million a year to carry out abortions.

The time limit has raised several issues. Last summer, the debate about the upper limit on abortion was sparked by the vivid images of a foetus at 18 weeks' gestation. The images displayed a foetus seemingly exhibiting uniquely human, child-like characteristics, the effect of which was to sharpen our minds on the debate surrounding the moral status of that foetus.

Our abortion laws have to date steered clear of moral issues, as the hon. Gentleman said. Instead, the upper time limit for non-emergency abortions has been based on the simple and probably most objective test: the point at which the foetus becomes viable. The precedent for that was the Infant Life Preservation Act 1929, which made it an offence to destroy the life of a child capable of being born alive. When the 1967 Act was passed, the limit for non-emergency abortions was assumed to be 28 weeks, because that was the point at which a foetus became viable. In 1990, for the first time, legislation set a time limit at 24 weeks, reflecting medical advances since 1967. There have been developments in the use of mechanical ventilation which should be studied very carefully. It is likely that a foetus can be viable at 22 weeks or even earlier.

I refer the Chamber to data published on the website of the British Medical Journal as part of the Trent health region study, which shows that between 1998 and 2001, 7 per cent. of all European births at 22 weeks in the Trent health region survived through to discharge from hospital. A few years later, that proportion may be even higher. If the time at which a foetus becomes viable has indeed fallen, we must consider reducing the limit in the 1990 Act, which amended the 1967 Act. However, the medical and scientific evidence must be properly examined and hon. Members are not in a position to take such decisions because we are not in full possession of the facts. That is why I support the hon. Gentleman's call on the Government to respond to the Science and Technology Committee's report on human reproductive technologies and the law, published in March. The report called on both Houses to set up a Joint Committee to consider the scientific, medical and social changes in relation to abortion that have taken place since 1967, with a view to presenting options for new legislation.

I hope the debate that follows will be much fuller and broader than we have had in the past on this issue, for two reasons: first, because it is obvious that there is a broad range of views. We, as hon. Members, have a free vote on the issue; I make it clear that the views I express are my own and do not necessarily reflect the views of the official Opposition. Secondly, there should be a broader debate because so far it has been too restricted, concentrating on time limits as guided by the concept of viability.

I, for one, have trouble with the idea that the state has a right to interfere in such difficult decisions, especially during the early weeks and months of a pregnancy when, for example, the woman has been raped. We must question the right of the state in such circumstances. However, the state should do more to help women to go their full term. We must not underestimate how difficult such a decision is for many women, who suffer the heartache of making the decision, and who often feel alone when they are making it. There are many groups that support women in those circumstances, and we, as a Chamber, want to acknowledge that and congratulate them on the excellent work that they do. However, the state could, for example, put more resources into the adoption services, so that if a woman were toying with the idea of abortion because she felt that she did not want the child after birth, at least there would be a further option, that of adoption, which could avoid abortion itself. We must, as a Parliament, question whether the state is doing enough to support women who are making those difficult decisions, often at times when they feel alone.

I look forward to a broad and full debate when the time comes—perhaps broader than we have had in the past. However, before that debate takes place—I am conscious that time is pushing on, and I want to give the Minister time to answer the various questions that have been asked—I should like to end by reiterating some of the questions that I have raised regarding the existing law. I shall focus on existing law, because I believe that it needs to be examined carefully.

The Minister needs to answer the questions about serious handicap that I have asked. For example, has she given any thought to publishing guidance under the 1967 Act to provide health practitioners with an exact definition of what "serious handicap" means? In that vein, I should like briefly to flag up one issue that is of interest to me. First, the Minister will be aware that something like 9,000 women travel to the UK to have abortions, many from Northern Ireland. Will the Government now consider extending the scope of the 1967 Act to Northern Ireland?

Secondly, there is a suspicion that the will of Parliament is not being abided by, and that category (c) is perhaps a loophole through which abortions on demand are progressed. That must be addressed. We must recognise that fact, and decide whether we should allow abortion on demand, perhaps in the first trimester, or whether category (c) needs to be tightened up. That is an issue where the will of Parliament is not being abided by.

Thirdly, the Government must face up to their responsibility and address the issues raised by the cases surrounding the BPAS at a time when we are all calling for a greater examination of the medical advances and the evidence that should be made available. It is wrong when the Government delay the publication of relevant evidence in the case of the BPAS. When will the Government set a date on which to publish the BPAS study?

Finally, the Government must recognise—I hope to hear encouraging noises from the Minister—that medical advances have been made. I supported the hon. Gentleman in his call for a full debate on this difficult and sensitive issue, and I believe that the Government should set up a Joint Committee to consider it. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response.

12.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): Sir John, I am pleased to be able to respond to the debate introduced by the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Dr. Harris). I am going to try to get through as many questions that were asked as possible, so I shall try to avoid taking interventions. If there is something that I have not covered, I suggest to hon. Members that they seek me out and I will write to them further if they are not happy with my reply.

First, in 1967 and 1990, Parliament decided that abortions may be lawfully carried out in the circumstances specified in the Abortion Acts. We have heard a considerable number of contributions about that legislation this morning. Women are legally entitled to seek an abortion at the gestation periods that Parliament sets. It should be recognised that the proportion of abortions carried out at over 20 weeks gestation is small; just 1.6 per cent. of abortions carried out on residents of England and Wales in 2003. In fact, 87 per cent. of abortions are carried out at under 13 weeks gestation and of those, 58 per cent. were at under 10 weeks.

I am pleased to say that since 2002–03, there has been an indicator on access to abortion services in the primary care trust star ratings that have been set. That is important, because a number of hon. Members have raised during the debate the issue of access to abortion during the first trimester. The Government have put a lever on PCTs to do what they can to improve services. I am afraid to say that services are patchy in different parts of the country. We are trying to improve that with the star rating. Early indications are that it is having some effect. I hope that those who are not against abortion in principle will welcome that.

Access to abortion before nine weeks' gestation is important because it allows women a choice of surgical or medical abortion. I will address the point on medical abortion made by the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon later.

The time limit in section 1(1)(a) of the Abortion Act 1967 was reduced from 28 weeks to 24 weeks by a free vote in Parliament in 1990. There is no time limit for certain categories. Amendments were submitted by Back Benchers and were attached to the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990. The Government made parliamentary time available for the issue then because there was a consensus in the medical and scientific community that the time limit should be reduced. The debate that informed that decision considered a wide range of ethical and practical issues. Today, neither the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists nor the BMA thinks that abortion time limits need to be reviewed, which is why the Government have no plans to do so. The circumstances were very different in 1990, when there was more of a consensus across the medical world that the situation needed to be addressed.

The Births and Deaths Registration Act 1953, as amended, provides for the registration of babies born dead after 24 weeks' gestation. That is described as the legal age of viability. Guidance from the British Association of Perinatal Medicine introduces the concept of a threshold of viability of 22 to 26 weeks' gestation. Although the possibility of survival for extremely pre-term babies has improved—of course, we are aware of that—data suggests that even with modern intensive care, the chances of survival at 22 weeks' gestation are only about 1 per cent, whereas at 24 weeks they are about 26 per cent. A recent BMA briefing paper entitled, "Abortion time limits", highlighted the fact that gestational age is not the only factor that affects whether a foetus is considered to be viable. Several Members have acknowledged that today.

One question asked today was whether the reduction of the 24-week limit would impact adversely on some women seeking abortion. If the time limit were changed, there would need to be a full assessment of the impact and outcomes of the change. Recent research gave some reasons why women seek abortions at later gestations, including their failure to recognise the pregnancy earlier, a delay in seeking abortion due to personal circumstances, and, of course, the diagnosis of foetal abnormality. In some cases, screening is available only at 18 weeks and onwards.

It is important to allow the woman, her partner and other family members who may be involved sufficient time to make that decision based on the information resulting from such a screening. The woman must be allowed enough time to assess the reality of caring for the child should it be born with a disability. It is important that there is time in the process not only for women to decide to have an abortion, but for them to decide not to have one.

We are bound by the science. I am sure that if there were an earlier opportunity to test for foetal abnormalities, most people would welcome that, but, as far as I am aware, science has not advanced to the point at which that is possible. There are clear issues about what information is given to the pregnant woman and the time that she is allowed to make a choice in difficult circumstances. Therefore, there are a number of reasons why abortions take place beyond 20 weeks, and such abortions are few compared to the overall number.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) and other Members asked about abortions beyond 24 weeks on the ground of foetal abnormality.

Dr. Harris: The Minister said that because the RCOG and BMA have not called for a reduction in the time limit, the Government have no plans to review it. They are two different considerations. Neither the RCOG nor the BMA has said that there is no need to review the issue. The comment I have from the RCOG is to the effect that it is not convinced of the need to change the upper gestational limit of abortion at present and that that would require a debate that went much wider than just the context of abortion. My question is whether the Minister envisages a review so that all of us, including those organisations, can decide whether there should be a change.

Caroline Flint: I was trying to explain the context in which a decision was taken to accept amendments to the Bill that was discussed in 1990. That decision was taken because there was consensus across the medical community that the 28-week time limit was too high, but as I have tried to explain, there is not the same consensus now. We keep all these issues under review and we are, of course, open to contributions from not only Committees and Members of the House, but organisations outside the House, which keep us in touch with the latest science and medical developments.

When the issue of abortion beyond 24 weeks was discussed in 1990, it was decided that abortion should be available without time limit in some circumstances. The decision is a difficult one. About 100 abortions take place each year at gestations beyond 24 weeks, most of which are done on the grounds "that there is a substantial risk that if the child were born it would suffer from such physical or mental abnormalities as to be seriously handicapped."

Parliament did not define serious handicap in the Act; indeed, it chose to leave that to the expert judgment of the two doctors involved, who are required to form their own opinion about the seriousness of the handicap that the child would suffer if born, taking into account the facts and circumstances of each individual case. That approach was based on an understanding of the difficulties that arise in such circumstances and of the fact that each woman's pregnancy presents a unique situation to the doctors who have to give her the choice of a termination and set out the grounds.

The guidelines issued by the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists include guidance to be taken into account when addressing that issue where the grounds in the Act are met. The document "Termination of Pregnancy for Foetal Abnormality" states that if an abnormality has been detected and two medical practitioners are of the opinion that that there are grounds for a termination, the woman should be advised that she has that option. The royal college guidelines are a helpful aid to professionals who have to make a decision in accordance with the law.

I turn now to judicial review and Rev. Joanna Jepson's case. Further to the Crown Prosecution Service decision earlier this year not to prosecute the doctors involved in the case, Rev. Joanna Jepson has decided not to pursue her application for judicial review.

Several hon. Members raised the issue of improving access to abortion. The requirement for two doctors to agree an abortion was a safety mechanism to ensure that the law was taken seriously. If proposals are introduced to amend current abortion legislation, that will be a matter for Parliament. It is accepted that the current measures are a safeguard. I understand the hon. Member for Billericay when he asks whether that creates unnecessary delays, but I am unsure whether he is suggesting that we should have a policy of abortion on demand or whether he is raising the issue as a debating point.

Mr. Baron: Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: I really would like to make progress because I have got to deal with a lot of contributions from other hon. Members.

The hon. Gentleman asked about permitting medical abortions and asked where they should be allowed to be carried out. We agree that women who have grounds for an abortion should be offered the choice of an earlier medical abortion and that primary care trusts and abortion service providers should ensure that such provision exists. Use of medical abortion increased from 5 per cent. of abortions in 1995 to 17 per cent. in 2003.

Section 1(3A) of the Abortion Act 1967, as amended, gives the Secretary of State for Health the power to approve a "class of places" to perform medical abortion. That could enable such abortions to be available in a wider range of health care settings. Two early medical abortion pilots are in progress, the purpose of which is to enable us to help define a "class of places". What is uppermost in my mind, however, is that no "class of places" will be approved unless the Government are content that a woman's safety is not at risk.

I was also asked about ensuring that patients are aware which doctors are willing to refer patients directly for abortion services and which are not. Doctors with a conscientious objection to abortion should make their views known to the patient and enable them to see another doctor without delay if that is the patient's wish. That is reinforced through the General Medical Council's guidance and the Department's recommended standards for sexual health services.

A few hon. Members mentioned the legislation in Northern Ireland. In Northern Ireland, abortion can be performed to save the life of the mother or to prevent serious damage to her physical or mental health. The law on abortion is governed by a combination of the Offences Against the Person Act 1861, the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 1945 and certain case law.

We are aware of a body of opinion in Northern Ireland that considers the law on abortion there to be either unsatisfactory or unclear but we also recognise the strength of feeling for not changing the existing legislative provision. I will follow up with Northern Ireland Ministers the point about guidance and will ask them to reply to those concerned in due course.

[Caroline Flint]

We are considering how we can look at the performance of NHS services in respect of the time from presentation to termination in abortion services in order to reduce delay.

My hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton (Jim Dobbin) was frank about his point of view. The debate has been a microcosm of the different points of view in society. Representing those different points of view is hopefully one of the things that Parliament can do best.

Mark Pritchard: Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: I will not give way; I have only four minutes left.

Quite rightly, concerns were raised about the safety of people who have a termination and whether they are given full information about the possible consequences. It should certainly be discussed with a woman by those from whom she is seeking advice about services.

Abortion, both medical and surgical, is a very safe procedure and complications are uncommon. Deaths following abortion are extremely rare, with about one death a year out of about 180,000 abortions. It is a Government requirement that all maternal deaths should be subject to confidential inquiry and all health professionals have a duty to provide the information required. Maternal deaths in the UK for all women are at a rate of 53 per million maternities, compared with about five per million abortions. Pregnancies are not risk free, and it is important to see the risk involved in abortion in the context of other complications that arise out of pregnancy. I hope that provides those listening to or reading the debate with the context for issues of health and abortion.

Any woman considering an abortion must have all the facts, including accurate information about possible complications, so that she can make an informed choice. Some studies suggest that rates of psychiatric illness or self-harm are higher among women who have had an abortion compared to women who give birth or non-pregnant women of similar age. It must be borne in mind that these findings do not imply a causal association and may reflect some continuation of pre-existing conditions, which may or may not have contributed to the pregnancy in the first place.

My hon. Friend the Member for Heywood and Middleton is absolutely right. The woman concerned should be given support and counselling.

Dr. Harris: Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: I am afraid that I will not, as I have only two minutes.

I come to the question of Professor Stuart Campbell's 4D images of the 12-week-old foetus, which was described as showing "the humanity of the unborn child".

Those images stir huge emotions, of course. However, it is important not to prejudge that those images somehow change our knowledge about foetal viability. It is a complex area and the pictures—

Mark Pritchard: Will the Minister give way?

Sir John Butterfill (in the Chair): Order. The Minister has made it quite clear that she will not give way.

Caroline Flint: I have had 15 minutes out of the full time, so I will carry on.

When it comes to conscientious objection, the Abortion Act provides that, except where treatment is necessary to save the life of or prevent grave permanent injury to the pregnant woman,

"no person shall be under any duty, whether by contract or by any statutory or other legal requirement, to participate in any treatment authorised by this Act to which he has a conscientious objection".

Finally, I turn to the points made by the hon. Member for Shipley (Philip Davies) and my hon. Friend the Member for Stourbridge (Lynda Waltho). We have seen progress on the teenage pregnancy strategy. If we consider the dates between 1998 and 2003, under-18 conceptions have fallen by 9.8 per cent. and under-16 rates by 9.9 per cent. In some areas, those figures are higher. We must consider why some services are achieving better outcomes than services in other parts of London or the country. It is not about more sex education; it is about making sure that we have the right sex and relationship education.

Sir John Butterfill (in the Chair): Order. Time is up.

Motor Cycles (Highways Act)

12.30 pm

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I thank Mr. Speaker for granting me this short Adjournment debate. I welcome the Minister. This is my first opportunity to say a few words to her.

I want to raise an important issue that affects my constituency. I refer to what was—until this year—the annual Saltburn motor cycle hill climb. I want to say a few words about the history of the event and then focus on the difficulties that exist. The event was a contest of speed and time for vintage and classic motor cycles and attracted up to 85 solo bikes and motor cycle combinations every year. The race was the inheritor of a 100-year proud motor racing tradition in the small seaside resort of Saltburn, which is located in the east Cleveland part of my constituency.

One hundred years ago—almost exactly to the month—the first Saltburn motor race took place on the fine town beach. It was sponsored by a local garage owner, and attracted crowds of thousands from the nearby Teesside towns. Saltburn sands—along with the Pendine sands in south Wales—were reckoned by the great racing drivers of the day to be the best surface for displays of speed in the entire UK. This history of motor racing developed under the wing of the Yorkshire Automobile Club from 1906 onwards.

In the inter-war years, some of the greatest names in British motor sport raced on Saltburn sands. The Guinness family and the Younger family—both brewing dynasties—had young sons who loved fast cars and the thrill of speed. They were joined at Saltburn by the famous competition drivers of the day, such as Malcolm Campbell and Parry Thomas. It was at this time that the first motor cycle races took place. Indeed, it is said that T. E. Lawrence—otherwise known as Lawrence of Arabia—who was a keen motor cyclist, once took part in a local event.

Following the end of the second world war, and the development of purpose-built racing circuits such as Silverstone and Brands Hatch, racing on the sands ceased, but motor cycle hill scrambles from Saltburn up into to the hills continued. These events were sponsored throughout the '50s by the then Saltburn urban district council and with the backing of local landowners such as Lord Zetland and his family. The hill climb remained a proud tradition and was recreated in 1993. In that year, the Middlesbrough and District motor club approached the local authorities to see whether it could relaunch an annual vintage and classic motor cycle hill climb. It was planned to hold it at the same time as the town's Victorian week, a celebration of the resort's Victorian heritage as a planned seaside town.

The type of bikes entered sound like a roll call of the lost British motor cycle industry. Their names ran from the ABC motor cycle to the Zenith motor cycle, along with more familiar names such as AJS, Sunbeam, Rudge, Quadrant, BSA, the mighty Norton Dominator and the Brough Superior—the biggest and possibly the noisiest motor cycles built in the UK. Well-known names in motor cycling such as Geoff Duke also took part in some of the events.

The hill climb took place along the length of Saltburn bank and Saltburn lane. That is a steep route climbing at an almost one-in-seven gradient from Saltburn's beach up to the Victorian gardens of Rushpool hotel, a former home of the Bell family who were major ironmasters on Teesside. The road was chosen because of the hill and because it is a very minor public highway. It is an unclassified country lane, and the local council tells me that the latest traffic counts show fewer than 1,500 movements on the road in any one 24-hour period. Consequently, the required road closure orders were easy to implement.

The local police, the local authorities and the local community gave solid backing to the new hill race series as it was seen as important to the town's tourist economy. Over the years, the race grew in popularity, and it is estimated that there were between 4,000 and 5,000 spectators at both the start and finish of the hill climb. That meant that the town virtually doubled in size on hill climb days, and those were people spending cash in a town that badly needed trade and tourist investment.

The hill climb became the Middlesbrough and District motor club's one big annual event and quickly became fixed in the Teesside sporting and tourist calendar until, I am afraid, earlier this year. That was when it was found out that due to the existence of a little known piece of legislation—much of it enacted via statutory instruments—the race was illegal and, in fact, had been illegal from the first day that it was run. That was as much of a shock to the Cleveland police and the Redcar and Cleveland borough council as to the hill climb organisers.

Sincere apologies, red faces and deep unhappiness were the order of the day from both the police and the council. The event is licensed under the rigorous safety requirements imposed by the Auto-Cycle Union and fully supported by Saltburn's parish council. The event is also a way of advertising both the motor cycle training offered by the council and the work of police's motor cycle section.

That is when the motor club approached me. Mr. Crust, the secretary of the Middlesbrough and District motor club, wrote to me and has been in regular touch with my office. He also came to see me in my surgery in Guisborough and expressed deep concern and disappointment about what had happened. He felt that it was a great injustice to the Middlesbrough and District motor club and the fraternity who have enjoyed the event. He felt that what was basically just a harmless day out for classic bikers and the motor cycling fraternity was seen, in law at least, as potentially harmful to the life and limb of everyone in the area.

The root of the legislative jungle lies in the Motor Vehicles (Competitions and Trials) Regulations 1969. That was amended by section 16A of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, which, in turn, was further amended by section 12(1) of the Road Traffic Act 1988. That means that, in effect, no trials of speed or timing on a public highway would be allowed in England and Wales, even if the highway was especially closed by the highways authority. That was further codified and clarified by an obscure statutory instrument, No. 2233 of 1993, which confirmed the position and laid down a small number of exempted events organised by national bodies such as the RAC Motor Sports Association.

Frankly, a big legislative hammer is being used to crack open a small nut. Although I will grant that the hill climb is a competition of speed and timing, it is not a Formula 1 grand prix. Michael Schumacher and Rubens Barrichello are not fighting Jenson Button and Juan Pablo Montoya for a place on a winning podium in Saltburn. Instead, we are talking about a rather sedate race of very old bikes, lovingly restored and maintained by bike enthusiasts from across the north of England.

In the history of the event there has never been any accident or any injury, and no pedestrian has ever been put in danger. The council and the police managed the event in accordance with best practice in terms of crowd control and road closure. The Middlesbrough and District motor club ran it by the book—the book being a guide from the Auto-Cycle Union covering the arrangements for such events.

As it is, the 2005 race, which would have, in a manner of speaking, been the great centenary event for Saltburn, will now not happen. The organisers examined whether there were ways to avoid the impact of the legislation. There seemed only two ways. Either the race would have had to become some kind of tame formal procession or it would have had to be promoted as a separate event through a private Bill sponsored by the club and the local authority. The first alternative was impossible and unwelcome to the club, which, after all wants to trial its bikes against each other. The second was fantastically expensive, full of legal complexity and beyond the ability of a small motor cycle club to process.

I am asking for positive action from the Minister to help the club, and possibly to help other clubs faced with a similar problem. It is not beyond the wit of Government and our expert legal draftsmen in the Department for Transport to re-examine the regulations, to see whether they can be fine-tuned so that small events of this kind can carry on, while very fast and dangerous road races are still prevented from taking place. I sincerely hope that the Minister will also talk to the Minister for Sport and Tourism, who I feel will have the same views as me on this matter.

The Middlesbrough and District motor club hopes that there might be a ministerial and civil service review of the regulations. Such a review could mean that the event could start again next year. If the Minister were willing to meet them, I would be happy to bring members of that club along so that she could hear what they have to say. We might find a way to deal with the problem and find a direction that would help the club as well as meet the legal obligations. I hope that we can have some sort of joined-up government, which is important, and that the plight of the Middlesbrough and District motor club and those who participate in it can be tackled. If the Minister could give a positive reply, I am sure that she would be welcome in Middlesbrough and in Saltburn, which is a beautiful part of my constituency. She could meet the people in the Middlesbrough and District motor club, and hopefully, they would invite her to take part as a pillion or sidecar passenger in the 2006 hill climb.

12.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) on securing this debate and on making his case so cogently and persuasively. He feels strongly and his knowledge and concern have shone through in this debate.

My comments will be divided between the general legislative framework and the specific event raised. As my hon. Friend implied, a number of motor events are permitted on public highways, such as navigational rallies and treasure hunts, but all those competing must abide by road traffic law at all times, including the speed limits, to ensure that public safety is paramount. Although he accurately set out the concern for safety in the event raised, we should remember that the speed limit must be maintained at all times and that past history is not always a guarantee of future performance, to coin a phrase.

Motoring events that could cause danger and are most likely to cause nuisance to the public, such as races or trials of speed, are always illegal on public highways. They are confined to private roads, although local authorities can specially authorise such events on footpaths and bridleways. It is also possible, as my hon. Friend conceded, for specific on-road events to be authorised by a special Act of Parliament.

The legislation specifying when motor events are permitted is in sections 12 and 13 of the Road Traffic Act 1988. Section 12 prohibits any race or trial of speed between motor vehicles from taking place on public highways and replaced similar provisions in section 14 of the Road Traffic Act 1972, which replaced section 7 of the Road Traffic Act 1960, which in turn replaced section 13 of the Road Traffic Act 1930. Section 13 of the 1988 Act allows other forms of competition or trial between motor vehicles to take place on public highways, provided that they are authorised in accordance with the relevant regulations, which are the Motor Vehicles (Competition and Trials) Regulations 1969. Section 13 of the 1988 Act replaced section 15 of the Road Traffic Act 1972, which replaced section 36 of the Road Traffic Act 1962, under which the 1969 regulations were made.

Events are authorised subject to various conditions, which are set out in the 1969 regulations, which ensure the safety of participants, spectators and other highway users. The regulations have been amended four times since they were made. They were last amended in 1993, to update the fees charged for authorising events, to amend the permitted average speed limits to which such events are subject, and to amend the list of specified events that may be authorised more than six months in advance.

Apart from the longer time allowed for authorisation, the events specified in the 1969 and 1993 regulations are subject to the same conditions as all other on-highway motor events. That is because they are large events, which take more time to organise. Such conditions include an average speed limit across the whole of the event on public highways that is not likely to involve any participant either exceeding any speed limit or travelling at a speed that may be dangerous on any part of the road. Also, the average speed for the event must not be more than 30 mph or 60 mph where the route is on a motorway. Those limits are reduced to 25 mph and 50 mph where the vehicles involved are goods vehicles, large passenger vehicles or cars towing caravans. The 1993 amendment increased the average motorway speed from 50 mph to 60 mph for most vehicles and added cars towing caravans to the group of larger vehicles subject to lower limits.

The authorising body for on-road motor events specified in the 1969 regulations is the Royal Automobile Club. The authorisation process is administered on its behalf by the Royal Automobile Club Motor Sports Association, which is now a separate body. The 1969 regulations do not impose any restriction on the type of motor vehicles that can be involved in on-road motor events. There is nothing prohibiting motor cycles from being involved in events that can be authorised in line with the regulations. However, any vehicle used on public highways, whether or not as part of the events, must be roadworthy and comply with current construction, use and vehicle lighting regulations. The maximum number of vehicles permitted to be involved in an event is 180, or 120 for night events.

Section 16A of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, which was inserted by the Road Traffic Regulation (Special Events) Act 1994, gives local authorities the power to prohibit or restrict vehicles from using certain highways in order to facilitate the holding of motor events. Section 16A does not prohibit or restrict the use of any vehicles involved in a motor event, but it is used to prohibit the use on certain highways of other vehicles not involved in the event in order to allow such an event to take place safely.

Local authorities can only use these powers where certain conditions are met. The event must comply with section 13 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, including any necessary authorisation under the 1969 regulations. An order cannot be made in respect of a race or trial of speed that is prohibited by section 12 of that Act. The authority must also be satisfied that it is not reasonably practicable for the event to be held other than on a highway. However, even if the event is authorised in accordance with section 13 of the 1988 Act and the 1969 regulations, there is no obligation on the local authority to facilitate the event by restricting other traffic under section 16A of the 1984 Act. It may do so, but does not have to. That is the broad legislative framework within which we are required to work.

My hon. Friend has explained his concerns arising from a particular case, the Saltburn hill climb, organised by the Middlesbrough and District motor club. It is a speed trial where each participant is timed throughout the length of the event and there is competition between participants for the lowest time taken to complete it. Speed trials of this kind can take place only off public highways and are subject to the legislation covering off-road motor sport events. As my hon. Friend has mentioned, it is also possible for them to be permitted by a specific Act of Parliament.

This event is prohibited from taking place on public highways by section 12 of the 1988 Act because it takes the form of a trial of speed. The local authority therefore cannot prohibit other traffic from using the highways to facilitate the event under section 16A of the 1984 Act. Subsection (4)(a) of section 16A specifies that local authorities cannot use those powers for events that are prohibited under section 12 of the 1988 Act because they are trials of speed.

The prohibition is specified in section 12 of the 1988 Act, not in the secondary legislation, and it would require primary legislation to change it. It is a long-standing prohibition, dating back to at least 1930, and we do not propose to introduce such legislation. If we allowed racing and speed trials on the public highway, we would be concerned about the effect on the safety of the general public and on traffic congestion on other roads that remained open. I also believe that decisions to hold such races should remain a matter for Parliament to consider in each case.

The purpose of section 12 is to ensure the safety of the general public and is designed to provide a balance between the rights of those taking part in events and the rights of the public at large. Even if an event were held on a closed road, there is no way to completely quarantine it from pedestrians using pavements or footpaths that may cross that section of the highway. That is why races and speed trials, which involve motor vehicles competing to go faster than other participants, are not allowed on public highways.

It may be that such an event could go ahead in future in a modified form, provided it complies with sections 12 and 13 of the 1988 Act and the conditions specified in the 1969 regulations. Alternatively—I understand my hon. Friend's concerns on this—it would be possible for the promoters of the event to seek a private Act of Parliament. My hon. Friend has asked for a meeting, and my door is always open to those making a good case, but I shall not raise expectations of the possibility of a change to the provisions that I have just outlined. He may, if he wishes, explain the results of the debate to the club, and if it were to put forward a number of changes to the event and seek guidance from the Department on whether it was in compliance, it might be possible for us to have further dialogue.

We are currently considering amendments to the 1969 regulations, and the equivalent regulations for off-road motor events. We intend to launch a public consultation on our proposals later this year. That may also inform the club. The main purpose of the amendments is to amend the provisions for the fees charged for authorisations and to specify the Royal Automobile Club Motor Sports Association, rather than the Royal Automobile Club, as the approved authorising body for on-highway events. That process will provide an opportunity to make comments on other aspects of the regulations. I will ensure that my hon. Friend receives a copy of the consultation document when it is published.

Given the circumstances that I have outlined, the club may want to discuss the possibility of a revised event. Although my comments may not have provided the comfort for which my hon. Friend was looking, I hope that they at least explained the Government's thinking on the subject and why we cannot make concessions for events of that exact nature. However, I offer the possibility that in a different guise—in a different form—that event, which, as my hon. Friend outlined so well, is clearly important to the local community and to the tourism economy, may be able to continue.

Sir John Butterfill (in the Chair): We now come to the next debate. The Minister is in his place, so we may start early.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): On a point of order, Sir John. Would it be possible to start at 1 o'clock when one of my hon. Friends, who has a constituency interest in the debate, intends to be here?

Sir John Butterfill (in the Chair): In that event, I will suspend the sitting until 1 o'clock.

12.56 pm

Sitting suspended.

Mental Health Services (South-west London)

1 pm

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam) (LD): I am grateful for that brief pause, Sir John. I am pleased to have secured this debate on mental health services in south-west London and to have the opportunity to draw the attention of the House to my concerns and those of several of my hon. Friends who represent south-west London constituencies about the development of services for people with mental health problems. I am also grateful to have this opportunity to ask several questions of the Minister responsible for these matters.

I question the way in which the South West London and St. George's Mental Health NHS Trust has gone about dealing with a series of service and financial difficulties in the past few years. My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake), who cannot be in the Chamber today, shares my concerns, as do my hon. Friends the Members for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), for Richmond Park (Susan Kramer) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey).

The trust has let down both patients and staff. It has kept them in the dark and has lost their confidence as a result. In February 2004—that is 17 months ago—it was announced that the trust was to receive £30 million in a bail-out to help to cover its massive maintenance backlog. According to research that I carried out at the time, I discovered that the trust, which covers my constituency and five London boroughs, would still require another £43 million worth of repairs to bring it up to standard.

The costs simply to meet basic health and safety regulations stood at more than £500,000, while the cost for repairs to meet fire-safety compliance was almost £1 million. Those figures were known, and every taxpayer in the country has contributed to bailing out the trust from a long period of failure to invest in its building stock.

The maintenance backlog is only the tip of the iceberg. Earlier this year, the trust announced that it faced a deficit of £8.4 million. It also announced that it had agreed a change and recovery plan, which I sometimes believe is a euphemism for cuts, to bring expenditure within budget in the coming year.

The trust is currently consulting informally on its change and recovery plan, some of which has far-reaching implications. It has identified cuts to some services and changes to others in an attempt to balance its books. It would have us believe that the cuts are all part of its plans to modernise services and provide more locally-based care-in-the-community settings, but at the end of the day there is no hiding the fact that cuts are being made.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Tolworth hospital in my constituency is an example of that. Its acute day service and therapy team was introduced with much fanfare just over a year ago as an example of modernisation of the service, but it is the first service to be cut under the proposals.

Mr. Burstow: I presume that it was cut on a last-in, first-out basis, which is hardly a good model for developing services. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham and many of his constituents are concerned that the proposals to close the Maddison centre, which is a day hospital, will have an impact on many vulnerable patients who will be moved elsewhere as a consequence.

The mental health services in my constituency are in a dire state. The community mental health teams are understaffed and overstretched, and the Sutton teams have the highest referral rate and number of non-complex referrals in the trust area. The child and adolescent mental health teams have the equivalent of 11.3 full-time staff against a national service framework recommendation of 37.4. There is an acknowledged lack of talking therapies and advocacy services.

There is still a significant maintenance backlog, and the existing buildings do not meet the requirements of the national services framework or the mental health policy implementation guide. Day services are lacking, especially for younger people, and the services offered pay little attention to diverse ethnic, cultural and religious needs.

Overmedication is still taking place to placate immediate needs, and the lack of vocational support means that people are in fact becoming deskilled instead of receiving the assistance they require to hold on to their jobs or return to work.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman not believe that, instead of investing in bricks and mortar and institutionalising people, there is something to be said for assertive community treatment schemes, early intervention services, home treatment schemes and 24-hour crisis lines? They help to meet the needs of our disparate communities. Some people have needs that being institutionalised, even in a day hospital, does not address.

Mr. Burstow: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. My purpose in raising these issues is not just to campaign in favour of bricks and mortar, but to campaign on behalf of those who need these services, regardless of whether they are provided at an institution or in a person's own home. I will return to the role of assertive outreach and similar teams soon.

There are small bands of dedicated staff—in the community and in hospital settings—that are battling on, but they are doing so in a climate of distrust and fear. I have received letters from some of them. Many are too afraid of losing their job to allow me to read out their names, but they are demoralised and they feel downtrodden by their excessive case loads. Members of staff of the acute services are particularly critical of poor health and safety measures. That was proved by the tragic incidents that took place at Springfield hospital, and for which the trust was officially criticised and fined.

Staff are also aware of the many well-paid managerial posts that have been created in the past few years. They are advertised in the specialist press, and some of them pay in excess of £70,000 a year. They cannot reconcile that with the cuts that are being proposed. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham has made that point in the House on several occasions in recent months.

Change is always a difficult process to manage, but the South West London and St. George's Mental Health NHS Trust provides us with a textbook example of how not to manage change. There is lack of direction from the higher tiers of management, and an inability to understand the importance and timing of consultation with staff, the public and, perhaps, elected Members in this House and in local authorities.

That is exemplified by the closure in April of the Chiltern day hospital in Sutton. It almost seems that that was done on a whim; it was certainly done in a rush. One of the arguments put forward was, "Well, it does not matter too much, because we can manage the fact that there are only eight in-patients who will be directly affected by the closure." However, that is still a cut, and a cut to a service that is not easily provided elsewhere. Those eight patients, along with anyone else who may need the service in the future, have been farmed out to other, already stretched, facilities in the local area. There was no consultation about the closure; staff, patients and families were presented with a fait accompli, and the excuse that was given for not being able to consult was that there was so-called election purdah. That is downright disgraceful.

The Department of Health guidance on the general election was published on 5 April. It states:

> "As at all other times, NHS staff should not be asked to engage in activities which could give rise to criticism that public resources are being used for party political purposes. In particular, you will want to ensure that there are no grounds for complaint against your organisation that it has behaved partially towards candidates or parties represented in the election during this period."

That is normal and good practice outside of election time as well.

The guidance continues:

> "It would be advisable not to start a consultation now the election has been called unless it can be demonstrated that it would seriously impede NHS business to delay it a few weeks until the election period is complete."

There is nothing in the guidance about not being allowed to consult. It is simply stated that consultations should be delayed until after the election if that is possible. Why did the trust decide that it had to close down the day hospital so quickly? It was not falling down. There were no immediate health and safety issues. Why was not time allowed for proper consultation with patients, families, staff and the public? Why was this decision taken at the same time that the general election took place? It was not as if anyone with a passing interest in politics did not know when the election was likely to be called. It should not be beyond the wit of senior NHS managers to make a planning assumption about the date of a general election.

Mr. Khan: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burstow: Let me finish the point and I will happily take one more intervention, but I want to ensure that the Minister has ample time to reply.

The general election has become a convenient excuse to hide incompetence and the failure to consult the public about proposals that would have a significant bearing on their quality of life.

Mr. Khan: May I give the hon. Gentleman another example of plans to close a hospital without consultation, and without the excuse of the election? The trust of Springfield hospital in my constituency intended to close the Cottage day hospital without consultation. Thankfully, as a result of pressure from the hospital's overview and scrutiny committee, the trust will extend the consultation process. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that such closures lead to alarm and distress for hospital users and their families.

Mr. Burstow: I am grateful for that further example of how the trust conducts itself, the attitude that it takes and the value that it attaches to consultation. The trust will have to justify its decision on the Chiltern wing of Sutton hospital. Will the Minister confirm that the guidance issued by the Department just before the general election does not place a veto on consultation and that it does not prevent substantial variations being carried out during an election period? I am told that the local strategic health authority authorised the closure decision without consultation, and I ask the Minister to investigate whether proper advice was sought and whether the guidance was properly followed.

The national director for mental health published a report last December on the progress made since the national services framework for mental health was introduced in 1999. The report highlighted the lack of investment in mental health services throughout the NHS, saying that to a certain extent it was a result of the priority that primary care trusts give to mental health compared with other national targets such as access and waiting times. That is particularly so in my constituency.

The local primary care trust has a commissioning budget for my constituency and the adjacent constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington of £20 million, yet the newly appointed director for the PCT in Sutton has a budget of only £14.8 million for services to be provided locally. Why is 25 per cent. of the total figure being used to pay for out-of-borough services? It has not been explained, which is unsatisfactory, yet one person in three is likely to need some level of care from mental health services in their lifetime. That means that less than £500 is available to be spent on each person each year.

There is a chronic lack of funding for mental health services, and the mental health trust is to blame for failing to engage with the PCT and for failing to win the case for more resources. If we bear in mind that as many as 30,000 people may need some level of service in my constituency and my neighbouring constituency in the borough of Sutton, the resources are staggeringly low. I shall rehearse some figures to underline the fact.

There are 84 adult in-patient beds in the one specialised acute hospital ward in Sutton. There are only four adult community mental health teams to cope with a current caseload of 1,600 clients and 15 or 16 new referrals a week. There is one assertive outreach team with 150 clients, one crisis and home treatment team with 90 clients, and two resource centres with 180 clients. That just scratches the surface. People who receive a service rely on staff who are overstretched and buildings that do not meet the minimum standards.

The change and recovery plan drawn up by the trust is meant to deal with the emergency; but why should it have come to this? Why should it take a financial crisis to get the trust to acknowledge the need to start tackling the serious deficiencies in the service? The proposals are in line with current national thinking, and in many ways I support them. More services will be provided locally in the community, and there will be less reliance on hospital-based services. GPs with special interests and graduate workers will provide a broad range of services. That will be backed up by a network of social care specialists, counselling services and talking therapies, and there will be a stronger role for the voluntary sector, with self help and support groups.

It remains unclear, however, where that new army of specialised GPs, social workers and therapists will be found. Even less clear is where the funds will be found to train and employ them. What about the voluntary sector? Will it receive more funding to increase its capacity? Is anyone talking to the voluntary sector about the services that it provides now, and the role that it will be expected to play in future? The community mental health teams will be reduced from four to three, yet we need more of that sort of service, not less. How does that fit in with a transfer of care from inpatient to community-focused services?

The change plan states that there is a need to access a range of other services that form part of health promotion and ill-health avoidance, including advice on debt management, benefit availability and housing. Yet the plan is to close down the Springfield advice and law centre, which provides such advice to many hundreds of people, and which had over 200 new cases in 2004 alone. Does that really fit in with the promotion of well-being and the prevention of ill health? If people are not given the help that they need to manage their finances, keep their jobs or find new ones, pay for their housing and maintain their independence, the impact on their mental health will surely be considerable.

Providing care in the community and locally based services is far from a cheap option. It needs to be carefully thought through, properly costed and effectively managed. It requires expert training for general practitioners, social workers, therapists and the voluntary sector. It needs a thorough consultation strategy, so that the public, whether they are users of such services or not, understand the strengths of the new proposals and the advantages that they will offer, and have the chance to engage seriously with the development of the ideas at an early stage.

Care in the community and locally based services need to be properly financed, and need time and patience. The many hundreds of members of staff in my constituency who are dedicated to providing first-class mental health services deserve that, as do my constituents, although they are not getting it as a consequence of the process that we have embarked on, which has left them out in the cold. They should not be left in the cold; managers of our mental health services should engage with them fully, and they should be given the chance to shape those services for the future.

I hope that the Minister can respond positively and will take a much closer look at the issues that I have raised. I hope that he can make a careful examination of the role, calibre and quality of the management that has gotten the trust into the position that it is in today.

1.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I congratulate the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) on securing this Adjournment debate on mental health services in south-west London. I am aware that he takes a keen interest in health issues, both generally and in relation to his constituency; I have signed 30 parliamentary answers in response to his questions this Parliament. I listened closely this morning and appreciate the comments that he has made.

Before I come to a couple of the local issues that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, and particularly the engagement process, I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I briefly paint a picture of mental health policy and say what the Government are doing to improve mental health services nationally. It is important to highlight that, last year, around 1 million people were unable to work due to mental health problems. Such problems are now the number one reason for claiming incapacity benefit and cost the British economy billions of pounds. Improving mental health services is therefore key in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, as well as nationally, if we are to reduce the number of people who cannot work because of stress.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that mental health is a key priority for the Government. That is demonstrated by the record investment that we have made. In the past five years, since the publication of the national service framework, we have invested over £1 billion more in mental health services. The provision of mental health services in the community is being strengthened. Mental health services have taken great strides to improve access to effective treatment and care; that is evinced by the fact that the suicide rate is at its lowest recorded figure. Current data suggest that we are on track to achieve our public service agreement target by 2010. Significant progress has also been made in reducing in-patient deaths, and in reducing the suicide rate for young men, which was particularly high.

That investment is also getting through to the front line, in the shape of a much-needed boost to the mental health work force. For example, more than 1,500 community gateway workers are working to improve the speed of access to specialised services. In England, some 343 teams are working on crisis resolution, 261 on assertive outreach and 109 on early intervention. Some 17,500 people are now being seen by assertive outreach teams each year.

Getting these specialist teams in place is an important step forward. Their work on the ground, in the community, means that more people will be supported and treated in their own homes rather than admitted to in-patient wards, as in the past. We are in the middle of a substantial reform of mental health services. The new Mental Health Bill is a key part of the plan to improve life for people with mental health problems and to make treatment more focused on their needs. The Bill is the biggest reform of mental health legislation since the 1950s.

It is important to say that mental health is no longer the Cinderella service of the national health service. In the five years since the national service framework was published, almost 30 per cent. extra has been invested in mental health. Today the mental health work force are stronger than ever.

I turn to some of the local service issues raised by the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam. I understand from officials that secondary and specialist mental health care is provided to a population of just more than a million people across five of the six boroughs in south-west London by the South West London and St. George's Mental Health NHS Trust. The trust also provides several national services and employs about 3,000 staff. About 150 clinical teams work from service locations at 50 sites across the five boroughs, and there are some 800 in-patient beds, although 80 per cent. of the work is provided within community mental health teams.

The trust is pursuing an ambitious programme of improvement across all service areas. It is working with PCTs and local health partners. My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) mentioned a different view of how services will be provided in the future, and the trust is now in the business of delivering that.

I was glad to hear that many of the benefits of the Government's policy nationally can now be seen in and around the hon. Gentleman's constituency. For example, three assertive outreach teams provide community care for people with serious and enduring mental health problems seven days a week. Secondly, three crisis and home improvement teams provide a 24-hour crisis telephone line for people with mental health problems and their relatives; that helped something like 500 people in 2004–05.

Thirdly, there are early intervention services to provide comprehensive health and social care for younger people in their first episode of serious mental health problems; that service covers the boroughs of Wandsworth, Merton and Sutton. In 2004–05, about 112 people received early-intervention help and the team has been very successful in promoting social inclusion. On top of that, the trust has recently successfully bid for more than £450,000 of funding from the Department to develop user-led services to provide support for people with personality disorders.

Much of what the hon. Gentleman said could be traced back to a couple of issues. One was engagement, to which I shall turn in a moment, and the other was resources. I know that he will welcome the fact that between 1999 and 2000 and 2003 and 2004 there was an increase in resources of £46 million, an increase in the order of 43 per cent. That has made and will continue to make a substantial difference to people in his constituency.

Mr. Davey: Will the Minister confirm that that increase has been mainly on the revenue side, and that the capital budget for South West London and St. George's Mental Health NHS Trust remains in a pretty parlous state? Although there are options for the trust to manage its estate better, given the financing rules imposed on trusts by the NHS and the trust's lack of capital resources, its managers have a major problem.

Mr. Byrne: I shall address that point during my remarks on the financial recovery plan. If I omit to address his concerns directly, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman on that point.

[Mr. Byrne]

I shall give examples of three more services that provide improvements on the ground. First, the £7 million Phoenix unit project at Springfield hospital, Tooting—in my hon. Friend's constituency—is due to open later this year. It is the first part of a major estate-modernisation programme being undertaken by the trust. It will be an 18-bed unit and replace services currently housed in a Victorian building that is more than 160 years old.

Secondly, Springboard is a relaunched and expanded service that opened in March 2005 in new premises at Tolworth hospital. It gives clients across five boroughs access to—

Mr. Davey: I do not want the House to think that that is a new service. It has been going for many years, but had four or five years of total instability as the trust failed to understand where it should be reconfigured and provided. I am afraid that the history of Springboard has been one of failure until very recently, when we went back to good practice from the past.

Mr. Byrne: Precisely. That is why the service has been relaunched and expanded on the back of the new investment that the Government have put in.

Thirdly, in December 2004 a new service, the Kingston and Richmond home treatment team, was launched to provide intensive home-based treatment on a 24-hour, seven-day-a-week basis for people in acute crisis.

In the remaining minutes, I shall try to address a couple of points before I come to financial recovery and engagement. I understand that the decision on the future of the Chiltern day hospital was dealt with in accordance with the procedures for local engagement, and that the trust had a meeting with the local council overview and scrutiny committee on 18 May, and with the primary care trust and the local authority. My officials advise that it was agreed that closure is not a substantial change, and that in a subsequent meeting the OSC formally noted the decision. In line with the NHS plan, the crisis and home treatment teams will now serve the functions recently provided by the facility.

Mr. Burstow: Will the Minister reconsider the chronology relating to the Chiltern wing decision, and confirm the position regarding the guidance given to the NHS during the election? That information is crucial to the decisions and lack of consultation.

Mr. Byrne: I shall certainly look at the guidance given around elections, because I know that many hon. Members are concerned about that.

I shall address the point about the financial recovery plan. I am pleased to note that, with the help of partners, the trust achieved financial balance in the past financial year. I understand that, in 2004–05, the board reviewed the underlying financial deficit, cost pressures and financial risks, and that the need for a programme to generate savings of £8.5 million was identified. Action has been taken to address that. The trust board has approved a financial savings plan structured around seven work streams; income, work force productivity, service reconfiguration, overheads and procurement, reduction of surplus estate, management restructuring and risk management.

The trust met the PCTs in April to discuss the financial situation and share views on the way forward as a health economy.

Mr. Burstow: Could I and several of my colleagues from south-west London meet the Minister after today's debate to explore the issue further? We are concerned not about the additional investment, but about how it is being spent and managed.

Mr. Byrne: I shall come to that point in a moment when I talk about the engagement process.

First, I shall conclude my comments on financial recovery. It is for local NHS bodies to work together in south-west London to ensure that they live within their means and plan for long-term financial stability. I know that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that. It is imperative that the current record investment is coupled with reforms to produce a better service.

I come now to the engagement process. The hon. Gentleman has raised several concerns, but I am assured that much is being done to ensure that patients, staff and other key stakeholders are fully engaged in the changes to mental health services locally. Formal consultation is being undertaken in relation to four specialist mental health services, and will run until the end of September. The principle driving the proposed changes to services is that they should be more easily accessible to patients. PCTs are committed to maintaining the same level of mental health funding throughout the process, which is important. The outcome of the consultation will be considered by the joint overview and scrutiny committee in October. If, after that, the hon. Gentleman is still not satisfied that things are being run sensibly, I will happily meet him and colleagues; once that process has been exhausted. I hope that that is of some comfort to him.

The trust must take account of its financial position, and must act to ensure that services are provided clinically and cost-effectively with the resources available. In November and December last year, 12 workshops were held, to which clinicians, managers, carers and service users were invited to consider how the trust might deliver services differently. The options from the workshops were put together in a paper, which culminated in the stakeholder event on 13 January at which the results were presented. Furthermore, a team briefing produced in May, which was circulated to the patient and public involvement forum and local user and carer groups, described the planned changes. The director of quality at the trust has met the chair of the PPIF and representatives of service users on a monthly basis, and has met carer representatives every two months.

Service directors from the trust have been talking formally and informally to commissioners, PCTs, local authorities and partnership boards about changes and progress. The next step is a formal briefing and discussion with partners and stakeholders. Two meetings with the Sutton Mental Health Action Group and the carers development worker have taken place to discuss how the trust can best develop robust structures to involve users and carers in the ongoing development and planning of their services. That discussion paper was drafted for consultation and a special meeting is planned for 25 July to progress matters.

Sir John Butterfill (in the Chair): Order. If the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Khan) wishes to take part in a short Adjournment debate in future he should first try to clear it with the sponsor, so he may give him some of his time.

Primary Health Care (Carers)

1.30 pm

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): I am pleased to have secured this debate with the Minister. As a newly elected MP, I went to a meeting of the all-party group on carers yesterday, one of the aims of which is promoting awareness in the House of the needs of carers. I am glad to have the chance to do that today.

I congratulate the Minister on his role. He has responsibility for some of the key areas affecting all our communities. Carers are an important group in our society. We know from the 2001 census that at least 5.2 million people give unpaid care to family members and others. We also know from the census that more than a million carers care for more than 50 hours a week. Research into the health impact of caring at such levels is not yet extensive. However, a number of surveys and other research have pointed to the fact that caring has an impact on the carer's health, particularly at the heavier commitment levels, and that will be a major theme in my speech.

I want to discuss the extent to which current practice in primary health care is supporting the needs of carers and suggest what the Government can do to ensure that that support is improved. Those working with primary health care teams find that many say that their workload prevents them from changing practice or taking on new tasks, but many general practitioners and primary health care teams are changing practice and taking on new tasks. I shall set out what I think can be done to move forward on these issues to improve the health and quality of life of carers.

In 1999, the Government brought carers' issues to the fore when they published the national strategy for carers. Previously, the role of carers had been under-recognised and undervalued. The health and social care analyst, Melanie Henwood, summed that up in 1998 when she chose the title "Ignored and Invisible?" for the report on her research into carers' experience of the NHS. That was why it was particularly important that, in their national strategy, the Government identified the NHS as the single most important first point of contact for carers.

The strategy identified some important roles for primary health care staff. First, they should identify patients who are carers and patients who have a carer; secondly, they should check carers' physical and emotional health wherever a suitable opportunity arises, and at least once a year; thirdly, they should inform carers routinely that they can ask for an assessment of their own needs; fourthly, they should ask patients who have carers whether they are happy for health information about them to be given to their carer; and fifthly, they should signpost carers to other sources of support such as support groups and the local carers' centre. That checklist for primary care was an important step forward, but, six years on, it is now time to look at the extent to which primary health care teams are following it.

It is clear that we should do that if we want to build on the national strategy, both to protect carers' health and enable them to continue caring. From 2001 to the start of this year, I worked as an independent consultant with colleagues on research into carers' needs and issues for the national charity, the Princess Royal Trust for Carers. I do not feel the need to declare an interest, because that work ceased when I became a Member of Parliament.

In 2002, I co-ordinated for the Princess Royal Trust for Carers the largest ever survey of carers in the UK. Three years on from the publication of the national strategy, that survey provided a snapshot of carers' needs and priorities. A second project, in 2003, focused more specifically on primary health care and the most effective ways to identify carers and get them using support services. Ministers with responsibility for social care, my right hon. Friend the Member for Redditch (Jacqui Smith) and later my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), spoke at the national launch of those reports. The reports from both projects, and a number of other surveys, have pointed to the fact that caring has an impact on the carer's health, particularly at the heavier levels of caring commitment.

More than two thirds of the carers responding to the 2003 survey I mentioned felt that their own health had been affected by caring. That was in line with national findings. Symptoms reported to the general household survey by those caring for more than 50 hours a week included loss of sleep, reported by half the respondents, and physical strain, reported by almost a quarter, while one third felt depressed. It is becoming accepted that caring has an impact on carers' health. The effects of caring can cover a range of conditions including back pain or injury caused by lifting and handling, stress and mental health problems, poor immune responses, and hypertension and the associated risk of coronary heart disease.

On mental health issues, it seems from a number of surveys and studies completed since the national strategy was published that carers at the heavier end of commitment, those living in the same household as the cared-for person and female carers are all at high risk of mental ill health. Further, a study from the United States of people giving care to patients with stroke and dementia found that their health was affected in ways that would accelerate the risk of age-related diseases. The study found that the stress that the carers experienced was prematurely ageing their immune systems. That is clearly a significant finding for carers.

Understanding carers' health problems and needs and identifying what forms of support could alleviate the stresses on carers are therefore key areas for further research by the NHS. Maintaining and improving carers' health is correct in principle, because they are patients in their own right. For the NHS and social care agencies it is also a cost-effective way of maintaining the essential support that the carers give to the cared-for. The health of groups of patients such as those suffering from diabetes or heart disease is made a priority in the NHS through specific targets and incentives. Heavily committed carers should also be a target group for support and health improvement.

The necessary first step in enabling new and more targeted work to take place with carers within a GP practice population is to step up the pace of the work on identifying carers. In the late 1990s that was seen as essential. The Government had issued national priorities guidance on it in 1998, asking GPs, primary health care teams and social services staff to identify carers by April 2000. However, that target date was deferred and no new date has been set. The good news is that the momentum of the work that started in the late 1990s carried on for a number of years, and much good practice has been developed. Now it is seen to be important that carers be identified in a more focused way. GPs and their teams see limited value in wholesale identification of carers, and often reject such an approach for workload reasons.

Current good practice suggests that it is worth identifying carers who would benefit from being referred to other agencies for support and assessment of their needs. Carers with the highest level of caring commitment are likely to be in greatest need of support, and also need to have their own health monitored more frequently. In a GP practice population of 2,000 there are likely to be some 200 carers, of whom about 40 are caring for more than 50 hours per week, so the task of identifying the most heavily-committed carers is manageable. Also, a wealth of good practice, protocols, guides and training is available on how to identify carers most effectively.

It was clear from the report of the research done in 2003, which I mentioned earlier, that the work being done by GPs and primary health care staff on identifying carers is patchy. Some GPs and their staff work on it enthusiastically while others say that they are too busy. That means that carers using the GP practices that do not do such work are denied access to the services and support that they could get if they were identified and referred by their GPs. It would help if this work by GPs were better recognised in GP contracts. In current contracts, out of a maximum of 1,050 points available for quality of service, having a protocol to identify and refer carers is worth only three points. That is not a significant incentive; a larger contractual element would now seem appropriate. Also, if the Government were to set a new target date by which primary care teams working with social services staff were to identify carers—perhaps starting with the most heavily committed carers—that would send out the message that the Government considered the task to be important. If GPs identified those carers, they could offer them a health check. Standard 6 of the national service framework for mental health explains that carers of a person on the care programme approach should have "an assessment of their caring, physical and mental health needs, repeated on at least an annual basis".

A similar approach could be introduced for other heavily committed carers.

In Salford, the carers' centre is working with local GPs to identify and refer carers for support. Staff at the centre told me about a recent case that exemplifies the way in which a carer's health can improve when they receive the right support. The carer presented at the GP's practice suffering from stress and depression. The doctor prescribed anti-depressants and referred the carer for counselling. At the first counselling session, the counsellor asked whether the carer knew about the carers' centre and whether she had received an assessment of her needs, and the answers to both questions were negative. The counsellor referred the carer to the centre, which arranged a carer's assessment. It identified the need for respite care and help with personal care for the person cared for. With that counselling and extra support, the carer has already been able to reduce her use of anti-depressants. The primary care worker from the carers' centre contacted the GP's practice and found that it had no policy for identifying and referring carers. The example of that patient showed the practice how it could benefit from working with the centre. The staff have now received training in supporting carers, and the practice is making referrals to the centre. GPs and primary care teams would be helped greatly in the task of identifying carers if the Government had a publicity and awareness-raising campaign to encourage carers to identify themselves to their GP. Friday 2 December is carers' rights day, and that would be a good target date for such a campaign.

Finally, I want to talk about the idea of extending the concept behind the expert patients programme to create an expert carers programme. The expert patients programme has been one of the more innovative concepts in NHS thinking, and I urge the Minister to look at extending it to create an expert carers programme. The NHS, social services and others rely on carers' knowledge and experience in managing many illnesses and chronic conditions. From the parents caring for a teenager with a chronic eating disorder to the spouse, son or daughter caring for a person suffering from Alzheimer's, we can see that there is a role in health care for the expert carer. The Institute of Psychiatry at King's College is interested in developing an initiative on expert carers to help those with anorexia nervosa and other eating disorders. The self-management scheme for carers at the Long-term Medical Conditions Alliance could also provide a starting point for an expert carers programme.

The suggestions that I have made to improve the support that primary health care gives to carers include more research by the NHS into the impact of caring on the carer's own health, particularly at the heavier end of caring commitment; ensuring that the work of identifying carers in a GP practice population attracts a larger contractual element in GP contracts; setting a new target date for identifying the most heavily committed carers; a Government-run publicity and awareness-raising campaign asking carers to identify themselves to their GPs; and developing an expert carers programme. I look forward to the Minister's response.

1.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Worsley (Barbara Keeley) on securing this debate on carers and primary health care. I also thank her for her congratulations on my appointment. As she will probably know, I have not replied to many Adjournment debates yet, but I can say in all honesty that of all the contributions to which I have replied, hers has been by far the best. She has already distinguished herself in this Parliament as a first-class representative of her constituency and a voice on matters of national concern. She introduced herself very modestly, but she is already one of the leading authorities on this issue in the House. That is why her remarks were so welcome.

I shall preface my remarks with a few words about the Government's national approach to this issue. The 2001 census showed that there are 5.2 million carers in England and Wales. That is one in 10 of the population and not far short of the population of London. Of those 5.2 million people, 68 per cent. provide care for up to 19 hours a week. That is 3.5 million people, which is more than the population of Wales. About 11 per cent. provide care for between 20 and 49 hours a week, which is about three to seven hours a day every day, and an incredible 21 per cent.—one in five or just over 1 million carers—provide care for 50 or more hours a week, which is more than the working time directive maximum of 48 hours. More than 225,000 people providing 50 or more hours of unpaid care per week state that they are not in good health themselves. As my hon. Friend said, if anyone is providing care at that level, it can and does have an impact on their health. More than half of the people providing that care are themselves over the age of 55.

The 2001 census tells us that, at the other end of the age spectrum, there are around 150,000 young carers—that is 17 years old or younger—in England and Wales. Some 13,000 of those care for a disabled person, usually a parent, brother or sister, for between 20 and 49 hours a week. Almost 11,000 care for more than 50 hours a week, which is more than double the time that they spend in the classroom. As my hon. Friend described far more eloquently than I could, caring can have serious negative consequences for the education and social lives of those young people, as well as their emotional and physical health.

The Government are committed to supporting carers. We were the first Administration to recognise the vital contribution that they make to society, which we made clear in publishing our carers strategy in 1999. We have also demonstrated our commitment to carers by supporting two private Member's Bills that have resulted in more rights for carers. First, the Carers and Disabled Children Act 2000 involves a new right for carers to an assessment of their own needs and circumstances. It also gives local councils mandatory duties to support carers by providing services to carers directly and in the provision of short breaks and by providing direct payments for carers' services.

The second Act, the Carers (Equal Opportunities) Act 2004, came into force on 1 April 2005. It makes three main changes to the existing law on carers services. Section 1 places a duty on councils to inform carers, in certain circumstances, of their right to an assessment of their needs; section 2 says that when assessing a carer's needs, councils must take into account whether the carer works or wishes to work and/or undertakes or wishes to undertake education, training or leisure activities; and section 3 facilitates co-operation between authorities in relation to the provision of services that are relevant to carers.

We have acknowledged the research that tells us that carers need a break from caring to help them carry on in the longer term. To support that, we introduced the carers grant in 1999 to support councils in providing breaks and services for carers in England. The grant has increased each year and has provided an extra £450 million over the past six years, and in 2005–06 it is worth £185 million. I am glad to say that, in the last local government finance settlement, we confirmed our commitment to continue the carers grant until the end of the 2007–08 financial year.

[Mr. Liam Byrne]

We recognise that a great deal more is still to be done, and I have set out three themes to guide my work this year. First, we need to give everybody a flying start in the world. For carers, that means that we need to find ways to support young carers and parent carers of disabled children more effectively. Secondly, we need to deliver independent living. That means that we need to be able to offer carers more choice about how and when they care. Thirdly, I am determined that we deliver dignity for life. That means that we must stop treating carers as amateurs: they are partners with the social services work force even though they are unpaid. They are also involved in the close family or personal relationships that underpin the caring relationship and, as with any relationship, deserve respect, privacy and freedom from unnecessary intrusion.

Up to now, carer influence on the development of health services has largely been about including them in the decision-making process when determining the services for the person for whom they are caring. However, we need to seek their views on the help that they need in their caring role. Their views should be just as important as the views of patients and staff in helping us to draw up the blueprint for everyday support for people using local health and care services outside hospital. It is vital that councils can engage at a planning level with their partners in health and social care, because that means that at a strategic level social services will have a lever to influence the priorities of their partners in health and other council departments.

My hon. Friend mentioned the good practice in Salford. I was delighted to hear her report of it. It is exactly the sort of thing that we should encourage. This emphasis on cross-authority co-operation was reinforced by the supporting carers theme in round 6 of the beacon council scheme, ensuring that the best councils have the opportunity to share their ideas and showing just how innovative services for carers can be through working across boundaries. We had already recognised that the quality of assessment and services for carers in the NHS are variable. We have taken steps to develop standards and indicators to ensure that the primary care needs of carers are recognised. Where it has been possible, we have promoted the idea of local primary care support for carers.

But we cannot stop there. More needs to be done to support carers who are invaluable but often undervalued. That is why we are exploring other ways in which primary care needs of carers can be improved, focusing specifically on the carer as well as the person being cared for. We have started that job. My hon. Friend mentioned that as part of the general medical services contract we have developed the quality and outcomes framework, which is a voluntary system of financial incentives. It is about rewarding contractors for good practice through participation in an annual quality improvement cycle.

The original version of the QOF guidance and evidence base, which was published with the contract agreement in 2003, has been revised by the NHS Confederation and the British Medical Association. In addition, since the 2004 Act came into force, a number of core and developmental standards relating to carers have been published through the new performance framework for the NHS and social care. A couple of standards are particularly important and worth spelling out.

Core standard 22 states that health care organisations promote, protect and demonstrably improve the health of the community served, and narrow health inequalities by co-operating with each other and with local authorities and other organisations and making appropriate and effective contribution to local partnership arrangements including local strategic partnerships.

Several other standards are pertinent to support for carers. Core standard 13 says that health care organisations must have systems in place to ensure that staff treat patients, their relatives and carers with dignity and respect. Core standard 14 states that health care organisations should have systems in place to ensure that patients, their relatives and carers have suitable information about, and clear access to, procedures to register formal complaints and feedback on the quality of services, are not discriminated against when complaints are made, and are assured that organisations act appropriately on any concerns and, where appropriate, make changes.

Barbara Keeley: On the quality and outcomes framework guidance, in my experience the people working in primary care projects in different parts of the country ran into difficulties with the definition of carer. For instance, in some areas PCTs did not accept that people caring for those with alcohol or drugs problems were carers. Talking of people being heavily committed or at the sharp end of things, young carers are often involved in the care of people with mental health and drugs problems. When these issues are clarified, it is important that everyone accepts a national definition of carer that includes those conditions.

The inclusion of carers in the core standards is key. It is a step change that some PCTs and other authorities have to make in recognising that this is a key constituency and in thinking it through properly. In some ways it is the overall links to PCTs and the big message that needs to be got across, rather than the detail. We are moving to a situation where the detail of everything that is produced includes carers. Provision is still patchy across the country. This constituency is being ignored in some places. Many organisations and people concerned about carers do not know how to get them further up the agenda. It is almost as if we have to do something big to show that we really mean this.

Mr. Byrne: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. Having started the job, we must finish it. There is one opportunity to do that on which I might elicit her support. Having announced at the end of June that we will set out a vision for family health services fit for the 21st century, we are now going into a period of consultation, which will help us to draw up that White Paper. Our desire is to ensure that health care outside hospitals is delivered to high standards and in a way that people want. That must take into account the needs of carers. My hon. Friend's point about the need for a national definition is one that can be usefully considered as part of that consultation. It is especially true for people with long-term conditions who are being cared for in the community, where carers often play important roles.

We have made it clear that we want as many people as possible to contribute to that discussion because our aim is to listen to and learn from the public and people who come across such issues in their daily lives. To undertake that consultation, we are setting up an extensive public engagement programme, which will start in the autumn. It will include national, regional and local events. I will write to the team in the Department that is working on the project to ensure that the points that my hon. Friend made are taken into account when that consultation process is being designed, rather than when it is under way.

I turn quickly to a couple of the other points that my hon. Friend made. She made a point about the systems being used in GP surgeries to track the number of carers. That was considered. We decided that it was hard to specify one direction because of the diversity in systems and practices in GP practices. Most importantly, we are moving from processes to outcomes—a focus on all patients. That must include carers. As my hon. Friend said, they have better outcomes.

I also take my hon. Friend's point about how only three points out of 1,050 in the GMS contracts relate to carers. I stress that carers are individuals in their own right, so other parts of the contract will apply to them in addition to the carer-specific issues. Although the quality and outcomes framework cannot be altered locally, it is worth stressing that PCTs can commission extra services from any or all of the GP practices if they choose. Those services are called locally enhanced services. They are negotiated locally and funded from the PCT's main allocation. They are outside national negotiations and agreements, and the only prescription is that they are additional services. That is possibly another area for us to explore.

My hon. Friend also made the point about setting a date for a campaign to raise awareness among GPs about carers needs. Although I cannot commit to that specifically, I shall write to the Department of Health team working on the White Paper consultation. I may also write to the carers organisations with which I work in my portfolio to alert them to the debate and to flag up the point that, as the White Paper consultation gets under way, they may need to think about these issues.

My hon. Friend mentioned a useful point about expert patients. I have met some of them, and their stories are extraordinarily powerful. We must consider how such programmes can be introduced more widely.

I should underline the importance of the White Paper consultation. It is vital that the consultation is broad, and that experts such as my hon. Friend have the chance to input into it. I am reminded of the time when the mother of a very disabled man in his 20s spoke at an event that I was speaking at in Birmingham. She pointed out that carers consultation events often start at 10 am, finish at 4 pm, and have no facility for the cared-for person to attend, no paid expenses, no close parking and no messaging service. That will not be helpful if we are genuinely to take into account the views of carers. I am determined that we shall not make that mistake with the White Paper consultation.

Barbara Keeley: I should value a note about that matter, and I am sure that the carers organisations will be happy to help. Sometimes carers want to get away from the cared-for person for the day. Sometimes it suits people to come with the cared-for person. Sometimes people find it easier to talk about their situation if the cared-for person is not present, and it is then a question of respite care, and of help with it.

Mr. Byrne: My hon. Friend underlines the need to get the White Paper consultation right. I hope that she will get involved in the consultation in September, and that she will encourage others, particularly carers, to do so as well.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Two o'clock.

Asylum Seekers (Zimbabwe)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Joan Ryan.]

9.30 am

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of asylum seekers and Zimbabwe, which has been much discussed in recent weeks. It is a pleasure to see the Minister. I am sure that I speak on behalf of all my colleagues who have contacted his office in the past few weeks when I tell him how grateful we are to the staff there for their courtesy and speedy responses, which really make a difference. The responses may not always be what we would wish for, but that is not their responsibility. The work of the Minister and his team is appreciated.

The situation in Zimbabwe is well known in the Chamber and outside: it remains desperate. I know that a number of colleagues want to speak about Zimbabwe, especially about the Home Office decision to continue to return to that country those whose asylum claims are not successful, and I shall allow them to do so in the next 90 minutes.

I begin by putting in a nutshell the British position as far as the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is concerned. I received a letter from Bemma Donkoh, who is the representative to the UK, reminding me of the UN's current position. In it, she says:

"Under the current circumstances UNHCR's recommendation for States to suspend all removals to Zimbabwe (initially made by UNHCR in March 2002) remains current and valid. I would like to note that on 7 July 2005 the EU Parliament passed a Resolution advising EU member states against the return of failed asylum seekers to Zimbabwe."

It is interesting that she comments on the first UNHCR decision in March 2002, because that was rather similar to the decision made here to impose a moratorium on the return of asylum seekers to Zimbabwe. I wish to relate the decision to impose a moratorium, and the November 2004 decision to lift the moratorium, to current circumstances.

Rather surprisingly, the Home Secretary did not respond to the growing pressure from the press, interested parties and the world in general to reimpose the moratorium. In a statement, he gave a variety of reasons for not doing so, one of which was:

"The blanket suspension of all removals to any country can only encourage those who seek to get around our controls for reasons nothing whatsoever to do with their political activity or fear of persecution."—[Official Report, 27 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 1023.]

He did not claim that the situation in Zimbabwe had improved markedly since the moratorium was imposed in 2002, as that would have been patently ridiculous, so he sought to justify the decision to continue to return those whose asylum claims were not successful on the basis that the suspension had been misused and the process abused. I challenge that assertion.

Rather than announce to the House the lifting of the moratorium, the then Minister for Citizenship and Immigration, who is now the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, released a written statement, in which he said:

"It is clear that the absence of enforced returns increasingly acts as a 'pull factor' for Zimbabweans, and for others posing as Zimbabweans, who do not need international protection but nonetheless make asylum claims confident that even when unsuccessful they will not be forcibly removed. This is a misuse of the asylum system."—[Official Report, 16 November 2004; Vol. 426, c. 79WS.]

The two main grounds on which the Home Office relied in lifting the moratorium and keeping it lifted were its pull factor and the fact that the system was being misused. Let us therefore examine those grounds.

One might expect the pull factor to become evident first in a substantial rise in the number of Zimbabweans claiming asylum during the moratorium. That would be the obvious point to make but, strangely, on 27 June, the Home Secretary did not give the House the figures for the number of people applying for asylum during that period. Now, that might have been carelessness—he might not have picked them up when he left the office—but I doubt very much whether his officials would not have given them to him. It seems blindingly obvious that someone would take such figures with them when making such a statement, but the Home Secretary did not have them with him.

I, however, managed to get the figures for the number of people applying for asylum, because I was given them by the Zimbabwe Association, and they have been reproduced in the excellent Library pack for this debate. I subsequently asked the Home Secretary in a written question whether he would confirm the figures that I had, but his answer simply referred me to the Library. Although it took me only five seconds to find the figures, it would have been more helpful all round if the answer had simply included them. It would have been nice to see them in a written answer, but not including them presumably spared someone the embarrassment of having them in Hansard. Let me, however, repeat them.

In 2002—the year the moratorium was imposed—7,655 people from Zimbabwe applied for asylum. In 2003, the figure had become 3,295 and in 2004, it had become 2,050. At first glance, one might say, "Some pull factor!", because the number of people applying for asylum during that period actually fell. Those figures were confirmed by the asylum statistics in the Home Office statistical bulletin, which was published at the end of November 2004.

When the Home Secretary was challenged on the figures, he said that he would write to my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), and he subsequently did so. In his letter, he makes no mention at all of the number of people applying for asylum; instead, he deals with the percentages of claims and how successful they are. In doing so, he indicates that the number of claims accepted at the initial stage and the number of successful appeals had dropped. He says that it is "notable that during the time that the enforced removal of failed asylum seekers to Zimbabwe was suspended, the percentage of Zimbabwean asylum applications that were rejected at the initial decision stage increased from 62 per cent. in 2002, 78 per cent. in 2003, to 89 per cent. in the first nine months of 2004."

[Alistair Burt]

The statistics published by the Home Office are not much out of line with those for other asylum seekers at that time. Page 4 of Home Office statistical bulletin says that the statistics show:

"The proportion of initial decisions granting asylum fell in 2003 to 6 per cent. from 10 per cent. in 2002 . . . Correspondingly, overall it is estimated that 28 per cent. of applications in 2003 resulted in grants of asylum . . . This compared with 40 per cent. of applications in 2002".

Across the board, therefore, it appears that the number of applications and the success rate for Zimbabwean asylum seekers were not much different from, and not out of line with, those of other asylum seekers.

Again, let us remember the numbers with which we are dealing. By 2004, we were dealing with just over 2,000 asylum applications from Zimbabweans, out of a total of 80,000. The country is hardly being overrun by Zimbabweans looking for protection.

Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): Given the acknowledged growing political and economic pressure on people in Zimbabwe, does not the hon. Gentleman think it remarkable that the effects of that pressure are not being felt vis-à-vis the seeking of asylum in this country, and that the numbers are relatively small and appear to have dropped substantially in recent years?

Alistair Burt: That is quite extraordinary, but people find other ways to leave countries in these situations. They are certainly encouraged to do so by the decision taken by this country in 2002 to impose a visa requirement, and those leaving Zimbabwe now have to apply for visas to do so. It is hardly credible that someone seeking political asylum will turn up at the high commission in Harare and claim that that is why they want a visa to leave Zimbabwe. It is one way of encouraging the flow to reduce.

As statistics on the number of people being granted asylum on the first decision show a drop across the piece, perhaps the situation has something to do with the Government's targets. We know that, if the Home Office wants things to happen, occasionally the statistics turn out to prove its case. We are not always certain why, but unfortunately there is enough evidence of concealment in the operation of the Home Office in recent years. I shall not go back over the removals target that led to the building of Yarl's Wood in the first place and how that target was ridiculously optimistic even to officials in the Department, or over the problem of the Czech Romany Gypsies whose visas were prevented from being granted by order from the Home Office, but it seems remarkable that at a time when the Government wanted to appear tough on asylum decisions, the figures for those being granted asylum in the first instance fell: That is not my central point, however. It is that the figures for Zimbabwe seem more or less in line with others.

Accordingly, let us compare the situation when the moratorium was imposed with the situation in November 2004, when the decision was taken to lift it. What has changed? The situation in Zimbabwe is palpably no better and arguably much worse. The number of people applying for asylum has fallen substantially and the number of decisions being taken about whether, in the first instance, they are good asylum cases shows very little difference from the numbers across the piece. Why, then, was the moratorium lifted? What on earth are the reasons that encourage the Minister and the Home Secretary to persist with the current policy in the face of international opinion, opinion in this country and the opinion of the UNHCR?

If we go on from 27 June and consider the events of the following couple of weeks, we find a couple of interesting things. The first is the case of the mystery memo. On 14 July, a deportation case was, according to the press, thrown into confusion by a Home Office official who said that asylum removals had been stopped. Brought in as evidence—I have a copy of this in case the Minister has not seen it—was a memo from the Croydon enforcement unit dated 24 June. I shall return to the date in a moment. The memo says—I am interpreting the abbreviations used—that removal directions for 26 June and escorts are deferred and that the Croydon enforcement unit

"have notified us all Zimbabwean RD's need to be deferred until further notice."

As I said, that memo was dated 24 June. The Home Secretary's statement of 27 June, which stated the policy as we knew it to be and reasserted the policy of no suspension of removals to Zimbabwe, did not mention the memo. So what is this memo? Was it known to the Home Secretary on 27 June? I doubt that very much. Deliberate concealment of such a memo does not strike me as in any way credible, but who issued the memo, and why? What was its status and what is its status? The problem of the date is that it appeared to chime with a rumour that removals would not be encouraged during the G8 summit, because the world's press seeing an emaciated hunger striker in handcuffs being stretchered to an aeroplane to be returned to Zimbabwe was hardly likely to encourage the reputation that the Government seek. However, the Home Office subsequently said that the memo had no effect. I have never received a clear statement from a Minister on its status and what it means. If the Minister does not have a copy to hand, I am more than happy to pass one to him. I also have copies for his officials. Has the memo been countermanded? How was it issued? What on earth did it refer to?

There are real people behind all the political argument, the rhetoric and the discussions in newspapers and around the world. My constituency case involves detainees who happen to be women, because my constituency contains the detention centre at Yarl's Wood, where some of the detainees are women. The hon. Member for Bedford (Patrick Hall) and I have visited them. Their stories are sad and, I suspect, no different from those of many others seeking asylum in this country, about whom the Government must take hard decisions.

I restate that the Opposition understand, as we would, that tough decisions must be taken. We appreciate that in order to conduct an effective asylum policy, some people might be forced to return to countries to which they do not want to return. However, such policy has currency and effect only if it is based on justice and decency. That is patently no longer the case in relation to Zimbabwe, which is why the policy should be suspended and why the things that happen to detainees have a particular poignancy, bearing in mind the country to which they are being returned.

The number of detainees is falling. I understand, again from the debate pack prepared for us, that 134 were in detention on 7 June. That number had fallen to 105 on 5 July, and I believe, although the Minister might correct me, that about 60 people are currently detained. That reflects the fact that some detainees have been released on temporary admission, but that more have been released on bail. In other words, the courts are taking the view that it is not particularly wise at the moment to detain people with no prospect of their removal. I am delighted that the courts are taking that view, but it does throw their decision into sharp relief against the authorities' decision to remove people and place them in detention.

Most women who I come across in Yarl's Wood have not committed offences in this country or failed to comply with any regulations relating to their status, and most have reported regularly under any restrictions placed on them. What happened to them was that one day, when they went to sign on and report, they were lifted by the security services, dispatched to a detention centre, and sometimes given very early decisions on their removal. In some cases, they were not allowed to return home, to collect clothes, or even to speak to friends. That cannot be acceptable for people who have committed no offence and who have been living entirely in accordance with the rules set out by the country to which they have come.

I make a couple of pleas on behalf of those women. First, I remind the Minister of the concerns that have been expressed about the escort services, which take detainees from the place of their detention to their point of departure. Many detainees do not want to go, so it is a difficult job for the escort services to do. Allegations of mistreatment are not uncommon. There is nothing to protect one side or the other.

The Home Office has ordered closed circuit television to be introduced in the vehicles that take people to points of departure, but not all the detainees are taken in such vehicles. In the case of Yarl's Wood, many people are transported in private cars. There is usually one detainee—one woman—to three guards. There is no CCTV. If allegations of mistreatment are made, there is no independent observation of what might have happened.

Following an incident at Yarl's Wood that was reported to me, I asked the Minister:

"if he will ensure that no asylum detainee is transported to a port of departure pursuant to a deportation order in a vehicle without CCTV, or the offer of escort by an independent observer".—[Official Report, 4 July 2005; Vol. 436, c. 1[illegible]W.]

That was coupled with another question, which he answered. He did not, however, answer my first, so I asked him again.

My second plea is to draw attention to the small acts of carelessness that affect the lives of these detainees who, as I said, might have been living absolutely normal lives in this country for several years before being put behind bars. Sometimes they are moved around the detention estate with little or no explanation, and such movement may disrupt bail hearings and relationships with lawyers, friends and supporters.

I had a case of a woman who was moved from Yarl's Wood to Colnbrook in London for a week, then up to Scotland on the Sunday. As a result, she could not attend her bail hearing, which was scheduled for the following day in Birmingham. I investigated the situation, the Home Office apologised and said that a mistake had been made, and the bail hearing was reinstated for a few days later. Unfortunately, refugee organisations tell me that such instances are not rare. They happen all too frequently to be put down to an administrative mistake.

I shall not repeat to the Minister the embarrassing conversation that I had with an immigration service official one evening when I was investigating movements around the detention estate. When I asked why a woman was being moved, the reply was, "Reasons? We don't need to give reasons." That betrays an unacceptable attitude to detainees. The carelessness of the way in which they are treated is wrong. Accordingly, will the Minister do everything in his power to ensure that such attitudes are corrected and people are treated properly? Even if tough decisions have to be made, a degree of respect is necessary for those who, having committed no crime, are under lock and key in our country. We have allowed that situation to continue.

Patrick Hall: Although the majority of the women at Yarl's Wood whom we met recently said that they had been there or elsewhere on the estate for about four weeks, we came across people who had been detained for between four and eight months. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be in everyone's interest to detain people for much shorter periods?

Alistair Burt: I agree. The hon. Gentleman has that right. Arrangements cannot always be made to dispatch people within a few days—that was what Yarl's Wood was first set up for—but one has to wonder why they are held in detention for a month or longer. I do not understand why they are not allowed to continue their normal business. Perhaps the cases of some of the people who have been in detention for a long time could be reviewed by the Minister. I would be grateful if he would comment on that.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be a good idea for the Minister to indicate whether we might have joined-up government on this subject, and whether we might have a Home Office and a Foreign Office Minister attend future debates so that MPs who are rightly concerned about the situation of Zimbabweans in Zimbabwe and in Britain can question both parts of the Government? We cannot have a clean look at the issue by pretending that it is just a Home Office matter or by talking only about the pressures that the Government are trying to put on Zimbabwe to get it back on to a better course.

Alistair Burt: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. It is perfectly plain that the relationship between the Foreign Office and the Home Office must be close. There must have been discussions between the two Departments. Indeed, there have been rumours in the press that the Home Office and the Foreign Office are not as one in respect of the decision to return people to Zimbabwe. It would be interesting to have both Ministers available for questions at the same time.

[Alistair Burt]

Mr. Bayley, you have been generous in allowing the situation in Zimbabwe to be included in the terms of the debate. It is a fundamental aspect of the decision of the Home Office not to reimpose the moratorium. I hope that the Minister will take note of what my hon. Friend said, and perhaps a joined-up debate might be possible.

John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the importance of what my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Peter Bottomley) said is underlined not least by the statement in June by the Home Secretary and by his speech on Second Reading of the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill last week? In that speech, he vaguely referred to procedures for monitoring as best as one could the safety of those who are returned to Zimbabwe and other countries with similar problems, but his statement was studious in its ambiguity and lack of specificity.

Alistair Burt: I absolutely agree. My hon. Friend makes a valid point. Colleagues will refer to the situation in Zimbabwe and the inadequacy of the monitoring procedure. The issue is the balance of risk. In a sense, that is at the heart of this debate. Where is the risk in the situation, and who bears it?

The number of people who apply for asylum from Zimbabwe—or who have escaped to other countries—particularly Malawi—in order to come here to apply for asylum is not terribly high. The risk that the Minister and the Home Office accept in reapplying the moratorium is that the pull factor might be reintroduced. Our argument is that the pull factor is low and it is better for the Government to bear that risk than to return people to Zimbabwe. The risk of damage to those people in Zimbabwe is substantially greater than the risk currently carried by the Government. The absence of an effective monitoring system—not through any lack of will, but purely through the circumstances pertaining in Zimbabwe—makes the risk to individuals rather greater than the risk faced by the Government.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I am pleased that my hon. Friend secured this debate. Does he agree that the mark of a civilised society is an adequately functioning asylum policy and that, all in all, we certainly do not have one at the moment? That is illustrated by a case, of which he is aware, of my constituent, Miss Tande, who has just been instructed that she must make immediate arrangements to leave, even though what I consider to be almost overwhelming evidence has been put forward to demonstrate that she will be at risk if she returns. A former senior assistant commissioner with the Zimbabwean police has said:

"it will be self-deceiving to believe that it is safe for you to return."

Alistair Burt: My hon. Friend is right to raise that case. As he would suspect, and as many of us here know, it could be replicated a number of times. I know that other colleagues will wish to draw attention to it. The security of our asylum policy depends on both us and the outside world seeing it as just and decent. The problem is that it is being undermined because of the situation in Zimbabwe and the Government's decision. For the asylum policy to be re-established in all our minds as safe and secure, an urgent reappraisal of Zimbabwe is necessary.

To bring things up to date, as the House will know, a decision was made last Thursday by the Home Office that, pending the resumption of the judicial review hearing by Mr. Justice Collins on 4 August, there will be no further removals to Zimbabwe. Although I am grateful for what is obviously a common-sense decision, which would, in any case, have been enforced by the courts—I cannot see any judicial review of the case of any asylum seeker who is due for removal failing before 4 August—I think that the move is a grudging one. It is also wrong. It is not for the courts to make a decision about whether it is safe for the Home Office to return people to Zimbabwe; it is for the Home Office, the Foreign Office and the Government to make that decision. It cannot be right for the Government to hide their embarrassment behind the skirts of a judge's cloak before taking decisions on returning people, bound, in every sense of that word, to Harare.

I ask the Minister to say that he need not wait for the decision on 4 August and that he is going to reimpose the moratorium and stop people being returned to Zimbabwe for the period of time that it takes for that country to return to normal. Then, those people we have been visiting, who we know want to return to Zimbabwe, will have the chance to do so. They will be safe. The Government's asylum policy will be safe and perhaps the country's reputation for justice and decency will have been restored after the knock it has taken over the past few weeks.

Several hon. Members rose—

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): Order. It may be helpful to colleagues if I say that I intend to start the winding-up speeches at 10.30 am. There are six Members seeking to catch my eye. If they were all to speak for an equal time, that would give them five minutes each.

9.59 am

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) on securing this Adjournment debate and also on the fantastic speech that he made on the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill. It was one of the best speeches that I have heard in the House of Commons.

I want to carry on from where the hon. Gentleman has left off and first of all challenge the lifting of the moratorium last December. The Foreign Office annual report on human rights, which came out in November 2004, says that the human rights situation in Zimbabwe remains in crisis. There are ongoing violations of human rights, including the stifling of opposition, police abuse, torture and absence of freedom.

That report came out a month before the moratorium was lifted. It seems to me that the only reason it was lifted is not the situation in Zimbabwe but the Home Office deciding that it needed to get its statistics down. The Zimbabweans have, on the whole, reported diligently when asked to. Some have been reporting weekly—sometimes daily—for more than two years. It seems that they were the easiest group to pick off. I hope that the Minister will assure me that that is not the case.

What other justification can there be for sending people back to a country that is now in a much worse state than it was even last November when the report stated how bad it was?

I do not want to repeat all the things that I said in my Adjournment debate in the House following my visit to Zimbabwe, but I will say that it is clearly a much more sinister country than it was even last year. It is a country in which people are fearful about everything. Every aspect of their daily lives is monitored. There are security officers everywhere.

It is ridiculous to think that we can send people back to Harare on a plane from London and that the Central Intelligence Organisation will not be there waiting to receive not only the deportee but, usually, the Home Office officials who were sent to escort them. The first thing that happens is that the person is detained and questioned. We have evidence of that. The Minister and the Home Secretary talked about needing evidence of people being treated badly after being sent back. I challenge the Minister on how he expects that evidence to be provided.

The Home Secretary, perhaps intending to talk about all countries, talked about non-governmental organisations being the eyes and ears of the Government. What a shocking thing to say about Zimbabwe. The NGOs are under huge attack. They are terrified that they will be kicked out, and the idea that they are going to go round finding out what is happening to individual detainees who have been deported and then report back to the British high commission is nonsensical.

It is nonsense to think that an asylum seeker who has been sent back, beaten up, tortured and perhaps left to die—as some have been—will get up, dust themselves down and trot off to the British high commission to say, "Oh, British high commissioner, I've been badly treated and you sent me back." I do not believe that the intelligent officials in the Home Office believe that that will happen. We must put a stop to the deportations.

I have never been a great fan of lawyers, but, after the last three or four weeks, I must say, "Thank goodness for lawyers in this country". I will not use the word "brave", but we have had some forthright lawyers who have tackled the issue head on. Yes, politicians who make representations about particular Zimbabweans get listened to. We occasionally manage to stop someone being deported, but in the end it is the courts that have stopped it happening and forced the Home Office to stop deportations until 4 August.

I tell the Minister that, even if something goes wrong in the court case on 4 August and a permanent stop is not put on deportations, every single asylum seeker who is to be deported to Zimbabwe will be fought over tooth and nail in the courts. How much has been spent in the last month on the ridiculous attempts by the Home Office to send their senior officials to court to try to force people to be sent back to Zimbabwe, when they must have known that there was evidence that would stop those deportations?

John Bercow: I strongly agree with what the hon. Lady is saying. Does she agree that even if the NGOs in Zimbabwe were not terrified and could gather and transmit information, it would not be their responsibility to do so? Is it not the responsibility of Governments who remove people to ensure that they are safe where they have been removed to? It is a classic case of buck-passing.

Kate Hoey: I absolutely agree with the hon. Gentleman. Of course, he visited Zimbabwe the year before last and knows quite a lot about what is going on. I remind hon. Members that the Prime Minister last week talked about "the abhorrence" that we feel for what is happening in Zimbabwe. Who is speaking for the Government? Which part of Government is making the policy? The Prime Minister clearly feels that the situation is abhorrent, and yet somehow people continue to be sent back.

I want to raise the case of Naison Sani, who is being deported to Malawi tonight. He is a Zimbabwean, and that is another complicated issue. The Home Office refuses to listen. Many people, including Crispen Kulinji, did not travel here on a Zimbabwean passport. The only way in which this young man, Naison Sani, could get out of the country was on a Malawian passport. He is being deported tonight and has not had proper legal advice. The Minister will get a legal representation later today, and I ask him now to stop that deportation and to look separately at the question of people travelling on Malawian passports. They are Zimbabwean—the Home Office knows that. In cases such as that of Crispen Kulinji, the Home Office knows that they have been tortured; it still sends them back to Malawi.

I want to raise how we treat people in detention. I have visited Harmondsworth twice in the past three weeks. The second time was on 7 July, late in the afternoon, when I went to see two of the asylum seekers who had been on hunger strike for some time, Timbha Mqhubeli and Harris Nyatsanza. Both were in the medical wing and in a weak condition, particularly Timbha, who had been on hunger strike for nearly a month. He was very weak indeed. I said to the person in charge, "Why has he not been taken to hospital?" They said, "Oh, well, our doctor comes in every now and again"—I think that that was the phrase he used—"and at some stage he will say he should be taken to hospital."

We went back that night and got permission from the two of them to say that they wanted to see an independent doctor. Frank Arnold went in the next morning, saw them and immediately said that they should both be in hospital. The immigration department still refused to send them, and they had to go to court to get a ruling. That afternoon, at the last minute, while they were in court—presumably while the Home Office was still paying huge costs—the department agreed that Timbha could go to hospital that evening. Harris's case had to go back to court the next morning, and in the meantime the Home Office agreed that he, too, could go to hospital.

Timbha was sent across London in an ambulance, handcuffed the whole time, with three people guarding him. He arrived at the hospital, where, one of his Zimbabwean friends called to tell me, he continued to be handcuffed in bed. I phoned the detention centre at Harmondsworth and the man who answered said that they would look again at the security advice. He rang me back 10 minutes later and said, "We have looked at the security advice; we can take the handcuffs off and remove one of the wardens." Two wardens remained.

[Kate Hoey]

The next morning the two wardens said that they had been told to sit at the foot of the bed and watch everything that that young man did. He could not do anything anyway—the idea that he was going to abscond! The doctor is making a formal report, because the detention centre manager had insisted that the patient be handcuffed in the ambulance and stay so after the delivery to hospital. That is despite the fact that the detention centre rules state:

"The purpose of handcuffing detainees is to reduce the risk of . . . absconding", as well as a list of other things. They also state that handcuffs should not be used

"On detainees attending for medical treatment if the detainee's medical condition renders handcuffs inappropriate"

and

"When a doctor so recommends on health grounds."

A doctor had done so, and when he contacted the centre manager he was told that it was because the recommendation had not been made by the centre doctor. However, the first doctor had tried to get hold of the centre doctor.

I know that I have gone into detail on one particular case, but my experience in dealing with these cases over the past three or four weeks has shown the shocking state of what is going on in detention centres. I urge whoever chairs the Home Affairs Committee—I cannot remember who it is—to suggest an inquiry into detention centres. These are huge issues that affect all asylum seekers, not just those from Zimbabwe.

John Bercow: I think the hon. Lady has in mind the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham).

Kate Hoey: Yes, all of us who have been involved in this matter will be writing to my right hon. Friend. Terrible things are going on in our detention centres. Zimbabwe is a special case; we have a particular responsibility for what is happening there and we have not done nearly enough.

Last week, New Zealand announced that all Zimbabweans who had managed to get to New Zealand would be allowed to stay. We are a much bigger country than New Zealand in terms of our economic power; if they can do it why cannot we? Every Zimbabwean I have met has been well educated and is capable of working and contributing to our economy—Timbha and Harris were teachers. They all want to go back to Zimbabwe but, because of the situation there and because they have been in detention here and the British Government are sending them back, they all risk being "lifted" when they arrive, whatever the Home Office says. If the Home Office says that it wants evidence of that, it means that it wants to see a dead body. I find that shocking, and I hope that this debate will highlight what is happening in Zimbabwe.

I plead with the Minister not simply to go along with the officials and the statistics, but to stand up, ask that the moratorium be reinstated and treat these people with the dignity and decency that they deserve.

10.11 am

Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): I will do my best to cut what I have to say so that I keep as near to five minutes as is possible, which will be difficult.

I congratulate my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), on securing the debate and on the measured way in which he presented his case. I visited Yarl's Wood twice recently on 8 and 15 July to meet the Zimbabwean female detainees who were due for removal, some of whom were on hunger strike. I met 16 women and formed a definite view that some of them were very politically aware. They were able to answer our questions from all sorts of angles and could only have come to that position, and developed that political awareness, by being politically active. Their fears of reprisals on return to Zimbabwe seemed to be reasonable.

There is no doubt that conditions in Zimbabwe are appalling and deteriorating. There is a rapidly growing danger for anyone who is, or is suspected of being, a critic of the regime and its leader. I have information from Zimbabweans living in Zimbabwe now who recently visited Britain for family reasons and whom I have met through mutual friends. These Zimbabweans are white, middle-class professionals who have never been politically active in Zimbabwe and are not members of any political party. For obvious reasons, I will not identify them, but I thank them for allowing me to refer to their views. I should like to have cited some of their experiences of day-to-day life, but I will not have time to do so.

In a nutshell, those people described a situation in which hundreds of thousands of people in Zimbabwe are at risk—that includes anyone speaking out against the regime, members of trade unions, members of NGOs, political opposition party members, of course, and groups concerned about the mass starvation, mass unemployment, house clearances and farm invasions. The risk is of death threats, of physical intimidation, including murder, of poisoning and harassment of all kinds. Telephone and e-mail tapping is the norm. People are followed by agents and others and subjected to repeat prosecutions for minor and bogus offences, such as blocking the pavement. They are held at road blocks and police stations by the police, the army, war veterans or ZANU-PF youth militia. The people I met cited examples of day-to-day harassment, which perhaps I shall be able to explain to the House on another occasion.

My friends—I do call them that—are clear about the risks that returned failed asylum seekers face. Whether or not those individuals were political activists, the very fact of them having sought asylum from the regime is seen as bad enough in the eyes of that regime; having sought asylum in Britain, of all places, is even worse. Anyone seeking asylum from Zimbabwe in white colonial Britain will be judged a traitor and deemed guilty, so the enforced returnees are regarded as political enemies by ZANU-PF. Of that my contacts have no doubt.

My contacts believe that returned detainees are routinely targeted. If they return to Harare on their own they are targeted at the airport by the Central Intelligence Organisation and are likely to be tortured, beaten up, held and dumped somewhere miles away, perhaps some days later. If they are met by large numbers of family and friends they will be targeted later, unless they go into hiding. Their families will be punished, especially if they live in rural areas where control by chiefs is strong.

Actions against them can result in losing the ability to buy food from the grain marketing board or losing access to the politically motivated food distribution system that operates in Zimbabwe. Children can be excluded from school as a punishment and Government employees can lose their jobs, be demoted or moved far from their homes at great personal inconvenience.

Of course, among asylum seekers from anywhere—including Zimbabwe—a proportion will be economic, rather than truly political in their motivation. However, surely the question before us is whether, whatever a person's reason for coming to the United Kingdom, it can, in all reason, be judged safe for any failed asylum seeker to be returned. The situation in Zimbabwe is well understood, and I do not understand how the return of failed asylum seekers to Zimbabwe, which is current Government policy, squares with what they themselves acknowledge. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary recently spoke in a statement about understanding the nature of the Mugabe regime, the abuses of human rights, the political persecution, and the denial of basic freedoms across the board, yet the Government still insist that it is safe to return failed asylum seekers to Zimbabwe.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to think again. In his statement to the House on 27 June, the Home Secretary said, among other things, that there were "no substantiated reports of mistreatment on return", that the Government would keep

"in close contact with civil society and opposition parties in Zimbabwe"—[Official Report, 27 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 1023.], and that a detailed review of the situation in Zimbabwe is taking place in the Government here.

On the first point, I agree that it is very difficult to obtain such evidence. Yesterday I spoke on the telephone to a Zimbabwean Member of Parliament who told me that no information is made available in Zimbabwe about failed asylum seekers being returned from the UK. Therefore, what happens to them cannot be measured. It is not reported.

However, the CIO has several offices at the airport in Harare. That organisation in the rest of the country takes part in and incites beatings and torture, and the dumping of people out in the bush. That is how it behaves. If it has officers at the airport, what must we think they are doing there? They threaten families and make people think carefully about complaining about what is done to them. Those people are more likely to go into hiding and keep quiet.

As a result of the way in which the regime operates, the definitive proof of ill treatment that the Government seek is unlikely to be obtained. However, I contend that on the balance of probabilities, returnees are highly likely to be at risk. Where does my hon. Friend think that the balance of probabilities lies? Where is his evidence that it is safe to return anyone to Zimbabwe?

As to the Home Secretary's other two points, what picture is the Minister receiving from people on the ground in Zimbabwe? Given the grave urgency of the situation there and the situation facing people in detention here, when will the detailed review referred to by the Home Secretary be completed? The parliamentary recess begins this week. When will the House have the opportunity to debate the outcome of the review and its consequences? Zimbabwe is on the brink of utter disaster. I urge the British Government to do the right thing and cease enforced removal to Zimbabwe until further notice.

10.20 am

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) on securing the debate. It is invidious to pick out individuals, but I congratulate the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) not only on keeping the subject at the top of the agenda but on speaking so powerfully about it. We have to be aware that Home Office Ministers have been under almost unprecedented pressure, and that must filter down to their officials. Perhaps the toughness of life in the Home Office over the past few weeks explains the inability to adjust to the emerging facts. As hon. Members said, it is not easy to run an asylum system in which there must be a balance between controlling economic migrants and people's desires to better their lives with the popular wish within this country for strict controls and asylum being given strictly to those most in need. It is not easy.

However, it is not denied that children are being deliberately bulldozed to death in Zimbabwe as a matter of Government policy. The Prime Minister recognises that the situation is abhorrent, and at the end of June the Home Secretary said:

"There is no doubt that political persecution, abuses of human rights and denial of basic freedom persist in Zimbabwe".—[Official Report, 27 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 1024.]

He then went on to say that we are going to carry on sending people back there. It is not possible to align those statements and come to a conclusion.

On the train this morning, a senior business man said to me, "What is going to happen? Surely nobody is suggesting that we should send people back to Zimbabwe. Not now, as things are deteriorating all the time." I said that yes, that is the case, and a Minister will, under a lot of pressure, tell us why it is acceptable to send people back to a blood-stained tyrant such as Mugabe, in the full flood of his abuse of power. That is the invidious job that someone will have this morning.

It is all about the balance of risk. That is why I asked the Home Secretary to reverse the evidential test. That test should not be for people to show that they are coming to harm, but for the Government to show that people will not come to harm. That is the nub of what we are discussing today, about which hon. Members from all parties feel so passionately. We hope that there will be a change of heart, if not in today's debate, then as part of the process by which the Government recognise the situation and change their tack.

I should like to raise the case of Ashleigh McMaster, the daughter of a constituent of mine. Gary McMaster's farm in Zimbabwe was confiscated and he was branded an enemy of the state. His daughter applied to university and was told that she would have to join the National Youth Service before she would be allowed to go. The level of abuse within that service, including allegations of rape and other atrocities, is well known so, understandably, she did not wish to go into it. Mr. McMaster flew to Zimbabwe to try to get his daughter out, and was forced to use bribes to obtain a passport to get her into this country. That was two years ago. She is now 19, and is a bright young woman, but is in a highly nervous state. Her first application to remain was turned down, so she went to the adjudicator, who said:

"I have concluded from the objective evidence that there is a real risk, irrespective of whether the Appellant applies for further education, of the Appellant being forcibly recruited into the National Youth Service and thereby of course subjected to gross cruelty, rape and beatings".

That was the adjudicator's decision, which was then overturned on appeal by the Home Office. Gary and his daughter will be coming to Parliament later today, and I am grateful to the Minister, who has agreed to speak to me, when we can grab a moment, to discuss her case.

The recent death of the former Prime Minister, Edward Heath, raises an interesting reminder of one of the most distinguished acts of his political career. When the Ugandan Asians were being afflicted by Idi Amin, he took the politically unpalatable and difficult decision to admit them here, as was right and proper to do in the proud traditions of this country. Those traditions will be best served by the Government and the Minister having a change of heart, and refusing to allow anyone to be returned to Zimbabwe at the moment.

10.25 am

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I start by congratulating the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) on his clear and reasoned statement describing both the current situation and a possible way forward.

Back in January 2002, deportation was suspended owing to unrest in Zimbabwe. I say to the Government that I am really haunted by the unanswered question of what difference between the situation then and in November last year could possibly justify the recommencement of returns. That is just as true of the period since November. Surely no one could describe the situation in Zimbabwe as having improved.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) on raising these issues in such a timely way. Her points were well argued and related to the situation of the people, as well as the mechanisms that are failing so badly. In an Adjournment debate on 27 June, she gave a harrowing description of her recent visit: the destruction of homes, businesses and the economy, the continued abuse of power and the escalation of brutal activities. That is the background to today's debate.

I shall refer to a particular case, while making some general points. The case is that of Tendai Williard Chinhanhu, whom I shall refer to as Williard. Until last week, he was in Harmondsworth detention centre, where he had been since February 2004—a considerable time to be held somewhere when no crime has been committed.

I see two strands to Williard's case. I find it difficult to understand why he was not granted asylum seeker status in the first place. When I read the statement made by the Home Secretary in the House, I found it quite reassuring:

"In particular, members of the opposition in Zimbabwe or others who establish that they have engaged in activities that will cause them to be persecuted by the Zimbabwean Government will continue to be granted asylum."—[Official Report, 27 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 1023.]

Why were some of these people not granted asylum? Did they have adequate legal representation?

We then come to deportation. The hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire demolished the pull factor argument that everyone would come flooding in if we had a blanket suspension of all removals. We must not get distracted by that type of argument.

To return to the case of Williard, interestingly, he is a runner and might have become an Olympic champion in other circumstances. He met members of the Movement for Democratic Change when he was running in other countries, such as Holland and Germany. He agreed actively to oppose Mugabe and began organising help to evacuate families from farms around Harare. He explains:

"Mugabe's men would come and destroy these farms and they would be carrying guns, while we were only armed with sticks and bows and arrows . . . I saw some families killed, men and women, some of them had even been decapitated . . . They destroyed my house, burning everything and harassed my lodger. I went to the police but they refused to do anything".

Williard went to his father's house—his father was eventually killed—and then he fled to London. He has spent some time in my constituency while in the country, and was an active and supportive member of Poole Runners until his detention. In one of his statements, he says:

"All I know is I cannot go back because I will not be safe. They will be waiting for me at the airport and I will disappear."

I cannot express the situation any better than that, which is why I am using this individual case.

At the time of the election we all became aware of the heightened sensitivity surrounding asylum and immigration. The negative campaigning had an impact. I come from an area where there are relatively few asylum seekers, but it was a huge issue on the doorstep, perhaps because people did not have day-to-day meetings with asylum seekers. I was proud to stand on the doorstep and say that this country has a wonderful reputation for taking in persecuted people and looking after them. It is a proud tradition that we should continue and pass on to young people, and, yes, we should also sort out all the administrative problems facing the Government.

Not surprisingly, I have received a lot of representations about this very popular runner, several from young people. I want to convey an idea of the effect that the Government's action is having on the attitudes and beliefs of the next generation. A 15-year-old told me that until now he did not believe that in a modern country people could be sent to their death bed. Another writes:

"I am writing to you because of Williard Chinhanhu and I am in fear of his life. I do not want him to be sent back to Zimbabwe because there is a possibility that he will not make it there for very long.

If there is absolutely anything I can do to help stop Williard from being deported I would do it. I may only be 14 and there isn't much a 14 year old can do, but I want to try."

A 13-year-old writes:

"I don't believe that Williard will be safe if he has to return to Zimbabwe. His family have been killed and because of the current situation in Zimbabwe and the fact that he is opposed to Robert Mugabe's regime and was a member of the Movement for Democratic Change, I think his life will be in danger if he returns."

I have received many comments from adults, but those from youngsters are the most moving. They show what our country is about; they show its future.

I ask the Minister what evaluation has been made of the deteriorating situation. What is preventing the Government from realising that the current policy is inappropriate? Why are we relying on the courts? We are told that individual cases are being looked at, but in how many have the Government decided to defer deportation? Does the Minister acknowledge that there are some failed asylum seekers in this country who, if returned, could face persecution for the simple reason that they applied for asylum from a regime that would not consider their rights if returned? I repeat an earlier question: what monitoring is taking place so that the Government can say, hand on heart, "Of course it is safe to be returned"? Surely it is not safe.

Another telling point was made. What message are we giving to Mugabe and his regime if we say that it is perfectly safe to return there? I find that incredible. On behalf of my former constituent—I know that he is staying somewhere else and dutifully reporting in at the moment—and all the other Zimbabweans in this country, I call on the Government not to wait for the court's decision, but to reintroduce the suspension of the deportations as soon as is practical.

10.33 am

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Woking) (Con): I join others in saying that this has been an excellent debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) not just on the way he has spoken today, but on his truly outstanding speech on the Second Reading of the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill a couple of weeks ago. I am grateful to all who have spoken today, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) and the hon. Member for Bedford (Patrick Hall).

It was about 14 years ago that the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) and I were on a parliamentary delegation to Zimbabwe. I came back from that visit optimistic and hopeful; I thought that Zimbabwe had a great future, although there were obviously worries. Those worries have increased over the years. We are grateful to the hon. Lady for her comments today. For many years she has taken an interest in Zimbabwe and the House owes her a debt of gratitude for her work and commitment. As I said, I was a little worried when I returned from Zimbabwe 14 years ago, but I am much more worried today. The whole House is worried. I cannot find an hon. Member who is not concerned about the position in Zimbabwe.

During the past few weeks many of us have written to the Foreign Secretary following representations from constituents. The reply stated:

"We are fully aware of the appalling situation in Zimbabwe and share" your constituent's

"concerns. The latest crackdown by the authorities . . . is an outrage. It has led to over 30,000 arrests and the wanton destruction of thousands of homes affecting over 200,000 people, many of whom are left homeless. However, this is typical of the actions of a regime that for five years has pursued disastrous policies backed by brutality and intimidation resulting in a broken economy, food shortages and enormous suffering."

Patrick Hall: Just to add to the hon. Gentleman's point about the house and shelter clearances, my sources have told me that that policy is moving into the affluent suburbs, where officials are harassing people about, and removing, garages, garden sheds and satellite dishes. It is all part of turning the screw on people and putting them under pressure.

Mr. Malins: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. My understanding of what is happening is exactly as he portrayed it. Yet there is a sense of helplessness in the House. What can we do to change Zimbabwe's awful regime? I believe—I think I speak for many of us—that it must be confronted head on. I hope that the EU can take tougher action and impose tougher sanctions, perhaps widening them to freeze the assets of those who bankroll Mugabe. The Government could consider taking the Zimbabwean Government to the United Nations Security Council and proposing a resolution to send UN observers to Zimbabwe to monitor not just food distribution, for example, but returned asylum seekers. There is a need for us in this Parliament and the Government to become even more involved in trying to improve matters there.

As some colleagues mentioned this morning, many asylum seekers from Zimbabwe have come here over the years. Some 15,000 came between 2001 and 2004, although the number has fallen this year. We are all interested in the fate of failed asylum seekers who have been returned to Zimbabwe. We know that some 95 were returned between January and March this year. Looking back at the number of applications from Zimbabwe for asylum in this country over the past five years, it is plain that many were refused. It is also plain that a huge proportion of those who failed in their claims were not removed from this country and must still be here. One of our concerns should be their distress and worry about the present uncertain policy and about what might happen to them in the middle of the night if an official chose to lift them and remove them.

The 95 who have been removed in the past few months are of great concern to us all, and I hope that the Minister will go into detail about his knowledge of what has happened to them and to others who were removed from this country earlier. Is he aware of any cases in which a failed asylum seeker has returned to Zimbabwe to face death, torture or other brutality?

That brings me to monitoring—having people on the ground in Zimbabwe to find out what is going on and, in particular, what may be happening to some of the failed asylum seekers who have been returned—and how the Government get their information. We know about the regular country reports that are produced. Some of us over the years have wondered about the standard of those reports, but we know that the report in April about Zimbabwe documented serious human rights abuses, and that the position has got much worse since then.

The hon. Member for Bedford referred to the campaign that has been going on for a while in Zimbabwe, which I think translates as "drive out the rubbish". It has involved forced evictions, terrible destruction and a motivation that many of us believe to be extremely suspect. The motivation is political and not, as Mr. Mugabe would have it, the restoration of sanity and order in urban and other areas through a cleaning-up campaign. We do not think that is what it is at all.

Others have referred to the numbers affected by that appalling campaign. According to the Department for International Development, a third of a million people were affected. However, the hon. Member for Vauxhall said to the House that up to 1 million people may have been displaced.

We had a no-removals policy. I remember very well when it was introduced. At the beginning of 2002, the then Home Secretary, now the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, introduced the policy of not returning failed asylum seekers to Zimbabwe. I was part of the shadow Home Affairs team then, and I remember that in discussions with him, he approached the matter sensitively and properly.

Incidentally, I say to the Minister that the Government have approached the matter sensitively, and there is more unity than political division between us in the sense that I hope to goodness that we are all seeking the same ends. We supported the no-removals policy, but we were concerned when it was withdrawn at the end of 2004.

There are several examples of no-returns in our asylum system and removals policies over the past few years. I checked the records to find that, over the past seven or eight years, we have had a no-returns policy for a period in relation to at least a dozen countries, including, interestingly enough, Turkey, from July 1999 to December 2000. It is true that our Government have from time to time said to themselves that a policy change is needed, and that we shall have a no-returns policy. Changing the position back at the end of 2004 might, as was said earlier, have been thought odd, given that the situation in Zimbabwe hardly got better during that period.

The Home Secretary said last month that he had considered whether to reinstate the suspension of forced removals to Zimbabwe, but had concluded that there were insufficient grounds to do so. By then the position was getting acute, but the Home Secretary said:

> "The blanket suspension of all removals to any country can only encourage those who seek to get around controls for reasons nothing whatsoever to do with their political activity or fear of persecution."—[Official Report, 27 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 1023.]

I do not think that over the years the Government have routinely monitored the treatment of those who have been returned. I recall, as the House will, the exchange in the other place between Baroness D'Souza and Baroness Scotland of Asthal about substantiated or unsubstantiated reports of ill treatment of individuals. I understand that the Refugee Legal Centre, among others, has evidence of the systematic abuse and torture of returned failed asylum seekers.

The level of concern has increased enormously in all parties over the past few weeks. Even now, there are large numbers of detainees on hunger strike. There are 70 or more applications before the High Court from people who are fighting removal. Only a few days ago, Mr. Justice Collins urged the Home Secretary to halt removals to Zimbabwe, pending the full hearing on 4 August. Following a case only a day or two ago, the Home Office decided to suspend forced removals to Zimbabwe until after 4 August.

I conclude with a few questions to the Minister. Do any other European countries have a no-returns policy? Can he tell us a little more about how the Zimbabwe issue affects asylum seekers in other European countries? Do those countries have many applicants from Zimbabwe? What do they do with failed applicants? Do they send them back? Is the Minister in discussion with any European Governments on what they are doing as regards a no-returns policy? Can he please try very hard to set up a system for monitoring failed asylum seekers who have been returned to Zimbabwe? We need genuine information about the burdens and the brutality that they may face. Monitoring is a very important policy, because we just do not know what is happening to some people, although we fear the worst. Will the Minister please now reinstate the no-removals policy and not just leave us in limbo?

10.46 am

The Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Nationality (Mr. Tony McNulty): Before I congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt), I caution the hon. Member for Woking (Mr. Malins), who speaks for the Opposition. There are no hunger strikes at the moment and there is no uncertainty about policy—a point that relates partly to the purpose of the debate. Clearly, many hon. Members want to change policy, but, with the greatest respect, I would not go around confusing things or throwing into the pot things that simply are not facts.

I congratulate the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire not only on securing the debate—that is customary—but on the nature of his contribution. These are emotive and sensitive issues, and I thank him for his kind words about my officials and others. Without wanting to make this a mutual back-slapping event, let me return the compliment by commending him on his courtesy and respect for those involved, who are doing such difficult work. I may contradict those remarks shortly, but I make them with the best of intentions.

This is, and will continue to be, a very emotive and sensitive matter. I know entirely where the UNHCR stands on it, and it has made that very clear. It is entirely fair to put that in the public domain. I hope to come on to some of the generalities of our policy, but the time that I have might be better spent focusing first on some of the serious matters raised by individual hon. Members, in particular the hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire.

The hon. Gentleman talked about escort services. He said that people were being escorted in vehicles, such as vans and cars, that were not equipped with CCTV, and I shall ensure that that ends. Indeed, I believe that it is ending and that the one contractor that still operates in that way is getting CCTV fitted. However, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman under separate cover to ensure that CCTV prevails and that it is the norm throughout all cases involving escorts. All the main contractors' vehicles are certainly equipped with CCTV, but, as he says, there are occasions when that is not the case.

I do not agree that we can go from admitting that there have been mistakes and careless acts within the detention estate to a broader, blanket condemnation of all that goes on in it. Detention is a key element of any asylum process. I profoundly disagree with the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie), who gaily slipped in, condemned our entire uncivilised asylum system and all who work in it, and then left. Although there are serious—almost life and death—issues to be addressed, they are not sufficient for any Member of this House to condemn the entire system and all who work in it because of errors or because they do not agree with a particular aspect of what we are doing. That is to malign public servants in a way that is beneath any Member of the House. I seriously traduce it.

The impression was given that maltreatment is the norm in our detention estate, but that is not the case. I would cheerfully welcome a detailed consideration of our detention estate by the Home Affairs Committee. Many dedicated, professional and committed people do difficult jobs, and it is not sufficient for any Member of the House to malign them on the back of one, two or more particular cases, however emotive.

Kate Hoey: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: No, I will not. [Interruption.] I will come to my hon. Friend's points in a moment and may give way then, but I will not have the entire estate and the entire civil service body working within it maligned for some mistakes, carelessness, and—we have investigated this before—attitudes to asylum seekers.

Although it is a truism, I cheerfully state that people in our detention estate have committed no crimes. They are in detention for specific reasons, such as the fear that they will abscond, as a prelude to their removal, or because decisions on their cases will be made quickly. That is part of the system. They have committed no crimes, and are entitled to, and overwhelmingly receive, civilised and decent treatment. That is certainly the case in the parts of the estate that I have visited. Over the summer, I shall visit the rest of it. I happily undertake to raise with relevant officials whatever carelessness, mistakes and attitudinal matters need correction, but I suspect that they are limited and rare, rather than the norm, as has been suggested.

The hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire asked about a missing memo. I say quite frankly that I have not seen it. I believe that it was generated from a local level. There has been no change in policy—I can say that with some integrity as I have been party to these matters throughout. In the first instance, some removals were deferred post-27 June, because we undertook to put in the final check specifically for Zimbabwe. The notion that removals were suspended for any specific reason, such as the G8 or any embarrassment that might be caused, simply is not the case.

Alistair Burt: I will leave a copy of the memo with the Minister. Will he write to me on whether there has been any inquiry into how that situation arose? I take his point that the policy had not changed at the time, but the memo obviously came from the Home Office, and clearly states:

"all Zimbabwean RD's need to be deferred until further notice."

How did it get written, and who sent it? We now know that it has no status, but the Minister cannot be happy that that sort of thing goes flying around in his name.

Mr. McNulty: I certainly shall deal with that in a letter because it is not the case. That sort of decision would have been taken by me or the Home Secretary, and it was not. I shall explore the matter outside our deliberations and I reiterate that there was no blanket suspension before or after G8 or any other event to save embarrassment or otherwise.

The hon. Gentleman asked for a debate on this subject with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in attendance, but if a Minister from the FCO were also here, the hon. Gentleman would hear the same refrain. The rumours in the press are just that: rumours in the press. I do not know what happened to it, but there was an innovation whereby three, four or five Ministers lined up to answer questions and hold mini-debates with a thematic approach in this place rather than in the main Chamber. I do not know whether we still do that, but, again, I would welcome such a development.

As I said, we are not hiding behind the skirts of a judge's cloak because of our embarrassment. The hon. Gentleman knows that. This is what today's debate is about; our policy on enforced returns has not changed, but we respect the judiciary's position as set out in comments made by two judges, Collins and Ouseley, on enforced returns, and we will not force failed asylum seekers to return to Zimbabwe before the hearing on 4 August, at which we, and I am sure everyone else, hope for some clarity at the very least. Hon. Members will know, however, that failed asylum seekers continue to return voluntarily to Zimbabwe, and that there are voluntary and enforced returns among those on the non-failed asylum seeker route. I place that on the record for the sake of balance.

We were asked why we had taken the decision now when we said that the policy had not changed after Mr. Justice Collins's comments. We took our decision to respect the judiciary's position as set out in comments made by both judges. It was said that the judges were about to impose a suspension anyway. In a blanket sense, they were not about to do so. I suspect, as my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) intimated several times, that a range of people would suspend legal and other activities by stealth until 4 August, which is entirely a matter for them. I intend to give way to my hon. Friend in a moment so that she can say something about that.

[Mr. McNulty]

We start from the premise that the asylum policy and returns must be based on the concerns, circumstances and all the other elements that relate to an individual rather than the collective.

Mr. Malins: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: No.

Mr. Malins: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: With respect, I have said no. I shall shortly give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall, and then my time is about done.

My hon. Friend suggested that our policy is all about statistics and picking off easy targets in an attempt to secure Government policy. That is fundamentally not the case, and I assure her that no one will be returned to Zimbabwe or anywhere else on my watch simply for the governmental convenience of achieving a target. I totally resent her imputation that that is the case.

Kate Hoey: The Minister should not resent people questioning what many members of the public believe to be the truth, but I am sure that the House will generally welcome his assurance. Will he, however, get to the crux of the matter and say why the policy changed, and whether he believes that it is now safe to send people back to Zimbabwe?

Mr. McNulty: The policy is very clear. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary stated on 27 June and in a written statement thereafter, we do not concede the case for a blanket suspension of removals to Zimbabwe. We shall deal with each individual on their own merits and, in the context of the asylum system, we shall not remove people to Zimbabwe whom we consider to be under threat.

Mr. Malins: Does the Minister know what other countries, such as France, Germany and other EU member states, are doing about this?

Mr. McNulty: So far as I am aware, those countries have no significant numbers of people—if they have any at all—from Zimbabwe, so the matter does not arise. I shall get back to the hon. Gentleman if I am wrong about that. I will meet a range of Zimbabwean-related NGOs in the next week or so under the auspices of the Refugee Council.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall mentioned the case involving the use of Malawian passports. I have not had any representations about that. I understand that there will be no removals tonight, but I do need to see representations. It remains the policy that the focus is on the individual and that individual representations are judged on their merits. That is the most appropriate way to protect not only those who would be at risk, but the overall integrity of the asylum system.

Football-Related Violence

11 am

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair in this Chamber, Mr. Bayley. I chose the title of the debate very carefully. I should put down a marker: I love football; along with politics it is perhaps one of my great loves. I am a patron of AFC Telford United, and I am very proud of the club and its traditions. It went out of business just over a year ago and has been taken over by a supporters' trust, which is doing fantastic work in the local community. The club sits in the constituency neighbouring mine, that of the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard), but as I said I am proud to be a patron.

I shall focus on two themes in the debate. The first is the general issue of football-related violence and the second is an incident concerning one of my constituents, Mr. Jamie Turner, and problems that he encountered at a football match he attended in Southampton earlier this year.

We all know that football prompts great passion. It is a fantastic game and people get incredibly involved in it. It is our national game and we should be proud of it. There have been many studies of football as a social phenomenon. In 1981, the great anthropologist Desmond Morris wrote a book called "The Soccer Tribe", in which he considered football as an extension of tribal rituals that the human race has enjoyed over many years. The book is interesting because he talks about football as a "stylised battle", a process whereby communities come together to do battle with each other. That is fine on the pitch.

Social scientists have talked for a long time about the search for an identity through football. People say that we live in a world dominated by globalisation in which people feel increasingly remote from their communities; they find that football gives them a contact with their local community, with their town and with society around them. There is probably some truth in that and we should understand it, but if people are going to use violence as part of the process, they should search for their identity in a different way. It is okay for people to support their local club very passionately, but it is not acceptable for them to be violent in their support. We should be very clear that people who are violent in and around the environment of football are criminals, not football supporters, and should be treated as such.

Clubs are doing a great deal to root out the problem of violence at grounds. An awful lot has been done in the past 20 or so years following incidents such as Heysel. The bigger clubs have gone in for all-seater stadiums. CCTV is now prevalent in many clubs, right through the divisions. Indeed, the club that I follow, AFC Telford United, has CCTV fitted around the ground, even though it is in one of the lower leagues. We should congratulate football clubs on taking a lead on that and on matching up with other campaigns, such as "Kick racism out of football".

Often nowadays violence is displaced away from football grounds and into neighbouring communities, and many of those involved in violence have already been excluded from their football clubs for violent conduct at the ground. On match day, we sometimes see groups of men—predominantly young men, it has to be said—floating around the ground and the environment near their club, looking or "cruising", as some of them call it, for trouble with opposing fans. We hear stories of groups of supporters e-mailing one another and using mobile phones and the computer network to set up pitched battles in locations near grounds. That has nothing to do with football any more. It is loosely associated with those clubs, which rightly distance themselves from such behaviour. It is a social phenomenon—a criminal phenomenon—in which groups gather to fight some form of battle connected with an honour for their community which is completely misplaced. I am sure that that view is shared throughout the House.

What I am describing can happen in football at all levels. It happens not only in top-flight football but throughout the structure. AFC Telford United played a friendly game against West Bromwich Albion on 9 July, and several supporters from, it is thought, Wolverhampton Wanderers turned up. They are not really supporters so much as people who associate themselves with that team. I do not think that they actually attended the match, but they caused a fight in a pub just outside the ground.

I can do no better than echo the words of the chairman of my club, Lee Carter, which appeared on the club website after the event. He said:

"The likelihood is that the people who were involved in the trouble did not attend the match. The match was a magnificent occasion attended by over 2,000 well behaved, true supporters from both sides. Each one of us who attended the match on Saturday should be extremely angry that a minority of mindless idiots have tarnished the name of football of AFC Telford United and of the whole town by acting no better than circus chimps outside the stadium. Essentially it was a public order offence but we shouldn't deny that the incident only occurred because there was a football match in town. We can't wipe our hands of the matter and if there is a way that we can prevent people who were involved from coming into the stadium we will."

That was a responsible statement from a club chairman: he did not deny that violence occurred because there was a football match in town; he acknowledged the problem; and he wants to work with the community and police to put things right. That is no more than I would expect from a club that is as well rooted in its community as AFC Telford United now is.

There was a game on the following Tuesday evening, 12 July, against Wolves, which went extremely well. After that game, Lee Carter had this to say:

"Everyone, press and public, who vigorously reported and promoted the trouble that occurred after the WBA game should do the decent thing and promote the true reality of football at the New Bucks Head. As on Saturday, over 2,000 well behaved, true supporters from both towns enjoyed a magnificent occasion in a stadium that is owned by a Trust and club that are committed to creating a family friendly atmosphere."

Again, he was quite right. It is interesting that that game did not receive coverage on the same scale as the game of the previous Saturday. No one wants to talk about football matches that go well, where everyone enjoys themselves. Of course, that is what happens at 99 per cent. of games in this country and around the world.

I do not think that we can apply a social science model, however attractive that may appear. We can use it to understand what happens when football violence occurs, but we cannot deploy it as a defence for criminal behaviour. We should never do that.

The Football Association is doing good work in this respect. It is committed to eradicating violent behaviour at football matches in England and matches involving England teams abroad. The FA is working in several areas domestically and internationally to achieve that goal. For example, it is working with the Government to explore ways of tightening the regime governing ticket touting, the unauthorised sale of tickets that is one of the main factors leading to hooliganism, undermining as it often does the segregation at football grounds. I support the FA in that and in seeking far harsher penalties for ticket touts who operate outside grounds.

In recent years there has been huge progress in preventing the hooligan element from following the England team abroad. I understand that only one arrest was made before, during or after any of the four games that England played in Euro 2004 in Portugal. I thought that our supporters did us proud there, and I hope that England fans will follow in that direction in future. That was in no small part due to work done before and during the tournament by the FA, the police authorities—I am sure that the Minister will want to comment on that—the Home Office, and clubs and other colleagues in Portugal, ensuring success both in the security arrangements and in the eradication of hooliganism.

The FA has started similar preparations for next year's World cup in Germany. I hope and expect that the England team will be followed by people who want to enjoy their football in that country. The FA is right to call for magistrates throughout the UK to ensure that football banning orders are applied consistently and rigorously and to take all relevant offences into account. We can stop trouble makers travelling abroad if the process is managed firmly.

I want the Minister in his reply to tell us about the Government's efforts to lobby for the Schengen border agreement to be suspended for the duration of the tournament, as it was in 2004. We need to control people who have a record of committing violent football-related offences and who may intend to travel to Germany.

The FA is working hard with outside agencies to promote diversity among England fans, which is most important. The profile of people watching England games is very different from that of 20 years ago, which is a good thing. We need to get more families and women involved in the game, to encourage a multiracial view of football and to get more people engaged across the board. I am pleased that the FA recently fined Millwall £25,000 following racist chanting by their fans at a Carling cup game last season. We must be tough on that kind of abuse.

We will hear more about police activity in relation to football violence in a minute, but I shall turn first to what happened to my constituent and friend, Jamie Turner, who is a Telford resident. Jamie and his wife Karen, who is also a friend of mine, run a successful IT business in Telford. Jamie, who is a Manchester United fan, was 46 yesterday. He has followed Manchester United all his life and goes to games with a group of friends who travel together and enjoy their football.

Jamie was assaulted by a gang of Southampton fans while on the way to the last game of the season on 15 May. He met some of his friends in a local park and they walked towards the ground; they crossed a main road and started to go through an estate. A number of individuals—I will not call them football supporters, because they are not; they are criminals—emerged from a local working men's club, or drinking club, and set about the group of supporters with baseball bats, with chair legs and, some have said, with metal bars. It was an unprovoked attack on a group of people who just wanted to go and watch a football match. To my knowledge, Jamie has never before been involved in trouble relating to football. Several of the supporters involved in the incident pleaded with those who attacked them to leave them alone, because all they wanted to do was go and watch the game.

Jamie tried to walk away from the incident and was attacked—he was hit on the head with a baseball bat. For a time I thought that Jamie would not reach his 46th birthday; he will have to live with the legacy of the incident for the rest of his life. His family have been incredibly strong in supporting him and they deserve our respect. Jamie was unconscious for a considerable time; he was in a critical condition in the intensive care unit at Southampton general hospital. I stress that the incident was nothing to do with real Southampton supporters because, I repeat, the people involved are simply criminals.

At the time, Karen said to the press:

"It appears that Jamie was ambushed totally at random by a group of people who were intent on causing trouble before the game."

That is an appalling scenario: a group of friends who have been watching football for many years travel together for the closing game of the season, sit in a local park for a few minutes and enjoy themselves before the match, then head off towards the ground, when somebody nearly kills one of them. It is incredible that that should happen to someone while they are walking to a football match.

The police have been painstaking in their work, and I know that Karen wants to pay tribute to them. She has not seen eye to eye with them on some of the things that they have done, but, all in all, she thinks that they have done an incredibly painstaking job in trying to resolve the matter. Many local people have bravely come forward to give evidence, although they must be scared. Witnesses are also afraid that they themselves might be branded as trouble makers, football hooligans or criminals. Such an incident can become a melee. Things move quickly and people try to get out of the way—they run in an effort to remove themselves from the situation. Events become a blur, and people cannot remember exactly what happened or who did what. The police are trying to focus on that problem.

Several people have appealed for witnesses to come forward and give further evidence. Bobby Charlton made that appeal on behalf of Manchester United. I hope that anybody in the Southampton area, any Manchester United supporter or any genuine Southampton supporter who knows what happened on that day will come forward and give further evidence to the police. We must catch the individual, or group of individuals, who committed this crime. Quite frankly, it is not safe to have them walking around on our streets. They must be brought to justice.

I close by asking the Minister to ensure that this case continues to have a high profile and that we will not rest until we find the individual or individuals who attacked my constituent and friend, Jamie Turner, when he went to Southampton to enjoy a football match with his friends. I am sure that the Minister will commit himself to ensuring that we continue with the inquiry and that we press as hard as we can to find the individuals involved in the incident.

Football is a great game. It is one of the great loves and passions of my life and the life of many people in our nation. It will always be a great game. We must ensure that we talk carefully about football-related violence, which has nothing to do with football, and never should have anything to do with it. Those who perpetrate it are criminals.

11.17 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) for raising the issue of football disorder. As he made clear, substantial progress has been made in recent years, but there is still a problem. We cannot afford for a moment to be complacent about it. This debate gives me an opportunity to outline some of the initiatives that the Government have taken and continue to take to deal with it.

First, I want to say a few things about the specific incidents that my hon. Friend related this morning. I was aware of the appalling attack on his friend that took place in Southampton in May. Indeed, my hon. Friend and I discussed the incident soon afterwards. I assure him that my officials have maintained close contact with the Hampshire police throughout the intervening weeks.

As my hon. Friend indicated, the incident occurred before a football match between Southampton and Manchester United. He described the circumstances in which the attack took place. The police confirmed that the visiting group were chased through a nearby housing estate before two of their number were seriously assaulted. One of the attacks was on my hon. Friend's constituent and personal friend, who sustained serious injuries. Mr. Turner has been discharged from hospital, but his treatment will continue for some time. I take this opportunity to send the good wishes not just of myself but of the whole House to my hon. Friend's constituent for his sustained recovery.

The assault was serious, and the Hampshire constabulary immediately set up a major incident team to investigate it. I assure my hon. Friend, his constituents and their family that the inquiries are thorough and ongoing. I endorse the call that he made this morning: if anybody has any information that could help the police, they should come forward with it. I am not able to go into further detail about the police investigation, but I emphasise that Hampshire constabulary is wholly committed to bringing its investigations to a satisfactory conclusion. I know that everyone in the House fully supports the view that serious criminality of that kind cannot be tolerated for a second.

My hon. Friend also cited an incident that occurred the weekend before last. A small group of troublemakers who associate themselves with my hon.

Friend's football team, AFC Telford United, and with Wolverhampton Wanderers, attacked a public house in which visiting West Bromwich Albion fans were drinking after a football match. The incident resulted in one serious assault and three arrests, and it demonstrates my hon. Friend's point: football-related disorder can occur at all levels of football. I was shocked to find out that nine individuals who associate themselves with AFC Telford United are subject to banning orders.

In recent years, we have made great strides in dealing with football hooliganism. Incidents between groups of rival hooligan supporters still occur from time to time—we heard evidence of that this morning—but the problems are not of the same magnitude as they were. That is because the Government, police, football authorities and supporter groups have come together; they are intolerant of that besmirching of the name of football. We have found ways of working together to counter the influence of hooliganism.

As we know, the dynamic of football disorder is complex and fluid. It ebbs and flows in scale, and its character changes continually. We need to keep a clear eye on what is taking place. Football matches can be highly charged and passionate affairs, with raw emotion and community spirit holding sway. The potential for a minority of fans to exploit that opportunity to lose their discipline and self-control and pose a danger and threat to others is always there. It can never be a justification for violence.

Let us be clear that the scope for spontaneous misbehaviour in grounds has greatly reduced as a result of the improvements in ground structure and safety that have taken place. I pay tribute to football clubs and all those associated with football who have made that happen. My hon. Friend is right: today, football is a game with a much more diverse supporter base. More families and women attend and feel safe, secure and unafraid. That is a wholly good thing for the game and for the atmosphere in which it is played.

The appalling incident in Southampton demonstrates an important point: football disorder can be violent and can have serious consequences. These days, it is largely pursued away from the public eye and is, as my hon. Friend mentioned, dispersed from the immediate area of the football stadium. That is also a challenge for the police and one that they are ready to meet.

The House will be aware that, in recent years, there has been a major reduction in the numbers involved in football disorder. That has been achieved through a range of measures. The use of football banning orders has been fundamental, as has more effective public order policing. We have had a much more focused, intelligence-led police operation, which has helped. There has also been a discernible change in the attitude of football supporters. They are no longer prepared to be complicit in hooliganism, because they know that it is wrong and intolerable.

Domestic football disorder is rarely a major issue these days for crime statistics and the impact on local communities. It would not rate as the highest priority on a local policing agenda, given the other problems that the police face. During the 2003–04 season, the total number of football-related arrests, which includes any arrests that take place during the 24 hours either side of a match, was fewer than 4,000. That is 1.62 arrests per football match and represents a 10 per cent. decrease from the season before. That is a good and improving record. Data from last season will be published in the near future. I cannot confirm the figures, but all the indications are that progress is continuing.

Perhaps an even stronger indicator of the extent to which things have improved is the fact that about 25 per cent. of all premiership and Football League matches take place completely free from police involvement, which shows that the sport takes its responsibilities seriously.

We know the history, which goes back as far as Luxembourg in the 1970s. We remember the terrible events in Dublin in the 1990s, and in Copenhagen, Brussels and Charleroi in 2000, when we had a wake-up call telling us that something had to be done about football hooliganism. During the Euro 2000 finals in Belgium, 945 England fans were arrested and deported. It seemed at that time that England's future as a football nation was at stake. However, it gave us the impetus to do something. I am sure that all Members of the House will welcome what has been achieved since and agree that the reputation and behaviour of England football fans overseas has improved dramatically since our new strategy was introduced. This is shown by the significant reduction in the number of arrests of English people for football-related disorder during the European and World cup finals. As my hon. Friend said, compared with the 945 arrests in 2000, there was just one confirmed arrest during Euro 2004 in Portugal, an impressive achievement when 80,000 football fans travelled to Portugal.

The UK's efforts to minimise the threat also received public acclaim from UEFA, the Portuguese police and Government, the Independent Football Commission and the fans themselves. There were, of course, problems with drunkenness and disorder in the Algarve, but the Portuguese made it clear that that was not football-related disorder in the traditional sense; it was antisocial drunken behaviour of the sort witnessed too often in our high streets and some Mediterranean resorts. In Spain alone, more than 2,000 British tourists are arrested annually for drunken violence and disorder. That is a regrettable and disturbing trend, which the Government are working hard to address, but it is a wider social problem rather than a football-related one.

That success has not happened by accident. It is the result of a great deal of hard work by a number of agencies and the fans, as well as the comprehensive Home Office-led initiative born out of the terrible scenes that we remember from 2000. The legislation allowing football banning orders is fundamental to the strategy and gives the police and the courts power to prevent domestic football disorder and the export of the problem.

In the next few weeks, I shall place in the Library a detailed report on the impact of the legislation. The new laws are delivering on every front. The number of orders has risen dramatically since Euro 2000 when around 100 individuals could be prevented from travelling to Belgium. Today the number of banning orders exceeds 3,000. Indeed, the 10 per cent. reduction in arrests reported for the 2003–04 season was accompanied by a 45 per cent. increase in the number of banning orders.

[Paul Goggins]

The police can identify those people and take the appropriate steps to prevent them from travelling and thereby associating with football matches.

It is important to pay tribute to the effectiveness of public order operations by local police in suppressing the risk of football violence and in reassuring local communities. It is also important to pay tribute to football fans. They and their organisations, particularly the Football Supporters Federation, have played a major role in helping the police to combat football-related disorder.

I know that hon. Members share the widespread pleasure in what we have achieved in our national sport. We all like to participate in one way or another and support our teams. We can all take pride in what has been achieved and the fact that our national game is no longer blighted by mass disorder on the terraces or in the streets of European cities that host football tournaments.

The legislation and strategy introduced in the wake of the violence during Euro 2000 is working well, but the problem of hooliganism may not have been eradicated and the threat may remain, so we must not be complacent. However, the number and scale of incidents both at home and overseas has decreased dramatically. Relatively small and isolated incidents will occur from time to time, and some, like the appalling incident in Southampton that my hon. Friend described, remind us of the need to retain the initiative and prevent troublemakers from shaming our national game.

EU Access to Ports Directive

2.30 pm

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I am grateful to Mr. Speaker for selecting this debate and also for the interest and support that has been shown by colleagues on both sides of the House. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister will want to reflect carefully on the points made. As a Minister, she does not have much choice about being here, but it is at some personal cost to her and I am grateful.

I am, by inclination, a supporter of the European Union and have been saddened by the turn against it that has been manifest in a number of European countries in the past few weeks and months. I am also one of the first to recognise that one of its problems is its ability to inflict damage needlessly on itself. On occasion, we need to step in to prevent EU institutions from doing that. We are in such a situation with the directive today.

We are told that we are in a period of reflection, following the various referendums. Among other things, it is directives, such as this one, on which we should reflect. As far as I can see, the EU access to ports directive is not wanted by the people who own the ports in this country, those who manage them, or those who work in them. If those things are true, it is difficult to understand why we should have such a directive and why, given its long and chequered history, anyone should press ahead with it. Has someone made a convincing case that the resistance from the owners, managers and workers represents a close-knit and self-serving cartel? If such evidence exists, the EU Commission has not yet produced it or said that the directive would be the right response.

The Commission appears to be pursuing the directive with a single-minded bloody-mindedness, introducing a new directive without real consultation, after the failure of the first version at the hands of the European Parliament. If ever there was a case of a solution looking for a problem, this would be it.

It is no secret that I was initially prompted to seek the debate by members of the Transport and General Workers Union, which supplies the labour in many of our ports. However, I start by quoting not the TGWU, but the briefing produced in June by the UK Major Ports Group, which represents the owners and managers of the ports. The group stated:

"It is striking that Europe's most liberalised ports oppose a directive that aims to liberalise Europe's ports. The problem is that far from liberalising Europe's ports, this Directive will impose a regulatory burden that will diminish investment and threaten jobs. In terms of ports, surely the Commission should be addressing the more pressing challenges of globalisation and growth and the need to create a level playing field".

The union has a different focus. Its briefing to me and to other hon. Members states:

"ports are dangerous places to work . . . The last thing we need is another Simon Jones."

That is a reference to the young man whose death has done so much to prompt the call for corporate manslaughter legislation. Everyone is brought together by the fear that the directive will undermine the long-term investment on which the success of all the ports, and therefore the jobs that go with them, depends.

In setting the scene, I may be getting a little ahead of myself, because it is worth setting out briefly what the directive is supposed to do and why there are good reasons for saying that it will not achieve that. It aims to open up greater competition in the provision of port services by, under certain conditions, requiring port services such as cargo handling to be put out to tender, enforcing the requirement to allow additional entrants into the market for port services, and extending the range of workers who can handle cargo.

A more far-reaching version of the directive was first introduced in January 2001. The cornerstone of a communication to the European Parliament and the European Council called "Reinforcing Quality Services in Sea Ports: A Key for European Transport" was a proposal for a directive on market access to port services. The Commission hoped, quite reasonably, to shift passenger and goods traffic towards maritime transport, which is a relatively environmentally friendly mode of transport. There was a wide-ranging debate between the Council and the Parliament, as well as with the ports industry.

The directive was initially adopted by the European Parliament in November 2001, but some key issues were still outstanding. The most controversial was cargo handling, a sector in which thousands of the Community's dockers are employed to load and unload cargo. Delegations from the Parliament and the Council negotiated hard under a conciliation procedure and appeared to have reached agreement in September 2003. However, the deal had still to be approved by the full Parliament, and its plenary narrowly rejected the text on 20 November 2003. The main sticking point was cargo handling. A majority of the Members of the European Parliament took the view that the definition of self-handling by the shipowner would still allow workers from boats to carry out unrestricted loading in European ports, which would have significantly downgraded safety.

The new draft directive was introduced in October 2004. The main change involved keeping the idea of self-handling, but restricting it to land-based staff. The European Parliament is now considering the directive. It held a hearing in June, and a report is due to be discussed at the November-December plenary session. It is clear, however, that opposition has not diminished: owners, operators and trade unions maintain their opposition to the directive.

The EU rapporteur, Mr. Jarzembowski, has so far said that it is "debatable" whether the proposals will be acceptable to the transport committee and the Parliament. Those hearings involved many different organisations, including the port owners, the European Boatmens Association, the European Tugowners Association, the European Transport Federation and the European Maritime Pilots Organisation, all of which criticised the directive, in whole or in part.

That is where we are today. The question for my hon. Friend the Minister is whether, given the United Kingdom's presidency of the EU, our Government should tell the Commission quietly to drop the draft directive because it does not serve the purposes for which it was introduced.

The first of the major arguments about the directive relates to health and safety issues, and that case has been put with great strength by the Transport and General Workers Union. We would all recognise that ports today are not the highly regulated and protected workplaces that they were 20 or more years ago. There is substantial competition.

Although I will not go into this today, I have written that the competitive gains made by UK ports have been derived, at least in part, from reduced wages, diminished or abolished pension provisions, and tougher working conditions for those who work at those ports. That is not the industry that would have been recognised in the years immediately after the dock labour legislation. Indeed, as the United Kingdom Major Ports Group says in its briefing, there is already significant competition in UK ports. It states that there is self-handling in UK ports, but adds:

"we believe that arrangements should be a matter for the port and not governed by prescriptive rules."

The union view, which I share, is that the forced introduction of unskilled or poorly supervised labour into a dangerous working environment can only make things worse. Markets and competition can be powerful, and sometimes positive, forces for change, but not at the high cost of human life and lasting injury. The majority of accidents to a dock's work force are caused by falls from heights, slips and trips, and workplace transport, while musculoskeletal disorders are a significant occupational health problem.

It is probably not widely recognised that the ports industry is, person for person, far more dangerous than construction. Compared with the national average, a person employed in dock work—"supporting water transport activities" is the Government's official definition—is 24 times more likely to be killed at work. A dock worker is three times more likely to be killed than someone employed in the construction, building or civil engineering industries. The likelihood of a major injury is similar to that of construction, but the chances of an injury that would keep someone off work for more than three days is nearly twice as high in ports as in construction. A genuine fear about the directive is a reduction in health and safety, which, as I have made clear, is already a significant problem for people working in the industry.

Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend comment on the safety implications not just for people directly involved in loading and unloading activities, but elsewhere in ports and their vicinities? The port in my constituency does not have the commercial business that it once did, but a similar amount of other industrial activity, including retail activity, often goes on nearby. Does he agree that there are safety implications for those involved in other activities within the vicinity of ports?

Mr. Denham: My hon. Friend makes a good point, and I hope that he expands on it. Although I do not want to paint too rosy a picture of how things are structured at the moment, it is fairly clear where responsibility for health and safety matters lies with regard to employers and others. The directive introduces, in effect, artificial and bureaucratic arrangements for changing those structures and responsibilities. That is bound to lead to unclear lines of accountability and responsibility, and increased dangers in lots of different ways.

[Mr. Denham]

The second argument relates to the threat to investment. Port development in this country is largely a private sector activity. Before it was blocked by a decision taken by the Department for Transport—I do not wish to re-open old wounds—the proposed expansion of the port of Southampton to Dibden bay was an entirely private sector proposal, depending on no public investment whatever. The investment was planned to the tune of at least £600 million. Even much smaller schemes can run into tens of millions of pounds, for which the private investor takes the total risk. In practice, investment in UK ports does not come from independent developers. The concept of the speculative ports development has yet to take off in a big way in this country. Ports tend to be developed by those who are planning to develop and operate them, and who want to provide port services.

The effect of the directive is that, in a relatively short period of time—perhaps 10 or 15 years after development—the company that has taken the risk and made the investment may, in effect, be required to pass their assets over to another operator, which can compete to provide the service without ever having taken the risk on the investment.

In a preamble to a brief provided for this debate, P&O points out the contradiction between that effect of the directive and its stated aim. It says:

"It is important to ensure that the development of new ports and port facilities is encouraged by this directive."

It goes on to talk about the different circumstances in which current investment might be endangered, but those circumstances primarily involve cases in which a private sector company has taken the risk of investing in acquiring land and taking risky and uncertain business decisions to develop new port capacity. The directive appears to put such investments and decisions at risk.

We often debate the private finance initiative. I do not want to do that now, but merely point out that a company that invests, say, £2 million to build a school is generally protected for 30 years under the standards contract before it has to open up to competition to provide facilities management. Under the directive, significantly greater investments would be protected for a much shorter time. It does not take much insight to realise that the effect is likely to be a reduction in investment, not increased competition in the ports industry, and a cut in essential competition between UK ports, because of the possible reduction in their capacity.

As a port MP, I am concerned about the management of the ports, their managers and those who work there. The loss of the expansion of the port at Dibden bay was a huge blow, and I am afraid that the Department for Transport deserves little credit for its failure to develop a coherent port strategy. The port of Southampton remains vital to our economy, and change and expansion are still necessary in some form, but the directive does nothing to make that expansion more likely. Nor does it do anything to secure the necessary investment. It certainly does nothing for the people who work day in, day out to provide port services.

I end as I began by telling the Minister that we can view the directive as a test of the Prime Minister's determination to reform EU institutions to make them concentrate on the essential issues and to be more effective. At the moment, the directive seems to be driven by nothing more than institutional inertia. It is almost a case of, "We have started, so we will finish." I hope that the Government and my hon. Friend have the will to recognise that and to step in and stop the process.

2.47 pm

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): I much agree with what has just been said, and I begin by making the same sort of comment with which the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) began his remarks.

A mature approach to the European Union is one that accepts, and with pleasure, our membership and our centrality to it. The EU is perhaps the most important step that has been taken in peace time for 100 years. I am proud that Britain is part of it, and I want us to be an active, lively and leading member of it. I look for closer relationships with our neighbours because I am sure that that enables us to have a greater say in the world and to have considerably more influence.

The trouble is that our attitude to the EU is rather juvenile, which means that one cannot criticise it without appearing to criticise the whole institution. I am pretty rude about the Government, but that does not mean that I do not want a Government. I am pretty rude about the Prime Minister, but that does not mean that I do not want to have a Prime Minister. I am pretty rude about the way in which the Government do many things, but that does not mean that I am opposed to democracy or that I do not want the Government of Britain to be elected in the way in which they are.

My job is to try to make the Government better. I take the same view about the EU. I am a committed enthusiast for Europe, which means that I have a greater duty to try to make it do things right than those who want to pull it down and diminish it, as, I fear, do so many short-sighted members of the press and some politicians who do not understand just how remarkable the ability of 25 nations is to work together for our common future. When we make a thorough muck-up—I was going to say something rather rude instead—of it, it is we, the enthusiasts, who really should be the first to say that something is wrong and does not work, and that we want something different.

I represent the port of Felixstowe, which is Britain's premier container port—indeed, Britain's premier port. It is we who managed to get rid of Britain's out-of-date and unacceptable practices under the dock labour scheme, and we who lead the ports of Britain with a companionable management-work force relationship. From time to time, I am approached by a trade union saying that management has got it wrong, or the other way about, but, in general, the port has a remarkable history of labour relations and success, so it should be encouraged by the legislation proposed by the EU. It sets an example that I would like the rest of Europe to follow more widely, but, unfortunately, the port's management and work force would be universally disadvantaged by the proposals, which the right hon. Gentleman has rightly brought to the attention of the House with this debate.

Clearly, all is not well in the European ports industry. The issue could be addressed with more enterprise, less national and municipal interference in the system and less distortion. I am constantly asked by trade unions and employers in the port of Felixstowe to complain that some of their competitors are unfairly supported with light dues, for example, and right across the scale to the way in which so many of the costs that fall on British ports are taken on by the Community as a whole rather than paid for in port dues.

We want to end such uncompetitive practices. Were we looking for a directive, it would be one that does just that: one that says that Antwerp, Rotterdam and other ports in mainland Europe should carry the same costs as we do in the British ports system. If we are to have a directive, it should carry that message. It should help our competitive system to compete more effectively with ports in countries that use all sorts of protectionist measures to ensure that their ports do better than they should. However, the directive does not do that. Instead, it makes it more difficult for leading European ports to do the job as they would wish.

I have been the Minister with responsibility for health and safety in this sector, and I declare an interest, as I have just written a book on health and safety. I help people, I hope, to improve their health and safety provision. It is widely known that there are many serious accidents in the construction industry, but accidents in the port industry are greater in number and severity, so health and safety in the port industry is not yet at the level that it should be. Some suggest that the case has been presented from a point of view that is parti pris, but I do not think that one can be parti pris about health and safety. It is an absolute issue that must be at the top of the list of important issues. I wholly agree with the right hon. Gentleman's comments on that.

A healthy ports industry is one in which a successful management is able to expand the port that it runs. Those of us who represent ports will know that that is not easy, because the moment one wants to expand a port, one finds that there is a rare plant immediately next door to where one wants to expand. I have often thought that we should find more unusual plants in the world if we threatened every area of the coast with a port, because it is surprising how rapidly the lesser spotted trefoil is discovered in those circumstances. I speak as a dedicated environmentalist.

I have been involved in Felixstowe in all sorts of discussions arising from the need to carry out much expensive work—particularly the replacement of the bird habitat—to get the necessary expansion of the port. The redevelopments that I am so pleased about in Felixstowe, which will redevelop the old part of the port, are just as difficult environmentally. The lighting, the fact that people cannot watch their television sets, and the things going on across the water in Bathgate create considerable difficulties for the port owners. The Dibden bay example is another way of saying that we already have strict containment of competition, deriving from the proper view of the environment. Let us not think that the business is an easy one to expand.

I think that the management has an important case to make: if we are to compete effectively, we need to remove the disadvantages—partly by reducing protectionism in the EU and partly by making it possible to continue, both here and elsewhere, the good processes that are available in Britain. I do not mind competing on a fair basis, and I should like the rest of the ports of Europe to enjoy the same regime as this country. I do not want things to get worse because of the directive.

I know that the Minister is new to the job and has gone to great trouble to be here today, and I thank her for that. I should like to feel that the Government were more completely and publicly direct about their position. I should like the Minister to be precise about what she intends to do, how she intends to do it, who is on her side, how many meetings she and her colleagues have had with our colleagues in the rest of Europe, whom she has on board and how what she intends will happen.

I think that I have negotiated longer, and on more occasions, in the EU than any Minister. In 16 years my experience was that working hard with one's colleagues means that they will reciprocate. Someone who spends real time with them, getting them to understand that we are on their side, that we want the EU to work but that the matter in question is bad for them and for us, will get support. I should like today to hear the Minister say, "I am not going to let this happen. I am going to be out there. I will win supporters and show that we can win the argument and win the vote." It is not just a question of the presidency getting the Commission to drop something; it is a question of the presidency getting colleagues to understand why the idea is nonsense.

I have no doubt that in the new Europe, where there are so many new partners, the Minister could get exactly the sort of support that I have described. If I may dare to give her a little advice, I think that her debut in such a debate will be hugely successful if she is able to make us all feel that she will be a feisty battler for Britain—no: a feisty battler for a sensible port system for the whole of Europe.

It may sound slightly odd coming from a Conservative Member, but although we may not always agree with the decisions of the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and although we often feel that she is pretty distant from agricultural constituencies such as mine, the one thing that we know about her is that if there is a battle in Europe she is a feisty fighter. I suppose that 40 years of watching one's back in the Labour party makes a person a pretty good fighter in that way; she is extremely good at that.

I wonder whether someone rather younger may prove to us today that she will be precisely as feisty and tough as that, so that we know that the Government are on the side not only of Britain but of a sensible ports industry. That is part of the enterprise economy that we want to make Europe have. It is the only way that Europe will compete effectively and provide the world with a friendly alternative to some of the more extreme versions of capitalism on the other side of the Atlantic.

3 pm

Mr. Anthony Wright (Great Yarmouth) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on securing the debate, which is certainly timely. I have been approached on several occasions by many people who work in the port of Great Yarmouth regarding ports packages 1 and 2 proposed by the European Commission. In addition, I hosted a meeting at

[Mr. Anthony Wright]

Westminster nine months or so ago with some of my constituents and many people from the Transport and General Workers Union, who raised the subject, so I am particularly pleased that the debate is taking place.

I fully endorse early-day motion 476, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Gwyn Prosser) and entitled "Access to Port Services Directive", which calls on the Government to withdraw their support for the directive. It is essential that we provide the safest working environment possible for those employed at UK ports and that we keep our port services at the highest professional level. British ports are, on the whole, the most effective in the world, but the proposed directive will threaten their commercial viability while, more seriously, risking the lives of those who work in them and use them.

The European Commission's drive systematically to promote liberalisation and competition in port services across Europe stemmed from the 1997 Green Paper "Sea Ports and Maritime Infrastructure". That was followed on 13 February 2001 by the Commission's adoption of ports package 1, the cornerstone of which was the draft directive on market access to port services. The need underlying that package of port liberalisation measures was to incorporate new member states in a successful and liberalised European ports system and to establish an effective trans-European ports network to reduce demand on other transport routes and stimulate business and employment prospects.

Port workers who provide services locally in Great Yarmouth have no problem in accepting those laudable concepts, especially when promoted as part of a package that holds safety and security in equal measure. However, it has become increasingly transparent through the evolution of the directive, which was rejected by the European Parliament in November 2003 and has now been reincarnated as ports package 2, that safety is being sacrificed in favour of measures that will, in their effort to achieve the goals of a package for the whole of Europe, stifle the individual competitiveness of UK ports.

The UK heads up an EU port infrastructure that is among the most productive in the world. The cost to unload a 40 ft container is, on average, $100, compared with $200 in North America and $300 in Asia. I am delighted that in Great Yarmouth the outer harbour development is nearing its final stages after receiving Government assistance based on the area's unique needs. However, on the whole, UK ports are distinct within the EU in that almost all investment in them is privately financed, with limited peripheral support from central or local government.

The UK has the largest port industry in Europe, with 120 ports handling about 560 million tonnes of cargo annually and 68 million passengers. It does that and does it well. It has been outlined in detail why imposing measures under the directive—such as mandatory authorisation for port services, reducing durations of authorisation and introducing new tendering requirements—will directly undermine the competitive edge of the UK's ports through inadequate regulation and over-regulation. Furthermore, transitional arrangements surrounding current port authorisations, compensation for companies affected by the arrangements and concerns about state aid guidelines will prove immensely challenging to the practical implementation of a directive which will provide a field day for lawyers.

Even more pressing for me are the serious health and safety concerns. Ports are dangerous places to work. My right hon. Friend said this, but it is worth repeating: someone employed in supporting water transport activities is 24 times more likely to be killed compared with the national average, and three times more likely to be killed than someone employed in the construction of buildings and civil engineering work. Despite that, ports package 2 has proposed self-handling by customers, reintroduces technical nautical services as a port service open to competitive tendering and forces compulsory competitive tendering on ports. All those measures to create intra-port competition will instead create what has commonly been described as ports of convenience across Europe, dramatically undermining safety.

On self-handling in cargo-handling operations, including loading and unloading, stevedoring, stowage, transhipment and other intra-terminal transport, there is simply no need for regulation under the directive to increase competition, given the already adequate terms of competition that exist in the UK. More dangerously, however, the proposed introduction of self-handling risks safety by the casualisation of jobs that only qualified professional dockers can carry out to high safety levels.

I have already illustrated the safety hazards associated with the work, with 3,000 accidents per 100,000 workers. If the work were to be carried out by land-based personnel of user companies, often contracted on a short-term basis, it is inevitable that safety will suffer and that the appalling safety record will get worse. The reintroduction of technical nautical services, including pilotage, towing and mooring, into the debate on competitive tendering—wisely withdrawn in 2001—will take what has always been an effective in-house service and create a service in which standards are undermined by commercial pressures.

The services are based on public safety. The most hazardous period of a shipping vessel's voyage is when it enters or exits a port, or when it navigates within a harbour, often within restricted or dangerous water. That presents a series of risks not only to the vessel, but to surrounding vessels and to the local environment. Indeed, many view those services as a maritime safety public service. It is madness to open such vital services to compulsory competition.

Under UK law, the provision of pilotage services is a matter for port authorities and all pilots are either employees or de facto employees. The service has worked well. For example, rather than having competition between pilot service providers, the port of the Humber and its operators have benefited from the increased co-ordination in pilot services. Only similar local authorities, including the one in my constituency, have the necessary experience to do what is best. Regulations should be left to the member states and not subject to all-encompassing EU legislation. Assurances that necessary safeguards will be put in place do not hold true, and to create a competitive market in such a safety-critical sector is absurd.

The general concept and ill effects of compulsory competitive tendering as proposed by ports package 2 will not stop there and will affect passenger services and ports in a similar way. Lack of safety management, lack of control of contractors and lack of training in all such matters will inevitably become serious issues for workers. Even under the current system, the increasing casualisation of many port services is a serious matter and the directive would open the floodgates. Indeed, it offers no additional safety and security protection for dock work other than those already used by the individual member states.

It is essential that the Government pursue greater health and safety measures nationally and internationally to reduce the unacceptable level of accidents in UK ports and across Europe. They should not increase those numbers by supporting an unworkable and impractical European directive.

The UK has not signed up to International Labour Organisation convention 152 on occupational safety and health for dock work, yet it is essential that the Government recognise the convention if they are to demonstrate their commitment to the international health and safety issues relating to dock work. Other ILO conventions on such issues, which the Government must also sign, are C137 and C145. I would welcome the Minister's comments on the Government's position. If she is unable to inform me of that today because of time constraints, I will be happy if she writes to me.

Other important issues that could be resolved without the need for the directive, or through a reduced directive, are those on inter-port competition as opposed to intra-port competition, and the establishment of greater transparency in state funding for ports. It is also essential that any future directive does not exclude ports other than those deemed category A so that they might also benefit from legislation under a new and significantly reduced directive along the lines that I have outlined.

It is unacceptable to adapt and change legislation that is fundamentally flawed. In their presidency of the EU, the Government have time to ensure that ports package 2 is defeated in the European Commission and the European Parliament. The new directive will not achieve their aim of successful, sustainable and safe ports in the UK, as outlined in their recently published policy paper "Modern Ports: A UK policy". Therefore, the directive should be dropped.

3.9 pm

Gwyn Prosser (Dover) (Lab): During my sea-going career on deep-sea and coastal vessels and on cross-channel ferries, I spent much of my time negotiating and arguing the case for the workers with various shipping companies and shipowners.

Since leaving the sea I have settled in Dover, near the busiest ferry port in the world. It is one of the premier ports. We all have generous things to say about our own ports, but Dover is particularly special to me, not least because Her Majesty the Queen opened two brand new berths there four hours ago. During my time ashore in Dover I have spent quite a lot of time making representations on behalf of port workers, members of the Transport and General Workers Union and members of the GMB over various grievances when the trade union system did not quite deliver the goods or it wanted a little bit more help. I cannot remember one instance when a new rule, regulation or piece of legislation has not caused quite dramatic differences in view across the negotiating table.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) said, the extraordinary thing about the directive is that it has succeeded in uniting us all: the port industry, both the ports associations, the shipowners, the terminal operators and all the trade unions. They are united in their condemnation of the European Commissioner's new directive. We are calling it mark 2. It seems from the flavour of the debate today that it is also uniting the political parties. We are building up a strong bow wave of opposition to this unnecessary directive.

It is gratifying to see so many members of the distinguished and influential all-party ports and merchant navy group present this afternoon. In the previous Parliament the group considered this issue and wanted to reject the directive. I have taken some soundings and have listened to the contributions this afternoon, and it is clear that when we consider it formally in this current Parliament the group will oppose it again. When the Transport Committee looks again at the new directive and all that it entails, it will undoubtedly produce a robust response. All the arrows point in the same direction.

The terminal operators are concerned about having to re-tender for services that they have provided for many years. They are not afraid of competition, but they are afraid of being outbid by powerful, cash-rich interests, and perhaps by interests whose long-term objectives are not the running of ports and the sailing of ships, but the selling of land, the building of houses and the making of money. That has to be borne in mind.

The issue of investment has been raised. One of the great problems that we are starting to face, and which we will be facing even more in future, is port and infrastructure congestion. We are told that freight through UK ports will probably double in the next 10 years. That is great for the expansion of some of our ports, especially on the south coast, but it is a challenge in terms of providing the infrastructure and keeping the traffic moving. However, investment in the berths must be continued, as the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) pointed out. Currently concessions are allowed over a period of 46 years, so at least we can say that for nearly 50 years, no matter which way the tide is flowing, we can invest big money and get returns in the future to meet the increasing demands. We are told that the directive reduces that to 30 years. That is another unnecessary limitation.

We know that the International Transport Workers Federation has pointed to the growing problem of being unable to expand and compete without the encumbrance of third parties being involved. However, the main problem in the directive—the one that caused so much anguish and grief during the first directive—is the vexed question of self-handling, especially by the ship's crew. There is talk of pressure for that text to be dropped, and that it will not be part of the final text, but it is early days yet.

[Gwyn Prosser]

We have already heard about the accident rate in ports—it is higher than that of the construction industry, and was higher than that of the mining industry when that industry was thriving—but the accident rate at sea is still a major issue. Moreover, we know that 90 per cent. of accidents at sea can be related to fatigue. In a sea-going career, the worst scenario in the world would be for sailors to come from a deep-sea passage to prepare for stand-by—preparing the lines and berthing the vessel—and then for those sailors to have to turn out on deck, not just to tie up the ship, which is part of their function, but to start discharging the cargo, with all the extra risks that that entails. That scenario would be particularly bad in today's environment, in which crews are getting smaller and the demands greater.

Even if that text is dropped, the directive will still give an incentive to ship operators and ports to bring in casual labour. The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal mentioned the dock labour scheme. I grew up in Swansea, and am old enough to remember my grandfather, who was a Swansea docker, leaving the house at 6 am or 7 am to walk down to Swansea docks to stand in a great mass of people and wait to be picked out from that crowd—by luck or by other means—to get a few hours' work on that day. The decision to select people was not to do with their commitment, energy or previous work history, but more to do with who they knew. That was not the free market; it was worse than a flea market. Those were the bad old days of organising ports.

Although we have lost that entirely unregulated scurrilous scheme—we have not quite gone back to the way that things were all those years ago—the directive would still put pressure on the port operator to take the lowest bidder. That could mean a build-up of agencies that might recruit in the back streets, and might even take on illegal workers, or people with no history in port work, with no feeling for safety or the proper procedures. That would increase the danger.

In the port of Dover—my constituency—I have been approached and lobbied by my friends Gary Punton, who represents the TGWU, and David Clements, who represents the GMB. Both the seafarers' unions have also lobbied me: the officers' union, the National Union of Marine, Aviation and Shipping Transport Officers, in which I declare an interest, because I am still a member; and the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, in which I also have to declare a registrable interest, because that union supported my campaign in the last election. Those unions are saying much the same things as hon. Members are saying in today's debate.

Another issue that the directive causes problems with is the International Labour Organisation conventions on registered dock workers. Many people, especially the trade unions, look on the directive as a means of undermining not only the specific conventions, but the entire structure of union membership in our ports, which would be a bad thing.

I will be in danger of repeating many of the issues that other hon. Members have raised if I continue too far along that track. I shall finish by saying that if we can convince the Minister of the need to support us in opposing the directive—I am sure that we are getting there—she will be on the side of that growing constituency of people who say that it is unnecessary and that it will do more damage than good. The only winners will be the solicitors and lawyers, who will make a great deal of money from all the claims and counter claims. I hope that the Minister will join us in opposing this unnecessary directive.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): Order. I need to call the Front-Bench speakers to make their winding-up speeches at 3.30 pm, and I see that two further Members wish to speak. I hope that they can calculate the time allocation.

3.21 pm

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): I will attempt carefully to calculate my time allocation.

I have followed the progress of the directive for some time, and I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) has secured a debate on the matter. I also submitted a request for a debate to the Speaker's Office in my indecipherable handwriting. I think that the Speaker's Clerk may have concluded that we did not need a debate on the excess of pork surfaces and thrown my proposal in the bin.

Nevertheless, we have secured this debate and it is important that the issues relating to the port directive are made clear. The Minister must be equally clear on the matter and I hope that she will be able to assist whatever needs to be done to secure an EU port directive that makes sense in relation to the original suggestions of what a port directive should consist of, instead of the directive currently before the European Parliament. The existing directive displays a misunderstanding of what is meant by a level playing field in the context of what it claims to do.

Creating a level playing field is a question not just of not building it on the side of a mountain, but of what people do on that level playing field. We expect two sides to turn up and that there should be the same rules for both. There should be a referee and the game should proceed in an orderly fashion. The rules should protect the players from being injured or killed. Contrary to that, the directive appears to suggest that the rules can change during the game. For example, the manager might recruit someone from the crowd during the game to play in the match or, during half time, a player might be sold and come out during the second half for the opposite side.

The directive concentrates on inter-port competition in a way, as my right hon. Friend set out clearly, that does not do anything either for investment in ports or for health and safety matters relating to the running of ports. In the directive's second incarnation, it claims to begin considering the question of transparency of competition between ports, but in my view it does not significantly address that. It is important that the UK considers that area carefully in addressing the directive.

It is certainly the case that ports throughout Europe have different definitions of what constitutes a port. In Germany, for example, ports are treated as part of the transport system. In France, there is substantial investment in port infrastructure, dredging, buoys, lighting systems and so on through regional and national assistance, which varies in different parts of France.

In elements of the directive, the assumption is made that ports somehow exist independent of the trade that goes on in them, so that the trade can be deregulated in the way suggested by the directive without harming the infrastructure. If we are to have an infrastructure directive that produces a level playing field, the issue of who funds what in relation to ports must be addressed. In the UK, ports are regarded as commercial entities in their own right and, as hon. Members have already mentioned, they must pay their own way in terms of all infrastructure.

Even so, there are clearly issues of definition, for example, in relation to the infrastructure to and from the port on its landward side. Hon. Members have already made some mention of that. For example, what about rail links to and from ports? In the port of Southampton, a key issue is whether the freight rail link from Southampton to the midlands should be upgraded to deal with the new high box containers. That might be outwith the infrastructure and investment handled by the port itself.

That is what the directive ought to consider. That would be a directive that those who are interested in ports could sign up to. As it stands, the directive does the opposite of most of those things, and it is significant that every speaker in the debate and every party representative in this Chamber agrees that, without those substantial changes, the directive can only harm the interests of British and indeed European ports, rather than advance them as it claims to do.

3.26 pm

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I shall be mindful of the time constraints, but even in the main Chamber the speeches from the two Front-Bench spokesmen sometimes take less than half an hour. Also, I have something new to say: there will be no more Mr. Nice Guy, because we are sometimes far too polite in relation to the Government. Even my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead) seems to accept the concept of a directive, I say that it is not necessary at all, and I want to elaborate on that. My mandate for being here is that I represent the port of Tilbury—the last working part of the historic port of London—and also 18 miles of river frontage, which includes wharfs that will not be covered by the directive. If the directive were put into practice, it would create some distortion and unfairness in relation to the enterprise of the port of Tilbury and those smaller wharfs. That needs to be spelt out. The port of Tilbury is owned by the Forth Ports group, which is a significant player when it comes to ports in the United Kingdom. Its headquarters are in Leith.

Assuming that the Minister will not accept everything that I say this afternoon, I invite her at least to give some idea of the logic behind the directive. Who is driving it? Is she mindful of the fact that the European Parliament basically rejected it? I know that it has been resuscitated and had some fine tuning, but basically it is the same animal. I want to be reassured that there is not a scintilla of truth in the rumour that our Ministries used leverage to try to get Labour MEPs to support the directive initially. This is my hon. Friend's opportunity to repudiate that charge.

Employing some dexterity, I am a socialist who believes in the market economy. There should be a free market, even for labour, subject to the fact that there must be regulation of health and safety standards, proper means for reviewing service conditions, and free negotiations. In relation to that, it is time that the Government enacted the International Labour Organisation conventions, to which reference has been made. When I said that there would be no more Mr. Nice Guy, my hon. Friend the Member for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright) said from sedentary position that the Minister could write to me. It is time that a Labour Government implemented the conventions. The Minister's brief no doubt says, "If someone mentions ILO, pretend you haven't noticed." I want her to respond to my point about the ILO conventions, because the issue has been raised time and again since I have been a Member, and certainly since 1997. We need to look at that.

The driver—the so-called Lisbon agenda—said, "Let's open up the markets, particularly in the services area." In principle, I do not lie awake at night anxious about the Lisbon agenda of the European Union, but I do not see how the directive translates into a way of fulfilling the Lisbon agenda. Indeed, I see it as the opposite of the market approach. In the United Kingdom, we have a good market in the ports sector. We are an island. It is worth drawing the Chamber's attention to the fact that the cost to shipping lines of handling containers in UK ports is about $100 or £68. That compares with an average of about $134 or £91 in north Europe and $200 on the east coast of north America.

The important comparison is between the UK, which has a really good market in terms of port handling, and the rest of northern Europe. I suspect that there is protectionism of the national ports in all those areas, and many countries in the European Union are up rivers. The Danube covers several European Union countries, and the prescription does not fit all of them. The UK can legitimately say, "Don't wreck our highly competitive market"—because the figures that I have before me stand up—"to address high prices elsewhere in northern European ports."

The Commission consultation has been parlous. Originally the directive did not include, for instance, cargo handling; it related only to some of the technical services. They should not be covered by the directive, but it has been extended to cover stevedore functions and cargo handling. The fact must be flagged up that the Commission cannot pretend that there has been adequate consultation about that matter.

The directive will encourage greater use of poorly trained or casual staff, as a consequence of the reduction in safety standards. It will deprive people, companies and corporations that have invested in UK ports and made them very competitive, and it could jeopardise further investment in UK ports. The directive will also mean that customers and port owners cannot benefit from economies of scale. For that reason, if the directive were allowed to go through, it would do the opposite of promoting the market.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): Order. I ask the hon. Gentleman to draw his speech to a conclusion.

Andrew Mackinlay: I shall, Mr. Bayley. As well as providing a response on the ILO issue, I hope that the Minister will tell the Minister of State, Department for Transport, and the Secretary of State for Transport what has been said today. It is fair to remind the Minister that the Foreign Secretary has repeatedly said in the House in relation to European legislation that he wants to be sensitive to what the House says. I do not think that there is a person in the House who supports the directive. If there is, hands up he or she.

The message must be conveyed that the directive must not pass. During our presidency and during the presidency of Austria, which does not have an abundance of ports, except on the Danube, the matter should be deemed to be dead.

We are exercised by security; I certainly am. One of the benefits of the port of Tilbury is that it is self-contained. It is the nearest thing to a walled port, which will become the trend in ports. It is literally walled, in the sense that it is protected to combat crime, theft and so on; and also, when a small number of employers are based in a port, they can be controlled and identified. The great investment can be spent on knowing precisely who those people are, where they have been and where they have come from. If we create a multiplicity of employers in those ports, the objective will be diminished.

For all those reasons, I hope that the Minister will be bold and say that she takes the mood of the House and that she will use her best endeavours and offices to frustrate and eventually kill this crackpot directive.

3.33 pm

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I shall be brief. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on having raised the subject, and all the Members who have spoken. The debate has been an education for me. I must admit that I would not be comfortable dealing with this topic on "Mastermind", but after the debate, I think that I would cope a little better.

The right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen asked what problem the directive is meant to address. Fundamentally, the problem is fair trade in one form or another. There have always been conflicts of interest concerned with merchant shipping, going right back to conflicts between ports and port owners and shipowners. If we go right back to the days of ancient Greece and to the unfortunate affair of Troy, we see that the problem has existed for a very long time.

In the old days, ships essentially took what deal they could at the port, and if they did not like the deal, they simply went elsewhere. None the less, ports have always been interested in attracting more and more trade, and in forcing down their costs. The ports' disputes with which we are familiar are normally those between the dock owners and the dock workers. I know about that, sadly, because I was involved in a rather futile effort at conciliation during the dock workers' strike in Liverpool, an historic dispute of many years ago, because I was a leader on the council. I remember discussing with both sides their relative fears about the industry. The dock owners voiced their fear of union exploitation and the stranglehold exercised by the unions. They would start by saying, "Can I take you back to 1954?" The unions would express their fear of casualisation and say precisely the same thing. Those fears were genuine and real.

There was a brutal battle about the various interests. The word used by the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) to describe arrangements at Felixstowe was "companionable". That word certainly did not apply in the case to which I refer. It must have taken a special genius for the EU directive to have united forces that have normally been at one another's throats.

As far as I can see, the only supporters of the directive will be big shipowners, who might relish competition on issues such as pilotage, the possibility of self-handling and the erosion of, and some attacks on, what they see as vested interests. I dare say that some of them would argue for a further degree of liberalisation—for a financially transparent regime, in which there are underlying rules related to safety and ensuring that everyone involved in the enterprise has adequate and appropriate expertise to conduct themselves properly and an environment in which no one is held to ransom and bargains are free and fair. That is the theory of liberalisation.

Whether it is called the Lisbon agenda or whatever, that theory sounds all right. In this case, the practice appears to be different. We must accept that ports are vital to a nation in a way in which other service industries are not. Ports are vital because they affect a much wider economy than themselves, because use of the ports, rather than of the roads, is vital to the environmental imperatives that dominate our agenda, and because they are related to national security, although to a lesser extent than formerly.

Any Government ought to be, and most are, uncomfortable about leaving ports to the free market. That is why the issue is so difficult. It sets some tricky dilemmas for the Government. Transport policy, whether port or road policy, is essentially a form of economic intervention. In the context of Europe, that always raises complicated issues about state aid.

The Government also have overriding imperatives to do not with transport but with the environment. The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal mentioned wild flowers. Environmental arguments cut both ways. We may save a few wild flowers, but if the net effect is that we put more lorries on the road, the effect on the environment is not to the better.

As I see it, the directive is about having the benefits of the market without the pitfalls. The pitfalls have been well analysed. They are poor safety, environmental damage and economic uncertainty. We would all accept that that is the consensus about the directive. It is too prescriptive. It makes things mandatory that should be optional. It is insensitive to the economic investment needs of ports. The right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen analysed that well. It is also, as other Members said, unmindful of the dangers of casualisation and the health and security issues attaining to that.

It seems to me that there is good commercial practice in the ports industry. Good commercial practice needs no further recommendation. It does not need a set of imperatives from Europe to bind and establish it further. To endeavour to do that restricts the market or leads to an undesirable form of Euro-fudge.

In a nutshell, I appreciate the concerns of both Europe and the Minister, but however those concerns are addressed, the directive does not seem to be the most appropriate way of addressing and furthering them.

3.39 pm

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): We have had a good debate. I congratulate the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) not only on securing it but on his forceful and common-sense contribution to it.

When considering the directive, the most striking feature is the wide opposition that it has created. I have rarely encountered such unanimity. That is clearly a view shared by the right hon. Gentleman and by most other speakers who have contributed. Members of all parties, the Transport and General Workers Union, representatives of the major ports and the European Parliament are all united against the proposal.

I pay tribute to Timothy Kirkhope, MEP, the leader of the delegation of Conservative MEPs, and his colleagues, who have led the opposition to the proposal. Perhaps the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) should go to the European Parliament and have a quiet—or, in his case, noisy—word with his Labour MEP colleagues. At one point, even the UK Government seemed to have joined the opposition. In February this year, they stated:

"The UK Government is less certain that the impact of these new proposals on the UK ports sector would be realistic or proportionate."

Had they stuck with that line, they could have included the official Opposition among their fellows. However, despite all the Prime Minister's fine words in Brussels, it seems that there may be yet another climb down by the Government on an important issue. I hope that I am wrong and that the Minister will reassure us that that is not the case.

We all ought to be able to criticise the European Union when it gets something wrong. I entirely agree with what my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) said. One problem with the EU is that it does not like to be rebuffed. If the people of a nation state reject one of its schemes, they are asked about it again and again until they give what is considered to be the right answer. If one of the major players in Europe throws out a proposal such as the constitution, many in the EU act as if nothing has happened. Now we see what happens if one of its own institutions, the Parliament, rejects a directive. Does the Commission respect the decision and drop the proposal? No, it proposes it again. The right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen is right in saying that that is exactly the type of behaviour that has alienated many of the Union's citizens from its institutions.

During Britain's presidency of the EU, the Prime Minister has a perfect opportunity to refuse to be a party to such an insult to democracy, and to encourage our partners to drop the proposal. However, despite that golden opportunity to put a stop to unsatisfactory legislation that nobody wants, there are signs that the Government may acquiesce in yet another dose of Commission-inspired bureaucracy. Even if the proposal had not been rejected by the European Parliament, there are good reasons to drop it on its own merits, as we have heard this afternoon.

It is fair to say that the directive is not really aimed at British ports. That came out in the flavour of the contributions today. Its aim is to inject some much-needed liberalisation into the ports of mainland Europe, many of which currently sit under the heavy hand of state control. In many respects, such ports lag way behind ours. As Michael Everard, the former president of the Chamber of Shipping and chairman of its ports and pilotage policy committee, said to the Transport Committee:

"I have been going to Sweden for the last 30 years. I used to say when I went there that I wished our ports in the UK were as efficient as Sweden. Now things have totally turned round. We are far more efficient than they are."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal made an excellent case. He referred to his book but did not tell us what it is called. Perhaps he should send a copy to every member of the European Commission. The proposal—even the amended one—will introduce a formal framework of competition to the provision of commercial port services. As I have said, that may be very well for some parts of Europe, but it is not necessary in Britain, mainly because British ports underwent liberalisation in the 1980s as a result of the policies of the trail-blazing Government led by Lady Thatcher, of whom my right hon. Friend was a distinguished member. Consequently, for this country, the directive is not a liberating experience but a straitjacket.

Take, for example, the forced tendering of contracts for cargo handling. That may be necessary in other parts of Europe, where the ports do not deal with that side of the business—they farm it out to other contractors—but UK ports normally handle it themselves. Forced tendering will result in fragmentation of the companies that run our harbours and could lead to increased use of casual labour. I agree with the comment that one likely consequence is a deterioration in the quality of work and, therefore, increased health and safety risks. Those risks cannot be exaggerated.

No one is happy about the directive—not the unions, not the ports and not the European Parliament, which cited the proposal as its main objection to the original directive. Even the Government have conceded that the directive will change Britain's ports to a more European model, although Ministers have alleged that the changes will take place over a couple of generations.

If the proposal is approved, there will be an increase in regulation and paperwork across the board. That will, as the TGWU argued,

"discourage much needed investment in the UK port industry and make it harder for UK ports to offer an efficient service to their customers".

That argument was echoed by several hon. Members during the debate.

[Mr. Greg Knight]

The directive will force British ports to back-pedal in the name of liberalisation, and there seems to be some doubt whether it will help the ports of our European neighbours. The chairman of the European Sea Ports Organisation was dismissive and said:

"I am afraid that the proposal we now have on the table is not going to help ports in facing their common challenges. Instead of creating an attractive climate for much needed investments in ports, it will probably scare potential investors away."

The pilotage sector of the industry has also expressed deep concern about the directive's impact. The European Maritime Pilots Association said that "under no circumstances should pilot services come under the scope of the proposed directive".

One of the main arguments for throwing the directive out of the European Parliament in November 2003 was fears about the employment of casual labourers. Changes have been made to the directive, but it looks highly unlikely that the European Parliament's committee on transport and tourism will deem them to be sufficient. I hope that Members of the European Parliament will continue to block the measure.

I understand that no fewer than 220 trade unions throughout the EU are gearing up to oppose the measure because they believe—I agree—that it will undermine safety standards in harbours throughout the EU. We have manifold reasons for rejecting the directive, even in its slightly amended form. It serves neither the interests of mainland European ports, nor our British ports. It has been rejected once by the British Parliament and has not had the amendments necessary to merit its approval. It will jeopardise safety in the name of liberalisation and it will jeopardise our liberal UK regime by imposing additional red tape.

I hope that the Minister will give a robust response to the debate. The essence of the answer was touched on by the hon. Member for Dover (Gwyn Prosser) when he said that the issue should be deemed to be one of national competence. If the EU accepted that, it would be the answer to the problem. Let the British Government go their own way because the matter should be one of national competence. I hope that the Minister will say that she takes the same view and do what she can to persuade her fellow Ministers in the EU to abandon the proposal or, at the very least, argue for the principle of subsidiarity.

The hon. Member for Dover rightly said that a large bow wave of opposition is facing the measure, and I hope that the Minister agrees with him. She should do her best to ensure that that bow wave sinks this unwanted vessel.

3.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Ms Karen Buck): I also congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on this timely debate, which focuses the House's attention on the challenging proposal for legislation throughout the EU on the market for port services. I congratulate him on not only obtaining the debate, but on the characteristic cogency and power with which he delivered his contribution. It has been a debate characterised by excellent contributions from hon. Members representing ports authorities, bringing a great deal of expertise and local knowledge. It has been characterised also by a high degree of cross-party unanimity, which represents, through hon. Members' contributions, what I hear as a high degree of cross-sectoral concern, spanning business and the trade unions. I assure hon. Members that I have heard that message. The Minister of State, Department for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), will be the lead Minister on the issue, but I assure hon. Members that I shall report back to him fully on what has been said today.

As everyone in Westminster Hall knows, the UK currently holds the presidency of the European Council, so our role in the next six months is to act as a fair and neutral broker, taking forward the Council's agenda. We act as an advocate for common EU policies and are responsible for brokering agreements and delivering results. I am therefore reluctant to dive too deeply into the controversy of the proposal from a national perspective, as the presidency's role is impartially to take forward the agenda of the EU, which the UK has helped to shape.

Within that agenda, some things are clearly more important to us than others. Presidencies that are perceived to focus exclusively on national interests soon lose credibility and undermine their capacity to deliver. That said, the proposal clearly matters to us. The Commission has said that the whole thrust of the directive is to introduce a permissive rather than a mandatory regime. It also argues that its aim is to ensure that the market is aware of the opportunity for the provision of competitive services in the port sector. The Commission believes that the directive will allow for market access, providing that there are suppliers seeking to enter the market. Those are admirable intentions.

It is clear from listening to today's contributions, however, that hon. Members share the concerns of a wide cross-section of their colleagues in the European Parliament that those aspirations have not been translated into a realistic or proportionate proposal. My right hon. Friend's concerns, and those expressed highly consistently—albeit with different local illustrations—by the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), and my hon. Friends the Members for Great Yarmouth (Mr. Wright), for Dover (Gwyn Prosser), for Southampton, Test (Dr. Whitehead), and for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), set out some of the apparent shortcomings of the proposed directive. They expressed crucial concerns about the impact on future port investment, the impact of levels of potential uncertainty, and the impact of work force casualisation on health and safety. Such concerns have also been raised by a significant majority of member states. The clear view, strongly expressed at last December's Transport Council, was that the current text could be regarded only as a starting point for long and hard negotiation.

As hon. Members will be aware, one of the Government's overarching objectives is better regulation across the board. That will be a major theme running through our presidency of the European Union. Following extensive consultation across the UK ports sector and its users, we have already carried out a thorough regulatory impact assessment of the proposed directive, which is being submitted to the European Scrutiny Committee of this House. As my right hon.

Friend pointed out, our assessment amply confirms that there is a greater level of market discipline at work in the UK than elsewhere in Europe. The UK ports sector in general already provides port users and service providers with the market freedoms proposed by the directive—several hon. Members emphasised that point.

We do not expect that the intended consequence of the directive would have a significant impact on the fully liberalised, commercially independent UK ports sector or its stakeholders. However, we accept that there is a real possibility of serious unintended consequences, which would have an adverse effect on the continued efficiency and effectiveness of the sector. We do not so far see that those would be adequately balanced by any compensatory advantage. Clearly, this is not a satisfactory situation.

Our ports are vital to the continued economic well-being of the UK. The directive would have an impact on the 45 UK ports, which have an average annual throughput of more than 1.5 million tonnes, and 200,000 passenger movements per annum, if calculated on currently available data for 2002–03. These ports handle 95 per cent. of the UK's trade by tonnage, and it is vital that any regulation that impacts on them is of net overall benefit.

As many hon. Members have recognised, the directive has a long and contentious history. In his opening remarks, my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen made it clear that the European Parliament rejected the original proposal at the conciliation stage in 2003. The revised proposal was issued in October 2004, and initial deliberations were taken forward under the Luxembourg presidency. The published Luxembourg-UK presidency programme commits us to progressing that dossier.

The UK took a leading role in steering the original proposal into what was generally regarded as a reasonable and proportionate measure by member states, but not, in the end, the European Parliament. If there is to be a directive on opening up port services, our European partners now look to the UK, as a major maritime player in the Community, to grasp the nettle once more. They want us to move towards a workable and workmanlike proposal that delivers market liberalisation where it is required, but with full regard to the commercial realities of the European port sector.

I assure hon. Members that we intend to rise to that challenge in Europe. Departmental officials are taking an active role in discussion with colleagues in other member states, sharing our assessment of the directive's impact on the port sector and soliciting their views and ideas. We have built up significant support in the Commission and among other member states. We are consulting widely at home and abroad with the various parties involved, as we did on the previous directive. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock that there is no truth in the allegation that we are pressurising Members of the European Parliament to take a contrary view.

Andrew Mackinlay: I never believed it anyway.

Ms Buck: It is a bit late to mention that.

The Government have also taken the lead in persuading the Commission to undertake an impact assessment of its proposal, and it has now been accepted that the Council cannot resume discussion of the proposal until that assessment is available, which is expected to be in the autumn. The assessment should be able to demonstrate that there will be an overall net benefit from the proposal for port users across the Community.

During our presidency, we intend to continue to work with other member states, comparing their national impact assessments with that produced by the Commission. In doing so, we hope to develop sufficient consensus to formulate the substantial revisions that are clearly needed to the proposal.

We are well aware that, as has been reconfirmed this afternoon, uncertainties surrounding the directive are already having a significant impact on UK port investment plans. There is therefore a clear need to resolve the position as soon as possible. Even if the Council or the European Parliament eventually rejected the text, however, the Commission would be obliged to return to the subject in the years to come. We have a good opportunity now to achieve a sensible outcome, which would be preferable to allowing uncertainty to remain, with its potentially debilitating impact on the port sector's continuing effectiveness.

As the UK holds the presidency, we have to act on the consensus among member states. So far, that consensus is to achieve a significant outcome through substantial revision of the proposal.

In summary, the Government have indicated from the outset that the proposals must be realistic and proportionate in their impact on UK port sector interests. In addition, the directive must clearly recognise the diversity of the European port sector and the opportunities already provided. Our RIA clearly supports the view that significant improvements are needed to many aspects of the proposal if it is to meet those requirements. During our presidency, we are in a good position to begin work to deliver those improvements for the benefit of the European port sector and its customers.

Department for International Development (Mr. Howard Horsley)

3.59 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): I secured this debate on Howard Horsley, whom the Department for International Development has treated badly, because he is a friend and for many years was the head teacher of a tough school in Grimsby, at which he gave distinguished service. He is also an idealist who is passionately concerned about international development. Indeed, he has done aid work in Africa and the West Indies.

When the incoming Labour Government expanded the aid programme, Howard gave up his teaching career to become the head of the largest British educational aid programme ever initiated in Ghana. His reward has been to be treated abominably by DFID. The problem was that he blew the whistle by drawing the attention of the Department in London to the programme's lax budgetary and other financial controls, which Ghanaian and foreign aid agencies in Ghana had drawn to his attention and which could give rise to corruption in purchasing, for instance, Land Rovers and computers.

Howard expressed his concerns in London to the then head of the Ghana desk, who told him that she shared many of them and that they would be addressed. The issue should have been treated as whistleblowing on malpractices under the Public Interest Disclosure Act 1998; instead, however, Howard was fired after he had just recovered from typhoid at home and was about to return to Ghana. No dissatisfaction with Howard had been expressed before, and none of DFID's disciplinary procedures, as set out in its 1999 documents on safeguards—hearings, the right to produce evidence, the right of appeal and the need for advance warnings—was applied.

Howard asked to return to Ghana to prepare his defence. He was told that he could, and should, do so and that his files would be protected. He arrived back in Ghana to find that his computer files had been expertly wiped and all his physical files had vanished on the instruction of a senior DFID official. He was told to return home immediately, and that he must not talk about the events to people such as me, his former MP, because the Official Secrets Act applied and sanctions would be exercised if he did.

On his return, Howard took up the issue with Sir John Vereker, the then permanent head of DFID, who said that an internal inquiry would be initiated. Only when those internal procedures had yielded nothing and he had exhausted internal remedies, of which there were few enough, did he refer the matter to a tribunal. At the tribunal, he was given no access to papers or to the accusations. The tribunal gave directions on disclosure that were not fully fulfilled, and the Treasury solicitor made inaccurate claims that Howard had been warned that the Official Secrets Act would apply and that all relevant documents had been disclosed.

Lord Goldsmith is an honourable man, but the claims were wrong. When Howard and I met him, he agreed that the claims were wrong, but said that they had been made in good faith on behalf of DFID, and that there was no obligation on the Treasury solicitor to check the accuracy of claims made by the client. However, the court was in effect misled, and it refused jurisdiction on the issue.

Only when the National Audit Office began to inquire were the disclosures required by the tribunal given to Howard, by which time the tribunal hearing had finished. Again, they were honourable men, and it was said that there had been a misunderstanding.

At this point, I became involved to try to help Howard, whom I regard as a man of idealism and good faith. I found that other means of redress had started to fail. First, Sir John Vereker, the permanent secretary, who is an honourable man, had said that a full internal inquiry had been initiated and carried out, but he seems to have been wrong. We learned from later correspondence that no inquiry had been initiated or requested. The ombudsman, with whom I took up the matter, has no jurisdiction on matters of employment. The data protection people's writ does not operate outside the UK; the events took place in Ghana.

I took the matter to Baroness Prashar, the senior civil service commissioner, who was receptive, responsive and helpful, but she told me that there had been confusion over the capacity in which Howard Horsley had been employed. He was not a civil servant, although the post was advertised as a civil service job and he was interviewed as such. Had it been a civil service job, he could not have been dismissed in such a fashion. Neither was he a technical co-operation officer, because that covers British officials seconded to foreign Governments to handle British aid programmes. He was working not in that capacity but directly for DFID. Had he been a technical co-operation officer, he would have been better protected and would have had more rights against dismissal.

Baroness Prashar said that he was employed under the royal prerogative, which is a rather mysterious category of employment. She explained that it was rather like the secret service. That had me baffled, because it meant that he had no protection. However, Baroness Prashar wrote to the Cabinet Secretary saying that such people should have their position recognised and regularised. I am grateful to her for doing that. Provisions for regularisation of such posts were put into force in DFID when the posts were all transferred to civil service staff in 2002.

I wrote to the Cabinet Secretary as head of the civil service and therefore, presumably, the protector of somebody treated in such a fashion, asking for an inquiry and asking him to meet Howard and me after we had trailed around all those other bodies trying to get them to intervene. He declined to initiate an inquiry and declined to meet us. He told us that there had already been a full inquiry; that was not true, but, of course, the Cabinet Secretary is an honourable man.

I also went to Sir John Bourn at the National Audit Office; he was very helpful. He considered the issue, and officers were sent out to Ghana to look at what had happened there. He found that the financial controls in DFID in this country were lax and that similar laxities applied in Ghana. He said that that should be put right. He agreed that, in view of the laxity of the controls, corruption was possible, but he did not find any. He did not, it is fair to say, speak to any of the other foreign aid agencies operating in Ghana, which might have told him a different story.

At first, Sir John found that Mr. Horsley's predecessor had not complained. He later corrected that when we demonstrated that Mr. Horsley's predecessor had complained about the same issues and that at the end of his period of service his contract was not renewed and he was out of a job. That was corrected in the NAO report.

Sir John also found no reference to, or record of, the payment of £18 million that Mr. Horsley complained about. I want to digress at this point. Apparently, when the Chancellor sold part of the gold stocks, the gold price fell, producing severe difficulties for Ghana and its agricultural exports. That was discussed in a meeting in London with the then Secretary of State for International Development, at which the Ghanaian deputy Education Minister was present, and the Department considered making a payment to help the Ghanaians. The Ghanaian Education Minister was in London at the time but was not called to the meeting. Howard Horsley and the overseas aid community in Ghana knew that there would be a payment to help them in that situation.

On 23 September 1999, Mr. Horsley was called to a meeting with the Ghanaian equivalent of the Comptroller and Auditor General. He went with a representative of the British high commission, a Mr. Stuart, and was told that £18 million had arrived and it would shortly release money for educational purposes in Ghana, where he was working at the time. Many people knew of this but the NAO went through the ledgers of payments overseas by the Treasury, the Overseas Development Administration and other agencies and could find no trace of the payment.

Sir John Bourn, the Comptroller and Auditor General, wrote to me to say that the British embassy official, Ian Stuart,

"has confirmed to my staff that he was present at the talks, and that the then Secretary of State (Ms Clare Short) lent a sympathetic ear to the Ghanaians regarding the fall in the gold price, and the price of agricultural commodities such as cocoa and coffee. He added, however, that he was 'absolutely sure' that there was no rapid disbursement of funds to Ghana following the talks."

That is a very equivocal statement. The NAO was not able to enlarge on it for us. What does it mean? No rapid disbursement of funds does not mean that there was no disbursement of funds. It presumably means that there was no immediate disbursement of funds. That was the statement. This issue of why the £18 million was paid and what happened to it is very mysterious. I put it no stronger than this, but it may account for the way that Howard Horsley was being treated by the British Government and why there was so little response to his points.

Indeed, as a result of the NAO report, a document entitled "A Review of Safeguards Against Misappropriation and Diversion of Aid" was issued. It states:

"Appropriate channels for reporting corruption should be established".

That is what Howard Horsley tried to do. The document continues:

"Internal procedures for reporting suspicions should be clear and made known to staff".

There is a direct endorsement of what Howard Horsley was saying, which had been ignored by DFID. At least something resulted from our interviews and the work of Sir John Bourn and the NAO.

This has been for me a sad and deeply frustrating experience because we have gone round from one body that is there to help redress grievances and to see that the rules are observed to another. We have received a little help from all—substantial help from the NAO—but no resolution of the basic issue of why Howard Horsley was treated in this disgraceful fashion and fired from a job to which he had committed himself through idealistic motives.

We have been batted around like two shuttlecocks, almost going round to all these bodies holding hands. Everyone knew that it was an issue of concern. Everyone had some information to offer and a little help, but nobody could resolve the major issue. In the end they have all put up the shutters, which is why I am here today raising this issue. If nothing can be done, details of the abominable situation that has been allowed by DFID to arise in the face of a manifest injustice should at least be put on the record.

I should add that as a final piece of vindictiveness Howard Horsley was refused a reference by DFID. He was offered a senior, well-paid administration job in education. But a reference is needed before that can be finalised. DFID at that point, despite my pleas, refused him a reference. He has not worked since. He is now 60 and he has not worked because of this disgraceful treatment over all these years.

First, there is a need to strengthen the whistleblowing protections under the Public Interest Disclosure Act and to stop using the Official Secrets Act to avoid embarrassment to Departments. Most of all, DFID needs to do justice to this man over this case. There should either be an independent inquiry into the matter, or—I would prefer this—Howard Horsley should be reinstated in the job in which he was doing such good work, and to which he was so committed. Had he been a technical co-operation officer employed by a foreign Government to attend to the disbursement of British aid, the good governance requirements that DFID imposes on foreign Governments who work in that capacity would have prevented his being treated in this way. A foreign Government would not have been allowed to treat him as DFID has. Had they done so, there would have been a cut-off of aid. DFID should observe the standards that it preaches to other Governments. Instead of rewarding Mr. Horsley's manifest commitment and idealism, it treated him in a disgraceful fashion, and that should not have been allowed. It is never too late to do justice.

4.16 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): As is traditional, I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on securing the debate, although I recognise that it will bring him no joy. It certainly brings none to me, or, I am sure, to those who watch or read the proceedings.

I welcome the opportunity to clarify the record regarding Department for International Development management practices at what is a hugely important time for development and for aid generally. I shall address Mr. Howard Horsley's dismissal, but first I shall make some general remarks about the Department's management practices and touch on the issue of Ghana.

[Mr. Gareth Thomas]

Earlier this month, at Gleneagles, the G8 countries made an historic agreement. They agreed a comprehensive package of measures to accelerate development in Africa and the developing world. Because of that agreement, Africa can make faster progress toward achieving its millennium development goals. The package is a momentous and important result for Africa, the UK and the international community. Inevitably, it gives DFID a great opportunity and a great challenge, and I am confident that it will meet that challenge.

It is important to point out that others share my confidence in DFID. In January, the Prime Minister said that it is "probably the most respected such Department in the world."—[Official Report, 12 January 2005; Vol. 429, c. 295.]

Praise for the Department has come from a range of other sources. The Canadian Institute of International Affairs recently said that DFID is generally considered to be the best development agency in the world. In 2003, a BBC "Westminster Hour" survey panel that included a former Minister, lords, MPs, former civil servants and journalists rated it as the top-performing UK Government Department. Therefore, I have reason to be proud of DFID's performance. If one is proud of one's Department's performance, one must inevitably be proud of the way in which it is managed.

I turn to some specifics about DFID's management practices. In all our work we stress the importance of sound management, which must start with a clear focus. Our public service agreement sets out that focus. The agreement is centred around achieving the ambitious and internationally agreed millennium development goals, but it essentially has one aim, which is reconfirmed in the International Development Act 2002: to work towards the elimination of poverty in poorer countries.

In mid-2004, following direction from Ministers, our management board set out a programme for the next three years that highlighted delivery and performance against that single, overarching aim. Part of the agenda was a wide-ranging efficiency programme. We believe that gains worth £400 million can be achieved in the period 2005–06 to 2007–08. We monitor our efficiency gains as part of our effort to monitor and report on our performance. Like all Departments, we publish progress against our public service agreement twice a year and we report publicly on our website.

The public service agreement includes a value-for-money objective, which includes the aim to increase the proportion of our bilateral programme excluding humanitarian assistance to low-income countries from 78 per cent. to 90 per cent. in the current financial year. The Department knows that it can enhance its performance through collaborative working, so of course we join our efforts to those of other Departments, not least the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Ministry of Defence on conflict prevention.

We have a range of sound management practices that protect that value-for-money objective. They include a system of internal control that has been commended by the National Audit Office, annual statements of assurance from each of nine divisional directors, a very active internal audit function and a thorough approach to risk management. In 2004, we also launched further anti-fraud, anti-corruption measures, seeking further to adopt a zero-tolerance stance.

Our sound management practice does not stop at financial issues. In the end, the Department's achievements are about the achievements of our staff and ensuring that their unfailing energy, skill and determination is maintained. That is why this year we launched a major new programme further to improve people management, our approach to which embraces constant efforts on diversity. Those in turn have been bolstered by the launch in 2004 of the "Diversity Vision and Strategic Priorities" paper, senior managers being responsible for delivery against the priorities identified. In summary, we have a range of management practices that ensure strong performance and delivery against our poverty elimination aim.

I shall mention our work in Ghana, a country where Mr. Horsley worked. As hon. Members know, Ghana is a very poor country; more than a third of its population, about 7 million people, live on less than a dollar a day. In Ghana, my Department spends about £70 million a year. The programme is firmly targeted on the poor and on creating the conditions for economic growth. The country has a thriving democracy and a reputation for using aid well. Our programme has succeeded in helping Ghana to bring down poverty by about 10 percentage points since the 1990s. Poverty has reduced to about 37 per cent. of the population today, putting Ghana on track to reach the income poverty millennium development goal by 2015. It is one of the few countries in Africa that is on track to do so.

Our support for Ghana's progress on poverty would not be possible without sound management in the DFID Ghana office. Our internal audit department carried out a further health check of that office in February 2003, judging its management systems to be robust. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that the National Audit Office is expected to visit DFID Ghana again in December further to review our management systems and practices in that office. I will welcome what it has to say.

On people management, DFID Ghana was inspected in 2003 as part of our Investors in People accreditation process. An independent assessor interviewed all 45 staff in Accra and rated DFID Ghana's management environment as good.

I shall refer to the specifics of the case that my hon. Friend raised—the dismissal of Mr. Howard Horsley. My hon. Friend will understand that I cannot breach confidences about Mr. Horsley's personal information and employment in this setting, but I can confirm some key facts about the case. The Department employed Mr. Horsley from May 1999 to January 2000. He was dismissed on 6 January 2000 on performance grounds. Since then, my hon. Friend has written some 17 letters to the Department about Mr. Horsley's case. Two DFID Secretaries of State, two DFID permanent secretaries and two Cabinet Secretaries have considered the matter. Mr. Horsley commenced employment tribunal proceedings in April 2000. The litigation ended following a number of hearings in November 2003, and Mr. Horsley was not successful. The NAO has investigated my hon. Friend's concerns about financial practices in the DFID Ghana office and found no evidence of impropriety. There has also been a series of DFID internal, civil service commissioner and Attorney-General investigations and reviews since the dismissal, which my hon. Friend alluded to. My Department estimates that its costs for investigating and reviewing the case now exceed some £40,000. I recognise that my hon. Friend's constituent has also had huge costs.

Mr. Mitchell: Those costs, of course, would not have arisen had Howard Horsley not been so badly treated, and had the requests not been refused. I am delighted to hear of all the improvements that have been put in place since this case, but they are all subsequent to it. According to the memorandum, the procedures for dealing with staff problems in the Department apply to all employees of DFID, so why was Mr. Horsley not accorded the same procedures, rights of appeal, including internal appeal, and right of internal warning, that the procedures set out?

Mr. Thomas: I recognise that my hon. Friend will not like my answer, but I return to the point that I just made. The case has been considered by two Secretaries of State, two permanent secretaries in the Department, and two Cabinet Secretaries, as well as the employment tribunal. Mr. Horsley has not persuaded those individuals and the tribunal of the merits of the case.

Mr. Mitchell: Of course the matter has been considered by two Secretaries of State, because I kept on raising it. However, one of them was told by Department officials that Mr. Horsley was litigious and that therefore no information should be given. I come back to the point that all this trouble would not have been necessary had proper procedures been followed.

Mr. Thomas: I hear my hon. Friend's point. The advice that he says was given to previous Secretaries of State does not mean that the case has not been extensively and thoroughly investigated. I recognise that my hon. Friend has a different view of the outcome, but I repeat that the case has been thoroughly investigated.

Following the various tribunal proceedings, investigations and reviews that have taken place, the Department strongly believes that no outstanding issues remain to be dealt with. I recognise that that will disappoint my hon. Friend's friend, and, indeed, my hon. Friend himself.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to Mr. Horsley in May 2004 and said that he did not see then how the matter could be taken any further. The Department considered the matter closed then, and I believe that it is closed now. I recognise that that is not the answer that my hon. Friend wanted, but it is an accurate picture.

Urology Services (East Kent)

4.28 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Bayley. I have not yet cleared it with you and the Minister that my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson) may join me in the debate.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): He may contribute if it is all right with the Minister.

Mr. Brazier: Thank you, Mr. Bayley, that is splendid.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise the subject of the proposed reorganisation of urology services in east Kent. I am delighted to see the Minister in her place. She will know that the new model of care in east Kent has been through a traumatic birth and that finally, after a six-year battle, things settled into the new configuration in February. In a moment I shall describe how the proposals that I want to discuss this afternoon, for the provision of surgery for bladder and prostate cancer in Kent, threaten the heart of the new model of care. However, I want first to raise a number of specific objections to the proposals.

Briefly, the proposals would remove bladder and prostate surgery from the new east Kent urology centre at the Kent and Canterbury hospital to two hospitals in west Kent. My first specific objection relates to the issue of quality of clinical care. In January last year, a Kent and Medway cancer network internal peer review, including external reviewers, identified the East Kent Hospitals NHS trust as an excellent provider of surgery for bladder and prostate cancer. The unit was described as having the most advanced multidisciplinary team in Kent.

A recognised and internationally used measure of quality and cost-effectiveness in those procedures is the average post-operative length of stay for patients. Audit of radical prostatectomy in Canterbury shows a post-operative stay of 2.6 days. That is outstanding compared with other major providers—two that I could find the figures for were Bristol at 3.6 days and Basingstoke at 5.3 days. America publishes a national league table, in which the spread is from 2.4 to 4.8 days, so Canterbury, by American standards, would be one of the very best. Perhaps the most impressive statistic of all is that 96 per cent. of Kent and Canterbury patients were fully continent one year after the radical prostatectomies.

That audit was carried out against the criteria laid down in 2002 by the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence, which stated that a unit should perform a critical mass of around 50 operations a year to maintain standards. Kent and Canterbury, with about 60 a year, was well within those guidelines. However, the goalposts have now been arbitrarily moved. An amendment to the improving outcomes guidelines changed the requirement to insist that each unit serve a population of 1 million in order to perform that surgery. Time prevents me from going into much detail on that matter, but no academic evidence that I know of has been offered to suggest that that is a good idea. Indeed, I have received e-mails about a whole string of studies that suggest that it is not. One study in Glasgow, carried out by McCabe et al., suggests that for radical cystectomy, for example, a case load of eight operations a year—a very low case load—is associated with the lowest mortality rate.

[Mr. Brazier]

Such a population base is, in practice, outside the reach of most British district general hospitals. Implementing the IOG is causing havoc in Kent and across the country, threatening to ruin carefully developed models of care and to disrupt teams of surgeons, anaesthetists and nurses who provide excellent standards of care.

We are therefore faced with a situation in which important cancer services are reshaped according to theoretical criteria, rather than the actual outcomes, which have been shown to be excellent. Kent and Medway cancer network says:

"This review was about making a judgement on what would be the most sustainable and deliverable configurations of prostate and bladder cancer surgery."

Yet, barely nine months after the excellent report that I mentioned earlier, the external review panel said, on the one hand, that East Kent Hospitals NHS trust scored extremely poorly on the critical criterion of clinical quality but, on the other hand, that it had

"a currently excellent service with low lengths of stay, strong nursing support, patient focus, community-based post-operative care and a newly formed urology team at Kent and Canterbury Hospital."

That team, which has taken seven years to develop, is under threat from the theoretical criteria that have generated that ghastly exercise in tick-box planning.

I have worked with the Minister in a number of capacities, when we were both Back Benchers, and I do not believe that she wants to take the NHS into territory where words start to mean whatever the speaker wishes. If both the peer review and the report acknowledge that the service in east Kent is excellent, there is something bizarre about theoretical criteria that are used to tick boxes and conclude that the service is of poor quality.

I shall speak more briefly on my second objection to the proposals, which concerns accessibility. The effect of the reorganisation would be to leave no facility at all in east Kent but to provide two units in west Kent. Those units are only 12 miles apart and have an excellent road connecting them. Patients in east Kent will have great difficulty if they are reliant on public transport to access those units, and our ambulance service is already overloaded. How will east Kent patients benefit from travelling many miles for operations that, based on current audit data, will be performed no better in west Kent than in east Kent? In fact, they will be performed slightly less well, according to current figures. Obviously, the proposals must be considered on their merits, but to people living in the comparatively poor area of east Kent, they conform to an all-too-typical pattern across many public services, some of which are completely unconnected with the NHS. The team of nurses, anaesthetists, surgeons and recovery staff, who were carefully put together and have built such a good reputation in a short time, would go to waste.

Those are the specific objections, but the most important objection is more general and involves the threat that the proposals pose to the whole model of care so painfully assembled in east Kent over the past six or seven years. That model of care provides two acute hospitals in east Kent, supported by a specialist hospital in Canterbury, which in practice is by far the most accessible of the three sites, especially for elderly people. It has a local emergency care centre, the first of its kind in the country. Medical specialties such as acute medicine, coronary care, health care of older persons and the Kent renal unit are also included. All those services require 24-hour resident surgical cover. The arithmetic is that, between them, the urology unit and the vascular surgery unit have just enough posts to provide the necessary number of doctors for a safe and sustainable surgical rota.

The proposed removal of those operations and the resulting changes in consultant posts would reduce training opportunities and experience. House officer and trainee posts at Canterbury would be at risk of losing the crucial training recognition from deaneries and colleges. Even without a loss of training recognition, the loss of income from the operations would severely reduce the number of training posts at Canterbury. It would then be impossible to run an on-call rota for surgical emergencies that complied with the European working time directive on the Canterbury site. The whole edifice of the model of care, built up over seven years of battles, would simply collapse under the current proposals, unless there was further reorganisation that provided surgeons from another source.

We are talking about the loss of the local emergency care centre. Acute general medicine, coronary care, health care of older people and the Kent renal unit would become non-viable on the Canterbury site, as would vascular surgery and in-patient urology in the long run. Would the additional capital and revenue required to provide those services elsewhere in east Kent be made available? Would east Kent develop yet another new model of care after all the changes and reorganisations, or would yet more of east Kent's specialist services be moved to west Kent?

The primary care trusts expressed concerns on that when they arrived at a verdict in favour of the changes by a six-to-three vote. I need hardly say that it was the three easternmost PCTs that voted against. They all made it clear, however, that the changes must be contingent on not undermining that critical mass. They put the Canterbury and Coastal PCT—one of the three that opposed the proposals—in charge of the change process, with a brief specifically to that end.

Survey after survey has shown that Canterbury is by far the most accessible hospital in east Kent. For the people living in Canterbury, Whitstable and Faversham—I am particularly glad to have my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent here—and the people in most of the villages, which provide more than a third of the population of east Kent, Canterbury is the most accessible site. The devastation of its model of care and the undermining of the whole settlement in east Kent is threatened by these terrible proposals.

I shall ask the Minister another question as I come to a close. I understand that the reviewer of the process was supposed to be independent. He was independent in the sense that he came from outside Kent, but will the Minister tell us whether that reviewer, who I suspect had a hand in formulating this bizarre policy with the critical mass of 1 million and the rest of it, has ever been called in anywhere and found in favour of a distributed rather than a centralised model? I ask that because the view locally is that he is an avowed centraliser brought in by the Kent and Medway cancer network to rubber-stamp its solution rather than a genuinely independent figure.

There is too much at stake to leave the matter to drift away. The first local emergency centre in the country is running well. After some extremely painful teething problems—one of the staff nurses happens to be a close neighbour of mine—it is now a fully recruited establishment. At one point it did not think that it would achieve that. It would be monstrous if all that were put at risk by the empire-building of one small group of people.

I welcome the fact that Kent county council's scrutiny committee has insisted that there should be a public consultation noting that the recommendation does not support the interests of east Kent. That scrutiny committee is led by an experienced doctor whose constituency lies far to the west of Kent, and I hope that that consultation will be a genuinely independent process. I urge the Minister to support the professionals in the East Kent Hospitals NHS trust and the people of east Kent, by rejecting this illogical and unbalanced proposal.

4.41 pm

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): I apologise to the Minister for not declaring an interest in this debate. I should tell her that my constituency is in a curious position because it spans both hospitals. My constituents in and around Faversham—the Swale borough council area—almost all use the Kent and Canterbury hospital referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier). My constituents in the Maidstone area benefit from the Maidstone hospital.

Having considered the matter as a whole, I am convinced that the proposal is very poor. There are five reasons for that. First, the Kent and Canterbury hospital has just got over a long and bitter fight concerning its future. Secondly, very specific undertakings were given by the Government, and there is a feeling that in sucking urology away from Canterbury, the proposal breaks the spirit, if not the letter, of that agreement. It certainly goes against the spirit of what the Secretary of State told my hon. Friend and me a short while ago.

Thirdly, it is immensely unsettling for staff. Many of the nurses who work in the hospital live in my constituency, and I have had many letters from them about the matter. Fourthly, there is the worry locally that sucking the service away will undermine the critical mass of the Kent and Canterbury hospital.

Finally, if one happens to live in Faversham or in the marshes beyond it, which have no public transport and are on a pretty dodgy road network, it is extremely difficult to get to Maidstone. Quite a lot of elderly and vulnerable people live in that area and, for them, getting to Canterbury is a reasonably viable proposition. Getting all the way over the top of the downs and turning right to go to Maidstone is extraordinarily difficult, and there is no direct public transport link from Faversham to Maidstone. For all those reasons, I entirely support my hon. Friend. I hope that the Minister will see fit to overturn the proposal.

4.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Caroline Flint): I congratulate the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) on securing today's debate, and I welcome the presence of the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), who clearly wishes to support his point of view. I acknowledge that they have come to the debate with concerns—whenever there is change in health service provision, people need to be reassured about the reasons for that change and the impact both on staff who provide services and on present and future patients.

I would like to take the opportunity to pay tribute to all the staff, in the area in question and beyond, who are committed to the improvement of local services. I shall talk about the peer review a little later, but it is difficult when there are hospitals that are—

4.44 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

4.52 pm

On resuming—

Caroline Flint: I thank the hon. Member for Canterbury for warning me which issues concern him most.

I want first to say something about the significant progress made towards the objectives set out in the NHS cancer plan to reorganise, standardise and rejuvenate cancer services so that we can compare to the best in Europe. We are delivering better treatment more quickly to more people than ever before. Cancer mortality in the under-75s has fallen by over 12 per cent. in the past six years, which equates to around 33,000 lives saved. Some 99 per cent. of patients with suspected cancer are seen by a specialist within two weeks of being referred by their GP, and in the hon. Gentleman's area nearly all suspected cancer patients—99.9 per cent.—received an appointment within two weeks at the East Kent Hospitals NHS trust. I am sure that he agrees that cancer services must continue to modernise to improve the service to patients.

We need to establish in Government how clear national standards and securing unprecedented increases in resources can contribute to empowering local health communities to deliver high-quality cancer services for their population. One way that we are doing that is to ensure that the NHS has clear guidance, and the NHS cancer plan set out the intention to make available authoritative guidance on all aspects of cancer care. The guidance is aimed at helping those involved in planning, commissioning, organising and providing cancer services to ensure that those services are organised to ensure appropriately high-quality care.

In September 2002, the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence issued guidance on improving outcomes for urological cancers, which is being used as a framework for the NHS to ensure delivery of high-quality services for patients with those cancers. The guidance recognises that the diagnosis, treatment and care of a person with a urological cancer can be complex and is best provided by bringing together people with all the necessary skills, knowledge and experience. My understanding is that the patients requiring radical surgical management of bladder and prostate comprise less than 5 per cent. of the urology patients treated at the Kent and Canterbury hospitals.

There is, generally, an increasing demand for urology services. Therefore, it is highly likely that we will need at least to maintain the level of consultant cover, to ensure support both for all urological services and for the hospital in general. It is for that reason that the guidance recommends that all patients with urological cancer should be managed by multidisciplinary urological cancer teams. Another key recommendation, which was mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, is that radical surgery for prostate and bladder cancer should be provided by teams typically serving populations of 1 million or more and carrying out a cumulative total of at least 50 such operations per annum. I take on board the point that the hon. Gentleman made about there being 60 operations per annum at his hospital.

The NICE guidance is based on sound evidence, which is available on our website. It is supported by a wide range of key stakeholders, including the prostate cancer advisory group and signatories to the prostate cancer charter for action. It has been widely supported throughout the cancer network and community. The guidance is not about recommending change for change's sake but about considering how outcomes can be improved for future patients by centralising expertise in highly specialised fields. As I mentioned, there will be an increased need for other services in the area at local level.

As the hon. Gentleman is aware, responsibility for delivering cancer services rests with the 34 cancer networks that have been established throughout the country. In Kent and Medway, there is a local commitment to bringing specialist urological cancer services up to national standards. As he knows, specialist urological services are provided by East Kent Hospitals NHS trust, Maidstone and Tunbridge Wells NHS trust, Medway NHS trust and the Dartford and Gravesham NHS trust.

Following the publication of the NICE guidance in 2002, the Kent and Medway cancer network agreed to undertake an external review to test the feasibility of centralising specialist urological cancer services for more radical treatments at one or two sites. The review was chaired by Mr. Mark Fordham from the Royal Liverpool and Broadgreen Hospitals University NHS trust. He is one of Britain's leading authorities on urological cancers. The panel also included specialist urologists, oncologists, pathologists, radiologists, clinical nurse specialists and local service users.

I am aware that concerns have been raised locally about the review process. The hon. Gentleman has added his voice to those concerns. However, I am assured that the process was both thorough and objective and that the criteria used by panel members, and their relative weightings, were agreed by medical and surgical specialists from all local trusts providing that service.

Mr. Brazier: The Minister is right on that point. However, crucial to those criteria was the agreement that quality of service should be high. I set out for the Minister in detail why the quality of service in east Kent was, by any objective measure, very high indeed. It is higher than in west Kent or in other parts of England and America. The measure that the panel used on quality meant something different. It was considering theoretical criteria so, absurdly, the same organisation with a service rated as excellent was deemed to be poor in the review process. The service did not meet the theoretical criteria, although the performance has been excellent on all the objective measures that I listed.

Caroline Flint: In addition to what the hon. Gentleman just said, he mentioned that an internal peer review carried out by the Kent and Medway cancer network last year praised the team and the work being done at Kent and Canterbury hospital. However, the peer review commented only on the current provision of services and did not inform the Kent and Medway cancer network on the future strategic direction of specialist urological services.

That is why we return to the NICE guidance about planning cancer services for the future. That was why the network had to commission an external review to consider how services throughout Kent could be brought in line with national best practice guidelines.

I hear what the hon. Gentleman said. I know that he has been in discussion with various people from the strategic health authority and other organisations. Although there is no doubt that the work at Kent and Canterbury hospital is to be praised, it fell short when lined up against other centres in the determination of which hospitals and sites were best served to provide the complex package of surgical procedures. That was a process that Kent and Canterbury hospital understood and contributed to.

Mr. Brazier: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, but what she just said is incorrect. Kent and Canterbury did not fall short of any other centre. No other centre anywhere has been shown to be superior, to the best of my knowledge, and certainly not the other centres in Kent. All that it was found to fall down on were theoretical tick-boxes of population sizes and other factors, which were in the NICE criteria. In the actual measures of performance, it out-performed not just the rest of Kent but other comparable places in this country and in America. It performed far above the national average on all the performance criteria, such as length of stay and the proportion of people who were still continent at the end of the process.

Caroline Flint: As I have said, I do not doubt issues of performance and quality of care, but the review took into account a range of factors, in order to identify the best way in the future to provide the best services within that part of the country. That is not to say that no other services will be needed in other parts of the Kent and Medway cancer network area. As I said, patients requiring the radical surgery that we are discussing comprise less than 5 per cent. of the number of urological patients treated at the Kent and Canterbury hospital. After considering a wide range of issues, including performance, it was felt after the review that that hospital would not be included in the future site.

I hear what the hon. Gentleman says about the criteria and the weighting of scores, although he obviously disputes that weighting process. However, that is the conclusion to which the team came. It recommended that Maidstone hospital and Medway Maritime hospital should be the chosen sites. That recommendation was subsequently endorsed by all nine primary care trusts at a meeting in May 2005. It is important to stress that the proposals developed by the cancer network are about how to provide the best possible specialist urological, bladder and prostate cancer services for the future. The proposals are not about the relocation of the entire urological cancer service or about urological services as a whole. Under the proposals, the urology unit at the Kent and Canterbury will still have a key role to play.

I appreciate the concerns raised by the hon. Gentleman about the distance that his constituents and other residents in east Kent will have to travel—that point was also made by the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent. The external review team gave that consideration, but it was also impressed by the views of both hospital staff and service users that patients would be prepared to travel for higher quality specialist care. The result will mean that patients will get better care because the change in provisions represents progress towards national standards.

As the hon. Gentleman will know, the next steps on the matter have been discussed locally by representatives of primary care trusts, the Kent and Medway cancer network and the local authority overview and scrutiny committees. It was agreed at a meeting on 29 June 2005 that some form of further consultation on the proposals would occur. The Kent and Medway cancer network has been considering how that further review should best be implemented, and I understand that the chair of Kent and Medway strategic health authority has spoken to the hon. Member for Canterbury in the last few days.

This week, following legal advice, it has been decided that the PCTs in Kent and Medway will not implement their decisions about future radical bladder and prostate cancer surgery pending the outcome of a further review of the impact of the decision on services at Kent and Canterbury hospital. The hon. Gentleman made a number of points about whether there would be a knock-on effect on other services, which may feel that their future could be jeopardised because of other services moving away to another centre. That change in services is solely about specialised urological cancer surgery, and the east Kent review will consider the impact of the change in the Kent and Canterbury hospital. I hope that that will be an opportunity for the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent, and others, to take part in the process.

The overview and scrutiny committee process is meant to play a part in the issues. In preparing for the debate, I asked some questions about how that had been done. The Kent county council overview and scrutiny committee was contacted before the review was carried out and before the process of the review was agreed to determine how it wanted to be involved and whether at that stage it thought that any consultation was necessary. I am advised that in response it asked only to be kept informed. It was given an opportunity to comment on the criteria, and I understand that no formal response was received. It was given an opportunity to shadow the external review, and I understand that it did not offer any names.

I bring those points to the debate because it is important to have confidence in the overview of such processes and the way in which such discussions are held. It is important that the overview and scrutiny process works well and involves local stakeholders.

I have taken into consideration the remarks made by the hon. Gentleman, and also his concern. I urge him, the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent and their constituents to take part in the further review that the east Kent PCTs will undertake. The details will be announced locally, and I hope that all views will be heard. The PCTs throughout Kent and Medway will, I hope, be reassured that their final decision will deliver the best services.

Mr. Brazier: I welcome the Minister's remarks. Will she clarify who is leading the review? Is it the East Kent Coastal primary care trust or all the primary care trusts?

Caroline Flint: I understand that the East Kent Coastal PCT will lead. I hope that ultimately everyone concerned will be reassured that we will have 21st-century cancer services that are fit for purpose and, most importantly, fit for the needs of local communities.

Hugh Bayley (in the Chair): It is always confusing to Members when the debate is interrupted. I should like to thank hon. Members on both sides of the House for co-operating and getting back to the Chamber quickly.
